KING of Great-Britain, France and Ireland.

Most Gracious Sovereign,

OUR Majesties kinde acceptance of me to present it to Your gracious Pro-

History of Your Majesties own Life; a Life, which

The Epistle to the Reader.

*I*R Richard Baker who writ, and published this History, to the beginning of the Reign of King Charles the First, affirm'd, That it was collected with so great care and diligence, that if all other of our Chronicles should be lost, this only would be sufficient to inform Posterity of all Passages memorable or worthy to be known; and if so much might be said of what he did,

I presume, nothing that hath been since added to it, and published, has impair'd the credit and worth thereof.

The many Impressions that have been made and sold of the Book both before, and after the Addition, are a sufficient testimony of the kind acceptance it has had in the World; How necessary this present Continuation is (which alone might have made a Competent History) will best appear by the perusal thereof; and in that part which describes the Transactions of the Duke of Albemarle, there is not only so exact an Account as is nowhere else to be found, but also many secret passages of particular remark, which could never have been known, but from his Excellencies own Papers, and several other private Collections of Persons active with him in that service, which I had the permission to make use of: wherein I have been so faithful, that there is not any Letter, Speech, or Discourse in publique Conferences, which are not exactly set down as they were written, or spoke, save only, that of such Letters, or Speeches, as were very long, the most pertinent parts are only retained.

The wonderful Restauration of his Majesty, which is the Subject of that part of the Continuation; is one of the most extraordinary actions, that has been ever mention'd in Story, both for the Generosity of the Attempt, and the Prudent Conduct of it: For certainly, nothing was ever enterpris'd with greater generosity and courage, then with * Nine thousand Six hundred Foot, and Fourteen hundred Horse and Dragoons (and those long train'd up in an aversion to Kingly Government) to preserve the whole Kingdom of Scotland in English hands, and to Invade England, at a time when the Governing Power was in those, that were irreconcilable to his Majesties Person, and Government, supported by Thirty thousand experienced and victorious Soldiers in England, of the same affections (besides what were at their devotion in Ireland, and Dunkirk,) and a Militia of Trained Bands in all Counties to a greater number then those in pay, all of chosen men, of the like Principles: and this at a time, when by the defeat of Sir George Booth, his Majesties greatest hopes were frustrated, and most of the Nobility and Gentry which were engag'd with him, were disarm'd, and their Estates confiscated, and ready to be divided amongst the enemies of Royalty, to alter, with the Riches, the Interest of the Kingdom; and when they had Enacted, and many of the Legislators themselves taken, an * Oath of abjuration of his Majesty's Person and Family: But then his secrecy in the conduct of this great affair is very remarkable, being oblig'd to act very differently from his intentions;

numbers of his forces are mentioned.

The Epistle to the Reader.

to gain the confidence of those Jealous Masters whose authority he pretended to obey; for if he had but once trod awry in any of the paths he mov'd, all had miscarried; and notwithstanding his greatest subtilty, many objected (thinking thereby to weaken his credit with the Army) That the King was in the bottom of his Design.

His most prudent contrivances were often disappointed, but by his wisdom and dexterity as often retriv'd; one of his greatest difficulties was to temper his own Officers and Souldiers to his purposes, to which the opinion they had of his Conduct and courage, did much contribute, and when that was effected, he the easier modell'd the rest.

It is evident that he acquainted but * one person with his Design, and that he did, supposing it impossible alone without correspondence to manage so hazardous an undertaking; for he was to compass his ends by several and different means, which could not without great address be prepar'd and dispos'd thereinto. And how necessary this Correspondence was, is apparent by many Transitions, but by none more, Then in the lucky * contrivance of getting the Army out of London, and the Quartering his Souldiers in their places, and dispersing the rest; whereby the Parliament, City, and Kingdom became at his Reverence, and without which his Majesties Restauration could never have been effected in this way.

The consideration of these things leads me into so great a labyrinth of Admiration, that I cannot easily desist from detaining the Reader too long from the perusal of the matter, which induces me to it: I shall therefore conclude this Epistle with that commendation of this Renowned Generals undertaking, which a Reverend and pious Prelate most justly delivered in a late Sermon, That it was A Generous, Glorious, and Heroical Design, whereby he hath at once redeem'd his Countrey both from Slavery and Oppression, by restoring the King to his People, and the People to their King; and withal hath purchased unto himself, Honour without Envy, Greatness with Safety, and (which is the best reward of Vertue in this World) a perpetual satisfaction and complacency in himself, for having so nobly perform'd his duty.

E. Phillips.

ENGLAND:

From the time of the ROMANS Government,
Unto the Death of King
CHARLES I.

A

Lthough we begin the Era of our Computation from William called the Conquerour, as though he was the first of our Kings of England: yet before him, were many other excellent Kings; and their Acts perhaps as worthy to be known, if they could be known. But seeing after ages can know nothing of former times but what is recorded by writing: it hath happened, partly by the devallation of Libraries; and partly by the scarcity of Copies, before Printing came up, that of many Authors, scarce so much is left us, as their very names: and besides, it hath followed, that as the first Writers were Poets; so the first writings have been Fictions: and nothing is delivered to Posterity of the most ancient times, but very Fables:

such as the story of Albina (of whom they say, this Island was called Albion: though others say, Ab allis rupibus, of the white cliffs) that she should be the eldest of the two and thirty daughters of Diocletian King of Syria, (such as never was) who being married to two and thirty Kings, in one night killed all their husbands: for which fact, they were put in a Ship, themselves alone without a Pilot, so to try their adventure, and by chance arrived in this Island, of whom Gyants were begotten. And if you like not of this; then have you the story of Albion the son of Neptune, of whom the Island took its name. But when these are exploded, there follows another with great Attestation, and yet as very a fable as these; namely the story

Brutes story fabulous.

Matth. West.

Geoffrey of Monmouth a fabulous writer.

story of the Trojan Brute, (of whom the Island they say, was called Britain: though many other causes are given of the name :) as likewise the story of Brutes cousin Corineus, of whom they say, the Countrey of Cornwall had its name, to whom it was given, for overcoming the Giant Gogmagog: and that Brute having three sons, Loecine, Allbanath, and Camber; he gave at his death to his eldest son Loecine, all the land on this side Humber, and called it Loegria; to his second son Allbanath, all the land beyond Humber, of whom it was called Albania, (now Scotland: ) and to his youngest son Camber, all the land beyond the river of Severne, of whom it was called Cambria, (now Wales: ) with other such stuff, which may please children, but not ripper Judgements; and were first broached by Geoffrey Archdeacon of Monmouth: for which all the Writers of this time cryed shame upon him; and yet can scarce keep many at this day, from giving credit to his Fictions. This Geoffrey of Monmouth (afterward made, by the favour of King Stephen, Bishop of Asaph) lights upon a book written in Welch, and brought out of Wales by Walter Archdeacon of Exeter of the British affairs, and translated by Geoffrey, in which, though there were many notable passages, that might give much light to our History, yet so many commentitious Fables were inferred, that they rendred even what truths he writ suspected.

And when we are once gotten out of Fables, and come to some truth; yet that truth is delivered in such slender draughts, and such broken pieces, that very little benefit can be gotten by the knowing it, and was not till the time of Julius Caesar, a thousand years after the Fable of Brute: at which time, the Island was yet but in manner of a Village, being without Walls, as having no shipping, (which are indeed the true Walls of an Island) but only certain small vessels, made of boards and wicker. And as they had no ships for defence without, so neither had they any Forts, for defence within: scarce any houses but such as were made of stakes and boughs of trees fastened together; neither was it yet come to be a Kingdom, but was governed by a number of petty Rulers: so as Kent only had in it (as Caesar calleth them) four Kings; Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax: which division, as it made the Britains the more ealie to be conquered, so it made the Romans the longer in conquering. For if they had been one united body, one or two battails might have made a conquest of the whole; where being thus divided, there was need to be as many battails as there were divisions: So as it was many years, before the Romans could conquer the whole Island; even from the time of Julius Caesar, to the time of the Emperour Domitian; not much less than two hundred years. It is true, after Caesar's first coming, the Island grew sensible of this defect of their division, and thereupon by consent of a great part, made choice of Cassibelan, King of the Trinovants, who had his seat at Verulam, to be General of their wars; which made indeed some little stop to the Romans proceedings; but after the loss of a battail or two, they fell again into a relapse of their former defect, and thought it better to secure every one his own, by his own means, then by a general power, to hazard all at once; whereby it came afterward to be true: Nulli singuli pugnanti, universi vincuntur. Yet before the Countrey could be wholly conquered; at first by reason of the Nations valour, seeking to keep themselves free, and afterward by reason of the insolvency of the garrison Souldiers, that sought to make them slaves: many great oppositions were made, amongst which the most memorable was that of Podicia, a certain Queen of the Countrey, who having been by the Roman Souldiers her self abused, and her daughters ravished, used means to leavy an Army of sixscore thousand men, whom she led her self into the field, and set upon the Romans in their chief Towns, which were London, Verulam, and Camalodunum (now Malden in Essex: ) of whom she slew above seventy thousand: but then in a second battail, had fourscore thousand of her own Army slain, after which defeat, for avoiding of slavery, she poysoned her self.

This Island for a long time, was so much esteemed of the Romans, that their Emperours sometimes came hither in person; as first the Emperour Adrian, in the year 124. who reedified that great wall between England, first made by Agricola, Nero's General in Britain, and father in law to Tacitus the famous Historian. Adrian having set the Countrey in order returned: the same wall was again repaired by Severus the Emperour in the year 212. who came over into Britain to repress the Incurfions of the Picts and Scots, by whom in a battail near York, he was wounded and thereof dyed; or as others say, he died of age and sickness. Afterward in the year 305. Constantinus the Emperour came into Britain, and ended his life at York, making that City famous for the death and burial of two great Emperours; and yet more famous for the honour done to Constantine the Great, son of Constantinus, who in that City was first saluted Emperour. But notwithstanding the great estimation the Romans a long time made of this Island, yet at last, after five hundred years they had kept it in subjection, they voluntarily left it: the charge of keeping it, being greater then the benefit; for to keep it in subjection, they maintained no fewer than fourscore thousand Souldiers in pay; and when wars grew amongst themselves at home, they could no longer spare so many abroad, but recalled them home: but then, though they left Britain, yet they left not the Britains, but carried them, at least, a great part of them away with them; of whom the most were slain in their service, and the rest planted in that part of France, which of them was afterward, and is to this day, called Britain. And now one would think, the Island should be in good case, being freed from them that kept them in subjection, but it proved to be in worse case being at liberty, then it was before in servitude; for being deprived of their ablest men, and at the same time, their King Lucius happening to die without issue, they were left as a few loose sticks without the bond of a Governour: which the Picts and

Scots.

How long the Romans were in conquering England.

Julius Caesar invading England, Cassibelan resists him.

The Emperour Constantinus comes into England.

The Romans leave England, and why.

Scots observing, thought now was the time to make the Countrey their own; and thereupon made Invasions upon it with all their Forces. Whereupon the Britains having none left of their Native Kings to succed; and knowing they could ill manage the Body of an Army without a Head, they make choice of Vortigern Earl of Cornwal, one extracted from the British Line, to be their King: and he, whether so advised by his Cabinet Counsellor, the Propheticall Aderlin, or as finding his own strength too weak to make resistance; implores first aid of the Romans, and they making answer, they had business enough to do of their own, and leaving them to themselves, he then fled to the Saxons for aid, a warlike people of Germany, and who had greater swarms then their hives could well hold.

And here we may plainly see how dangerous a thing it is for a Nation, to call in strangers to their aid, and especially in any great number; for though they come at first but Mercenaries, yet once admitted, and finding their own strength, they soon grow Masters; as here it proved with the Saxons.

These Saxons were Infidels, and brought in with them diversity of Idols, after whose names they gave appellations to the several dayes of the week. Adoring the Sun, they named the first day Sunday or Sunday. The second Monday, from an Idol which ridiculously represented the Moon. Another god they had called Tuisco, and to him they appointed the third day, naming it Tuesday. The tradition is, that this Tuisco was the son of Afcenez Grandchild to Japhet, and that he conducted their fore-fathers out of Asia into Europe from the unfinished Tower of Babel. The next Idol which they adored for a god, was Woden, representing an Armed man, and they named the fourth day from him Woden-day or Wednesday; they honoured him as the god of battail. He had been a famous and victorious Prince amongst them, and of him lineally descended Hengist and Horsa their first leaders into this Island. Not only our Saxons, but all the Septentrional Nations adored and sacrificed to Thor, a Statue resembling a crowned King, his head encompassed with twelve bright golden Stars, of whom they denominated the fifth day Thursday. Friday took the name of Friga an Idol representing both Sexes, with a bow in one hand, and a sword in the other; and though the Statue exprest an Hermaphrodite, yet she was generally reputed a Goddess. Then they had a god called Seater, and to him they consecrated Saturday: this Idol was like an old man with a long beard and hair, bare headed and bare footed. Such was the Religion of the Saxons; which giveth us occasion before we treat further of their coming in, to say something of the state of the Christian Church in this Island. First then, it is recorded, that in the year 63. what time Arviragus reigned here, Joseph of Arimathea (who buried the body of Christ) came into this Island, and laid the foundation of the Christian Faith in the Western parts, at a place called then Thurde, now Glastenbury; and that there came with him Mary Magdalen, Lazarus, and Martha: and more then this, that Simon Zelotes one of the Apostles suffered martyrdom here in Britain: and more then this, that both St. Peter and St. Paul came into this Island and preached the Gospel; all which and more to this purpose, is recorded by Authors of good account: though it be hard believing, That persons, and specially women of so great age, as these must needs be at this time, should take so long a journey. But howsoever it was, certain it is, that the Doctrine of Christianity was about this time planted in this Island, though it made afterward but small progress, and that with some persecution; as in which time, St. Alban suffered martyrdom at Verulam, and at Liechfield shortly after, no fewer then a thousand. After this in the year 180. what time Lucius was King of this Island, Eleutherius then Bishop of Rome, sent Paganus and Damianus to him: upon whose preaching, the Temples of the Heathenish Flamins and Archflamins (one and thirty in number) were converted to so many Bishops Sees; whereof London, York, and Caeleyn (now St. Davids) were made the Metropolitans of the Province. And there is a Table remaining at this day, in the Parish Church of St. Peter, on Cornhill, London, which Recordeth, that the Foundation thereof was laid by this King Lucius, and that this Church was the Cathedral to that Archbishop Sec. In the year 359. a Council was holden at Ariminum in Italy; where six hundred Western Bishops were assembled, whereof three went out of Britain, and though they were Orthodoxal, and with that Synod determined to give their voyces against the Arian Heresie, yet by reason all these Western Fathers were ignorant in the Greek Language, they were circumvented by the Arian Bishops, and unanimously they would have Christ, but not Homousion. After this, about the year 420, rose up in this Island, one Pelagius a Monk, brought up in the Monastery of Bangor in Wales, who spread the poyson of his Heresie, first in this his Native Countrey, and afterward all the world over. And these had been the chief passages in matters Ecclesiastical within this Island, when the Saxons were called in, about the year 450.

And now under the conduct of two brothers, Hengist and Horsa, came over nine thousand Saxons with their Wives and Children, to assist the Britains against the Scots, and were appointed the Isle of Thanet to inhabit. With which assistance, the Britains give their enemies battail, and overcome them: so as they accounted the Saxons as Angels sent from Heaven, and then allowed them Kent also for their inhabiting. Not long after Hengist obtained of King Vortigern the property of so much ground, as he could enclose with a Buls hide: which cutting into thongs, he there built the Castle, Fili de nomine, called Thong Castle. And now having built it, he invites Vortigern to a Feast, who there fell in love with Rownena, the Daughter or rather the Niece of Hengist; For when Hengist first arrived in Britain he was but 30 years of age: howsoever Vortigern marrying this fair Lady, put Hengist into such a height of boldness, that he began to aspire, tending for greater Forces to come over to him; as meaning to transplant himself hither, and to make this Island his Inheritance: which the British Lords perceiving, and not able to wean their King from his new Wife, and her father Hengist, they Depose him; and in his place set up his Son Vortimer, a true lover of his Country: who presently in a pitched battail near unto Aylesford in Kent, set upon the Saxons; where Cartigern the brother of Vortimer, and Horsa, of Hengist, in single fight hand to hand slew each other. In which place Catigern was buried, and a Monument in memory of him erected, the stones whereof at this day are standing in a great plain in the Parish of Aylesford; which in stead of Catigern, is corruptly called Kits-Cotthouse. Another like Monument was erected for Horsa, though now defaced; remembered only by the Town where it stood, called Horsehead. Three other battails after this, were fought between the Britains and the Saxons: one at Craford; another at Weppestfleete; the third upon Colmore: in which last, the Britains got so great a Victory, that the Saxons were clean driven out of Kent, and Thanet also not suffered to rest; so as shortly after, Hengist with his Saxons departed the Kingdom, as being now out of hope to make his fortune in this Island. But while Vortimer was thus intentive for his Countreys liberty; Rowena the former Kings Wife, being daughter to Hengist, was as intensive to bring it into servitude; which knowing he could not do as long as Vortimer lived, she used means by poysen, to take away his life, after he had been King the space of four years, and then by the witchcraft of fair words, so enchanted the British Nobility, that her Husband Vortigern was again established in the Kingdom; which was no sooner done, but Hengist, (relying upon his Son Vortigerns love) with a mighty Army attempts to return again into the Island; when being resisted, he makes a shew, as if he desired nothing but to fetch away his daughter Rowena, and to have a friendly conference for continuance of amity: which motion seeming reasonable, a place and time of conference was appointed: the time upon the first of May; the place upon the Plain of Ambrii, now called Salisbury; whither the plain-meaning Britains came unarmed, according to agreement; but the fraudulent Saxons under their long Cassocks had short keynes hidden, with which upon a watch-word given, they set upon the Britains, and of their unarmed Nobility slew three, some say five hundred, and took the King himself prisoner, whom they would not release, till they were put in possession of these four Countries, Kent, Sussex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. Whereupon Vortigern, whether fearing a second Deposing, or whether to advised by his Cabinet Counsellour the Prophetical Merlin, betook himself into Wales, and there built him a strong Castle for his safeguard; while the Saxons coming daily in great swarms into the Land, had at this time over-run all, if Aurelius Ambrosius a Roman born, but affected to the British Nation, had not landed at Tolnes in Devonshire, to whom reformed great troops of Britains. His first expedition was against Vortigern, (as the first cause of the Britains misery) whose Castle he besieged; and whether by wild fire, or by fire from Heaven, both he and his Castle, and all that were in it, were burnt to ashes. To this Ambrosius is ascribed the admirable Monument in Wiltshire, now called Stonehenge, in the place where the Britains had been treacherously slaughtered and interred; and of whom the Town of Ambersbury bears its name. After this he set upon the Saxons, and in many battails discomfited them; till at last falling sick in the City of Winchester, a Saxon, in shew a Britain, and in habit a Physician, was sent unto him, who in stead of Phyllick, ministred poysen, whereof he died, in the year 497. after he had reigned two and thirty years.

After Ambrosius, succeeded Meris (some say his brother, others a Britain) called Pendragon, of his Royal Banner born ever before him; wherein was portrayed a Dragon with a golden Head, as in our English Camps it is at this day born for the Imperial standard. And he also in many battails discomfited the Saxons, till after eighteen years Reign he came to his end by treachery; dying by poysen put into a Well, whereof he usually drank, in the year 515.

After him succeeded his Son Arthur, begotten of the fair Lady Igren, Wife of the Duke of Cornwall, to whose bed the Art of Merlin brought him in the likeness of her husband: and he in twelve set battails discomfited the Saxons; but in one most memorable, in which girding himself with his Sword called Calibourn, he flew upon his Enemies, and with his own hand slew eight hundred of them; which is but one of his wonderful deeds, whereof there are so many reported, that he might well be reckoned amongst the Fabulous, if there were not enough to give them credit. Amongst other his Acts, he instituted the Order of Knights of the Round Table, to the end there might be no question about Precedence, and to teach Heroical minds, not to stand upon Place, but Merit. But this great Prince, for all his great valour, was at last in battail wounded, whereof he dyed, in the year 522. after he had reigned six and twenty years.

After King Arthur succeeded his Cousin Constantine; and after his three years reign, Aurelius Conanus the Nephew of King Arthur, whose reign is uncertain, that some say, he reigned only two, some, three years, some again thirty, and some, three and thirty. After Conanus succeeded Vortiporus, who after many Victories against the Saxons, and four years Reign, dyed. After whom succeeded Malgus Conanus, and reigned six years. After him Caretiens, who setting upon the Saxons and beaten, fled into the Town of Chichester, whereupon the Saxons catching certain Sparrows and fastening fire to their feet, let them flee into the Town, where lighting upon straw, and other matter apt to take fire, the whole City in short space was burnt; and thereupon Caretiens flying, secured himself among the Mountains of Wales, where he died, after he had unprosperously reigned three years: and from that time forth, the Britains lost their whole Kingdom in the East part of the Island, and were confined in the West by the Rivers Severn and

A and Deo. After Caretiens succeeded Cadwan, who reigned two and twenty years. After him his Son Cadwallo, who reigned eight and forty years, and then died; whose body was buried in St. Martins Church near Ludgate, and his Image of brass placed upon the same gate, for a terror to the Saxons. In his time the Doctrine of Mahomet began to spread it self all the Eastern World over. After Cadwallo, succeeded his son Cadwaladar; in whose time so great a Famine, and afterward Mortality happened, continuing eleven years, that the Land became in a manner desolate: inasmuch, that the King and many of his Lords were driven to forsake their native Country, and Cadwaladar himself went to his Cousin Alan King of little Britain, in France. At which time the Saxons taking advantage of his absence, came over in swarms, and dispossessed the forlorn Britains of all they had, and divided the Land amongst themselves. B whereupon Cadwaladar, obtaining assistance from his Cousin Alan, was coming over to restrain their insolencies; when making prayers to God for good success, an Angel appeared to him, or at the least to his seeming he heard a voice, that forbade him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will, the Britains should rule this Land any longer; and therefore bad him lie him to Rome, and receive of Pope Sergius the habit of Religion, wherein he should die and rest in peace; which accordingly he did: and in him ended the blood of the British Kings, in the year 689. So as Britain now was no longer Britain, but a Colony of the Saxons.

And now is time to speak of the Heptarchy of the Saxons, so much spoken of by all Writers; and to shew by what degrees the Britains lost, and the Saxons got the whole possession of this Island: for this Heptarchy or division of this Island into seven Kingdoms, came not in, all at once, nor yet in an equal partition, but some good distance of time, one after another, and as the Invader had strength to expel the Natives.

The first Kingdom being of KENT.

The first Kingdom of the Saxons began by Hengist, in the year 455. containing all Kent, and continued 372 years, during the Reigns of seventeen Kings, of whom as many as performed any memorable Act, shall be remembered, and for the rest, it will be no loss to pass them over in silence. Of these seventeen Kings, Ethelbert being the fifth, was the first Saxon Christian King of this Island, converted by Austin the Monk, whom Pope Gregory sent hither to that purpose, with forty others, in the year 596. to whom King Ethelbert gave his chief City of Canterbury, and his own Royal Palace there, made since the Cathedral of that See; withdrawing himself to Reculver in the Isle of Thanet, where he erected a Palace for himself and his successors. He gave him also an old Temple, standing without the East wall of the City, which he honoured with the name of St. Pancras, and then added a Monastery to it, and dedicated it to St. Peter and Paul, appointing it to be the place of the Kentish Kings Sepulchres. But in regard of Austin the procurer, both Pancras, Peter, and Paul were soon forgotten, and it was, and is to this day called St. Austins, which Abbey St. Austin enriched with divers Reliques which he brought with him from Rome; amongst which was a part of Christs seemless Coat, and of Ansons Rod. This King after his own conversion, converted also Sebert King of the East Angles, and assisted him in the building of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London; as also the Church of St. Peter, on the west of London, then called Thorny: and himself at Rockesfer built the Cathedral Church there, which he dedicated to the Apostle St. Andrew; and dying, when he had reigned six and fifty years, was buried at Canterbury. And thus by this first Saxon Kingdom, was all Kent lopped off from the Britains Dominion; and this was the first impairing, and this happened in the Reign of Ambrosius before spoken of. The sixth King of Kent was Ethelwald; who at first an Apostate, was afterwards converted, and built a Chappel within the Monastery of St. Peter and Paul at Canterbury. The seventh King was Ercombert, a virtuous and religious Prince, who first commanded the observing of Lent; and in his daies, the Archbishop Honorius divided Kent into Parishes. The eighth King was Egbert, who obtained the Kingdom by murdering his Nephews: whose sister the Lady Dopnena, founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent. The eleventh King was Withred, who founded the Priory of Merton at Dover. The last was Baldred, who overcome by Egbert King of the West Saxons, left Kent a Province to that Kingdom, in the year 827.

The second Kingdom being of the South SAXONS.

The second Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the South Saxons, and began by Ella, in the year 488. containing Sussex and Surrey, and continued 113 years, during the Reign of five Kings only, of whom Cissa being the second founded the City of Chichester, and reigned as some say, threescore and sixteen years. And then Bertham being the last King, was overcome by Ine King of the West Saxons, and his Countrey became a Province of that Kingdom, dom, in the year 601. and thus as Kent before, so now Suffex and Surrey were lopped off from the Britains Dominion : and this was a second impairing, which also happened in the Reign of the British King Ambrosius.

The third Kingdom being of the West SAXONS.

THe third Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the West Saxons, and began by Cerdic, in the year 519. containing Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, and continued 561 years, during the Reigns of nineteen Kings, of whom this Cerdic was the first : in whose time Porth a Saxon landed in the West, at a place from him called afterward Portsmouth, and aided Cerdic in his conquest. And this happened in the Reign of King Arthur : and as Kent, Suffex, and Surrey before, so now these seven other shires were lopped off from the Britains Dominion : and this was a third impairing. The sixth King of the West Saxons was Kingils, who was the first Christian King of this Kingdom, converted by Berinus an Italian Divine, to whom he gave the City of Dorchester, near to Oxford ; who therein erected his Episcopal See. The seventh King was Kenwald, who at first an Apostata, was afterward converted, and founded the Cathedral of Winchester, and the Abbey of Malmesbury ; whose Wife Seaburg also built a house of Devotion in the Isle of Sheppy, wherein her self became a Nun, and was afterward elected Abbess of Ely. The eleventh King was Ine, who ordained many good Laws, which are yet extant in the Saxon tongue, and are translated into Latine, by the learned Master William Lambert. This King built a Colledge at Wels bearing the name of St. Andrews, which afterward King Kenulph made an Episcopal See. He also, in most stately manner new built the Abbey of Glastenbury ; and out of his devotion to the See of Rome, he enjoyed every one of his Subjects, that possessed in his house of any one kind of goods to the value of nineteen pence, to pay yearly upon Lammas day, one penny to the Pope ; which at first was contributed under the name of the Kings Almes, but afterward was paid by the name of Peter Pence. At last he went to Rome, and there took upon him the habit of Religion, and therein died. His Wife also became a veiled Nun, and afterward was made Abbess of Barking near London. The thirteenth King was Cuthred, who first permitted the bodies of the dead to be buried within the Walls of their Cities, which before were used to be buried in the fields. The fourteenth was Sigebert, who for his cruelty and exactions, was by his Subjects forced to flee into the Woods, to hide himself, where by a Swine-herd he was slain. The fifteenth was Kenulph, who founded the Cathedral Church of St. Andrews at Wels, and was afterward slain by Kynward, whom he had banished. The sixteenth King was Birchric, whose Queen Ethelburg, having prepared a poyson for another, the King chanced to taste it, and thereof died : In fear of which chance the Queen fled into France ; where Charles the then King, for her excellent beauty, offered her the choice of himself or his Son in marriage : but she out of her lustful humour chooling the Son, was thereupon debar'd of both, and thrust into a Monastery, where committing adultery, she was driven from thence, and ended her life in great misery. For her sake the West Saxons ordained a Law, that no Kings Wife should hereafter have the Title or Majesty of a Queen, which for many years after was severely executed. It is memorable which is recorded of a King in these parts, named Waxmund, and was the founder of Warwick Town : that he had a Son named Offa, tall of stature, and of a good constitution of body, but blind, till he was seven years old, and then saw ; and dumb till he was thirty years old, and then spake.

The fourth Kingdom of the East SAXONS.

THe fourth Kingdom of the Heptarchy, was of the East Saxons, and began by Erchemyn, in the year 527. containing Essex and Middlesex, and continued 281 years, during the Reigns of fourteen Kings ; of whom the third was Sebert, who first built the Cathedral of St. Paul London, which had formerly been the Temple of Diana : He likewise founded the Church of St. Peter in the West of London, at a place called Thorney, where sometime stood the Temple of Apollo, which being overthrown by an earthquake, King Lucius new built for the service of God ; and that again being decayed, this King restored to a greater beauty, and with his Queen Athelgarda was there buried. The ninth King was Sebba, who after thirty years peaceable Reign relinquished the Crown, and took upon him a Religious habit, in the Monastery of St. Paul London ; where dying, his body was intombed in a Coffin of gray Marble, the cover coped, and as yet standeth in the North wall of the Chancel of the same Church. The twelfth was Offa, famous for the beauty of his countenance, who both enlarged with buildings, and enriched with lands the Church of Westminster, and after eight years reign went to Rome, and was there shorn a Monk, and in that habit died. The fourteenth was Suthred, whom Egbert King of the West Saxons subdued, and made his Kingdom a Province to his own. And thus besides the former Shires, these two also were lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and this was a fourth impairing.

The

The fifth Kingdom being of NORTHUMBERLAND.

THe fifth Kingdom was of Northumberland (so called because it lay North from the river Humber) and began by Ella and Ida, in the year 547. Containing Yorkshire, Durham, Lancashire, Westmerland, Cumberland, and Northumberland, and continued 370 years, during the Reigns of three and twenty Kings, of whom nothing is recorded of the two first, but that they builded the Castle of Bamburg. The seventh King was Ethelfryd, who at Caerlegion (now Weschester) made a slaughter of twelve hundred Christian Monks, and was himself afterward slain by Redwald King of the East Angles. The thirteenth King was Ofred, whose Wife Cuthburga, out of a loathing weariness of wedlock, sued out a divorce from her husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburne in Dorsetshire, where in a religious habit she ended her life. The sixteenth King was Cednulp, who after eight years reign, left his Royal robes, and put on the habit of a Monk, in the Isle of Lindesferne or Holy Island. Unto this King the Venerable Bede, a Saxon and a Priest in the Monastery of Peter and Paul at Wor-mouth near to Durham, Dedicated his work of the English History, which he continued from the first entrance of the Saxons into this Island, to the year 731. containing after his own account 285. years. The seventeenth King was Egbert, who after twenty years reign, forsook the world also, and shored himself a Monk ; whose brother being Archbishop of York, erected a notable Library there, and stored it with an infinite number of learned Books. The last King was Ofwald, after whom this Kingdom yielded to the protection of Egbert King of the West Saxons, who was now in the year 926. become absolute Monarch of the whole Island. And thus by the erection of his fifth Kingdom, were the six Northern shires lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and this was a fifth impairing.

The sixth Kingdom being of MERCIA.

THe sixth Kingdom was of Mercia, and began in Crida, in the year 522. containing Huntington, Rutland, Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwickshire, Leicester, Northampton, Derbyshire, Oxfordshire, Cheshire, Shropshire, Glocestershire, Staffordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Harifordshire, and continued 220 years, during the Reigns of twenty Kings ; eight of whom in a continued succession kept the Imperial Crown of the Heptarchy : for though others Reigned as Kings in their own Territories, yet among them ever one was the supreme head of the rest, and was called King of Engle-land, till Edgar the West Saxon brought them all into one. The fifth of these Kings of Mercia was Penda, who was the first Christian King of the Mercians, and laid the foundation of the fair Church at Mede-shamstead, now called Peterborough. The seventh King was Ethelred, who reigned thirty years, and then gave over the Crown, and became a Monk in the Monastery of Bradney in Lincolnshire, where in the year 716. he died. The eighth King was Kenned, who after four years Reign went to Rome, where he took upon him the habit of a Monk, and after other four years died. The tenth King was Ethelbald, who at first was given to much lasciviousness of life, but being reprehended for it by Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, was so far converted that he founded the Monastery of Crowland, driving in mighty piles of Oake into that Marshy ground, where he laid a great and goodly building of stone ; and after two and forty years Reign, was slain in a battail by Cuthred King of the West Saxons. The eleventh King was Offa, who greatly enlarged his Dominions ; reigned nine and thirty years, and founded the Monastery of St. Albans. The thirteenth King was Kenulph, who reigned two and twenty years, and founded the Monastery of Winchcombe in the County of Glocester, where his body was interred. The eighteenth King was Witlafe, who overcome by Egbert King of the West Saxons, held his Countrey afterward as his substitute and Tributary, acknowledging Egbert as now the sole Monarch of this Island. And by erection of this Mercian Kingdom, were seventeen shires more lopped off from the Britains Dominion, and was a sixth and a great impairing, so as now they were driven into a narrow room.

The seventh Kingdom being the East ANGLES.

THe seventh Kingdom was of the East Angles, and began by Uffa, in the year 575. containing Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and the Isle of Ely, and continued 353 years during the Reign of fifteen Kings, of whom the fifth was Sigebert, who first brought the light of the Gospel into his Dominions, and built a School for education of youth, whether at Oxford or Cambridge, is left a Quere ; and after three years reign shored himself a Monk in the Abbey of Camelburg, which himself had built : but being afterward violently drawn from thence by his Subjects the East Angles, to resist the Mercian King Penda, and refusing to sue use any other weapon but only a white wand, was in a battail by him slain. The seventh King was Anna, who after thirteen years Reign, was also slain by Penda the Mercian King. This King Anna was memorable chiefly for the holiness of his children, of whom his Son Erkenwald was Bishop of London, and built the Abbey of Barking near London. His eldest daughter Etheldrid was twice married, and yet continued a Virgin still, and at last became a Nun, and is remembered to posterity by the name of St. Audrie. His second daughter named Sexburg, his third named Ethelburg, his fourth (a natural daughter) named Withburg, all entered into Monasteries, and are Canonized all for Saints. The fourteenth King was Ethelbert, a learned and religious Prince, who being invited by Offa the Mercian King to marry Elfrid his daughter, came for that purpose to Offa's Court, then seated at Sutton Walls, in the County of Hereford, and there by him was cruelly murdered: In whose memorial notwithstanding, he afterward built a fair Church at Hereford, the Cathedral of that See, as though he could expiate a murder of the living, by a Monument to the dead, and were not rather a Monument of his own impiety. The fifteenth King was Edmund, who assaulted by the Danes for his possessions, was more assaulted for his profession: for continuing constant in his Christian Faith, those Pagans first beat him with bats, then scourged him with whips, and lastly bound him to a stake, and with their arrows shot him to death; whose body was buried at the Town where Sigebert the East Anglian King, one of his Predecessors had built a Church, and where afterward (in honour of him) was built another most spacious, of a wonderful frame of Timber, and the name of the Town upon the occasion of his burial there, called to this day St. Edmundsbury. This Church and place, Suenus the Danish King burnt to ashes: but when his Son Canutus had gotten possession of the English Crown, terrified with a Vision of the seeming St. Edmund; in a religious devotion to expiate his Fathers sacrilege, he built it anew most sumptuously, and offered his own Crown upon the Martyrs Tomb. After the death of this Edmund, the East Angles Country was possessed by the Danes, and so continued the space of fifty years, until that Edmund surnamed the Elder, expelled those Danes, and made that Kingdom a Province to the West Saxons.

By that which hath been said, it plainly appears, by what degrees the Britains lost, and the Saxons got the whole possession of this Island. For after that Vortigern, in the year 455, had called in the Saxons, every Britain King that succeeded him, lost some part or other of it to the Saxons, till at the last in the year 689, Cadwallader the last Britain King lost all; and then the Saxon Kings striving amongst themselves for sovereignty, they still gained one upon another, till at last in the year 818, Egbert King of the West Saxons reduced them all under his subjection, and then caused all the South of the Island to be called England, according to the Angles of whom himself came; after whom they were no longer properly called Saxon Kings, but Kings of England, and so continued till the Danes in the year 1017, made an interruption; of whose succession now comes the time to speak.

Of the Saxons that Reigned sole Kings of this Island, and may properly be called English Kings.

Egbert the eighteenth King of the west Saxons, is now become the first of the Kings of England, in whose time the Danes began first to infect the Land; as thinking they might do as much against the Saxons, as the Saxons had done against the Britains; but though they made divers Invasions, and did great spoil, yet they were still repelled. This King reigned six and thirty years, and died in the year 836, was buried at Winchester. Of his issue, his daughter Edith was made Governess of a Monastery of Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her brother had given her, called Polleworth, situate in Arden, in the North part of the County of Warwick, where she died and was buried, and the place in memory of her called St. Ediths of Polleworth.

To Egbert succeeded his son Ethelwolph, who in his youth was so addicted to a Religious life, that he was first made Deacon; and after Bishop of Winchester; but his Father dying, he was intreated by his people to take upon him the Crown, and by Pope Gregory the fourth, was to that end absolved of his Vow. His reign was infected with many and great invasions of the Danes, to whom notwithstanding he gave incredible overthrows. In the time of his reign, remembering his former religious profession, he ordained that riches & lands due to the holy Church, should be free from all Tribute or Regal services, and in great devotion went himself to Rome, where he lived a year; confirmed the grant of Peter pence, and agreed besides to pay yearly to Rome three hundred marks. Returning home through France, and being a Widower, he there married Judith, the beautiful daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperour; in honour of whom in his own Court, he ever placed her in a chair of Estate, with all other Majestical complements of a Queen, contrary to the Law of the West Saxons formerly made; which so much displeased his Lords, that for it they were ready to depose him; but howsoever he lived not long after, having reigned one and twenty years. His youngest son Notho was much addicted to learning, and was one of the Divinity readers in the University of Oxford, and founded a Monastery in Cornwall, which of him was called Nothestock; and being dead, his body was interred in the County of

Huntington,

A Huntington, at a place then called Armphsbury, and afterward, in regard of his interment, St. Nees, and now St. Needes. This King was famous for having four Sons, all of them were Kings of this Land successively.

First after him reigned his eldest Son Ethelbald, in the year 857, who to his eternal shame, took to wife Judith his Fathers Widow, reigned about two years, and dying, was buried at Shirborn in Dorsetshire, at that time the Episcopall See. From this Judith, married afterward to the Earl of Flanders, after divers descents, came Maud the Wife of William the Conquerour, from whom are descended all our Kings ever since.

Next to the eldest reigned his second Son Ethelbert, all whose reign, which was only five years, was perpetually disquieted with Invasions of the Danes, which yet were at last repelled. He died in the year 866, and was buried at Shirborn in Dorsetshire.

B Next to the second reigned his third Son Ethelred, whose reign was more disquieted with the Danes then any other before: for they invading the Land, under the leading of Hungar, and Hubba, spoiled all the Country as they went, not sparing religious places; amongst other, the goodly Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborough, Ely, and Huntington, they laid level with the ground: the Monks and Nuns they murdered or ravished: at which time a rare example of Chastity and Fortitude was seen in the Nuns of Coldingham: For to avoid the barbarous pollutions of these Pagans, they deformed themselves by cutting off their upper lips and noses. Nine battails in one year, this King fought with the Danes, in most of them victorious; but at last received a wound whereof he died, and was buried in the Church at Winborn in Dorsetshire.

C Next to the third reigned his fourth Son Alfred, in whose time came over greater swarms of Danes then ever before, and had now got footing in the North, the West, and South parts of this Island, leaving this King nothing of all his great Monarchy, but only Somerset, Hampton, and Wilshire; and not these neither altogether free, so that he was forced sometimes to flee into the Fens and Marsh grounds to secure himself, where he lived by Fishing and Fowling, and hunting of wilde Beasts, till at last learning policy from adversity, and gathering courage from misery, he ventured in the habit of a common Minter, to enter the Danes Camp; where having viewed the manner of their encamping, and observed their security, he returned back, shewing his Lords in what condition he found them: whereupon setting upon them at unawares, he not only made of them a great slaughter, but brought upon them a greater terror: for presently upon this the Danes sue for peace, and deliver Hostages for performance of these conditions; that their King should receive Baptism, and their great Army depart quietly out of the Land. But though upon this agreement they departed for the present into France, yet the year following they returned with greater Forces, foraging all parts of the Country in most cruel manner, though still encountered by this Valourous Prince, till he ended his life in the year 901, after he had reigned nine and twenty years. The virtues of this King, if they were not incredible, they were at least admirable, whereof these may be instances. The day and night containing four and twenty hours, he designed equally to three special uses, observing them by the burning of a Taper for in his Chappel; (there being at that time, no other way of distinguishing them) Eight hours he spent in Contemplation, Reading, and Prayers: eight in provision for himself, his health and recreation, and the other eight in the affairs of the Common-wealth and State. His Kingdom likewise he divided into Shires, Hundreds and Tythings; ordaining that no man might remove out of his Hundred without security: by which course he so suppressed Thieves and Robbers, which had formerly encreased by the long wars, that it is said a boy or girl might openly carry a bag of gold or silver, and carry it safely all the Country over. Besides his great piety, he was also learned; and as far as it might be a commendation in a Prince, a skilful Musician and excellent Poet. All former Laws he caused to be surveyed, and made choice of the best, which he translated into the English tongue; as also the Pastoral of St. Gregory, the History of Bede and Boetius his consolation of Philosophy; the Palms of David likewise he began to translate, but died before he could finish it. And so great a love he had to learning, that he made a Law, that all Freeman of the Kingdom, possessing two Hides of Land, should bring up their Sons in learning, till they were fifteen years of age at least, that so they might be trained to know God, to be men of understanding, and to live happily. His buildings were many, both for Gods service, and for other publick use: as at Edlinsy a Monastery, at Winchester a new Minister, and at Shaftesbury a house of Nuns; whereof he made his Daughter Ethelgeda the Abbess; but his foundation of the University of Oxford, exceeded all the rest: which he began in the year 895, and to furnish it with able Scholars, drew thither out of France, Grimwaldus and Scotus, and out of Wales, Asser, (who wrote his life) whose Lectures he honoured often with his own presence: And for a stock of Frugality, he made a Survey of the Kingdom; and had all the particulars of his Estate registred in a Book; which he kept in his Treasury at Winchester. He reigned seven and twenty years, and dying was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Peter at Winchester, though removed afterward into the Church of the new Monastery, without the North-gate of the City called Hyde. His Wife Elfwith, founded a Monastery of Nuns at Winchester, and was there buried. Their second daughter Ethelgeda, took upon her the Vow of Virginity; and by her Fathers appointment was made a Nun of Shaftesbury, in the County of Dorset, in the Monastery founded there by him, who is also accounted the founder of the Town itself.

King

King Alfred being deceased, his Son Edward (called Edward the Elder) succeeded: not so A Learned as his Father; but in Valour his Equal, and Superiour in Fortune: For first he overcame his Cousin Ethelwald, who aspired to the Crown; then the Danes, whose chief Leader he slew in battail; lastly the Welch; but these last more by humility shewed to their Prince Leolyn, then by force of Arms. But yet he must not have all the glory of his time: some must be imparted to his Sister Elfrida; who being married to Ethelred Earl of Mercia, had by him a Daughter, but with so grievous pains in her travail, that ever after she refused the nuptial bed of her Husband, saying, it was a foolish pleasure that brought with it so excessive pains: And thereupon after her husbands death, made choice to follow the wars; assisting her Brother both against the Welsh, and against the Danes, whom she brought to be at her disposing. Dying she was buried at Glocester, in the Monastery of St. Peter, which her Husband and her self had built. King Edward himself, after four and twenty years reign, deceased at Faringdon in Barkshire, in the year 924. B and was buried in the new Monastery of Winchester, which his Father and himself wholly finished: having had by his three Wives, six Sons and nine Daughters, of whom his eldest Son Athelstan succeeded him in the Kingdom, whom his Grandfather King Alfred had with his own hands knighted, in an extraordinary manner; putting upon him a purple Robe, and girding him with a girdle wrought with Pearl. His second Son Elfred, he so loved, that he caused him to be Crowned King with himself, which yet he enjoyed but a short time, being taken away by death. His third Son Elfwald, presently upon his Fathers death, died himself also. His fourth Son Edwyn, was by his Brother Athelstan, out of jealousy of state, put into a little Pinnace, without either Tackle or Oars, accompanied only with one Page; with grief whereof, the young Prince leaped C into the Sea and drowned himself. His fifth, & his sixth Sons, Edmund, and Edred, came in succession to be Kings of England. Of his Daughters, the eldest Editha, was married to Sithricke the Danish King of Northumberland, and she deceasing, she entred into a Monastery, which she began at Tamworth in Warwickshire, and there died. His second Daughter Elfrida, took upon her the Vow of Virginitie, in the Monastery of Ramsay, in the County of Southampton, where she died and was interred. His third Daughter Egwinna, was first married to Charles the Simple, King of France, and after his decease, to Herbert Earl of Vermandois. His fourth Daughter Ethelheld, became a Nun in the Monastery of Wilton, which was sometime the head Town, giving name to the whole County of Wiltshire, and anciently called Eldandun. That we may see in those first times of Religion, when there was least knowledge, there was most devotion. His fifth Daughter D Edhold, was married to Hugh, surnamed the Great, Earl of Paris, and Constable of France. And Edgith his sixth Daughter to Otho, the Emperour of the West, surnamed the Great. His seventh Daughter Elgina, was married to a Duke of Italy. His ninth Edigna, to Lewis Prince of Aquitain in France.

After the death of King Edward, his eldest Son Athelstan succeeded, and was Crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, in the County of Surrey, by Athelmus Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 924. The beginning of whose Reign, was molested with the Treason of one Elfrid a Nobleman, who being apprehended and sent to Rome to purge himself, and there denying the Act upon his Oath, fell suddenly down, and within three dayes died, to the eternal terror of all perjured persons. Presently upon this, another disaster befel King Athelstan, for having E caused his Brother Edwyns death, (as before is shewed) chiefly procured by his Cup-bearers suggestions; it happened not long after, that his Cup-bearer, in his service at a Festival, stumbling with one foot, and recovering himself with the other, and saying merrily, See how our brother helps another; his words put the King in remembrance of his Brother, whose death he had caused, and with remorse thereof, not only caused his Cup-bearer to be put to death, but did also seven years penance: and built the two Monasteries of Middleton, and Michelneffe, in the County of Dorset, in expiation of his offence. This King ordained many good Laws; and those to bind as well the Clergy as the Laity; amongst which, one was the Attachment of Felons, that stole above twelve pence, and were above twelve years old. Of this King there is one Act related, that may seem ridiculous; another, that may seem miraculous; For what more ridiculous, then that, going to visit the Tomb of St. John of Beverly, and having nothing else of worth to offer, he offered his Knife in devotion to the Saint? Yet the miraculous is more apparent: For going to encounter the Danes, and praying to God for good success, he prayed withal, that God would shew some sign of his rightful cause, and thereupon striking with his sword, he struck it an ell deep into a hard stone, which stood so cloven a long time after: But whether this be true or no, this certainly is true, that he obtained many great victories against the Danes, against the Scots, against the Irish, & against the Welsh, whose Princes he brought to be his tributaries, entering Covenant at Hereford, to pay him yearly twenty pound weight of gold, three hundred of silver, and five and twenty hundred head of Cattel; besides a certain number of Hawks and Hounds. Lastly, he joynd Northumberland to the rest of his Monarchy, and enlarged his Dominions beyond any of his Predecessors: which made all neighbouring Princes to seek his friendship, and to gratifie him with rare presents, as Hugh King of France sent him the Sword of Constantine the Great, in the hilt whereof, was one of the nails which fastened Christ to his Cross; he sent him also the Spear of Charles the Great, reputed to be the same that pierced Christs side; as also part of the Cross whereon Christ suffered, and a piece of the Thorny Crown put upon his head. Likewise Otho the Emperour, who had married his Sister, sent him a vessel of precious stones, artificially made, wherein were seen Landscips with Vines, Corn and Men, F G

A all of them seeming so artificially to move, as if they were growing, and alive. Likewise the King of Norway sent him a goodly Ship, with a gilt Stern, purple sails, and the deck garnished all with gold. Of these accounted Holy Reliques, King Athelstan gave part to the Abbey of Saint Swithin in Winchester, and the rest to the Monastery of Malmesbury, whereof Adelm was the Founder, and his Tutelar Saint. He new built the Monasteries of Wilton, Michelneffe, and Middleton; Founded Saint Germans in Cornwall, Saint Petrocus at Bodmyn, and the Priory of Pilton; new walled and beautified the City of Excester, and enriched either with Jewels or Lands, every special Abbey of the Land. But the chiefest of his works for the service of God, and good of his Subjects, was the Translation of the Bible into the Saxon Tongue, which was then the Mother tongue of the Land. He reigned fifteen years, died at Glocester, and was buried at Malmesbury, in B the year 940. having never been married.

After the death of Athelstan, his brother Edmund, the fifth son of his Father, succeeded; and was Crowned at Kingstone upon Thames; but no sooner was the Crown set upon his head, but the Danes were upon his back; and in Northumberland made insurrections; whom yet he not only repressed in that part; but took from them the Towns of Lincoln, Leicester, Darby, Stafford, and Nottingham; compelling them withal to receive Baptism, and to become his Subjects, so as the Countrey was wholly his as far as Humber. Cumberland also, which had been an entire Kingdom of it self, and was now aided by Leolyn King of Southwales, he utterly waited and gave it Malcolm King of Scots, to hold of him by Fealty. After his returning home, he set himself to ordain Laws for the good of his People; which Matter Lambert hath since translated into C Latin. But after all his noble Acts both in War and Peace, he came at last to a lamentable end; for at this Manour of Pucklekerke, in the County of Glocester, interposing himself to part a fray between two of his servants, he was thrust through the body, and so wounded that he died, and was buried at Glastenbury, after he had reigned five years and seven moneths, leaving behind him two young Sons, Edwyn, and Edgar.

King Edmund dying, his brother Edred in the minority of his Nephews, was Crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 946. Not as Protector; (it seems that kind of authority was not yet come in use) but as King himself, though with purpose to resign, when the right Heir should come of age; which at this time needed not, for while the right Heir was scarce yet fourteen years old, he resigned to him the Kingdom, D by resigning his life to Nature, after he had twice repressed the rebelling Northumbrians, and twice forgiving their rebelling, which yet was not a limple rebellion; for they had sent for Anlaf the Dane out of Ireland, and made him their King; which place for four years he held; and then weary of his government, they thrust him out, and take one Horikum to be their King, whom not long after they put down also; and then partly allured by the lenity of King Edred, and partly forced by his Arms, they submit themselves to him, and ask forgiveness; to whom he as a merciful Prince, grants an Act of Oblivion, and received them again into protection. This Prince was so devout and humble, that he submitted his body to be chastised at the will of Dunstan Abbot of Glastenbury, and committed all his Treasure and Jewels to his custody. The lately Abbey of Mich at Abington near Oxford, built by King Inas, but destroyed by the Danes, he newly re-edified; endowing it with revenues and Lands, the Charters whereof he confirmed with seals of Gold. He ordained Saint Germans in Cornwall, to be a Bishops See, which there continued, till by Canutus it was annexed to the Episcopal See of Kyrtun in Devonshire; both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confessor, translated to the City of Excester. He left behind him two Sons, Elfred, and Bertfred, and was buried in the old Minster, without the City of Winchester, whose bones with other Kings, are to this day preserved in a gilt Coffin, fixed upon the wall, in the South side of the Quire.

After Edred, not any of his Sons, but his Nephew Edwyn, the eldest Son of King Edmund succeeded, and was anointed and Crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 955. This Prince, though scarce fourteen years old, and in age but a child, yet was able to commit sin as a man; For upon the very day of his Coronation, and in sight of his Lords, as they sat in Counsel, he shamefully abused a Lady of great Estate, and his near kinswoman; and to mend the matter, shortly after slew her husband; the more freely to enjoy his incestuous pleasure. And whether for this infamous fact, or for thrusting the Monks out of the Monasteries of Malmesbury, and Glastenbury, and placing married Priests in their rooms, as also for banishing Dunstan the holy Abbot of Glastenbury out of the Realm, a great part of his Subjects hearts was so turned against him, that the Mercians and Northumbrians revolted, and swore Fealty to his younger brother Edgar; with grief, whereof, after four years reign, he ended his life, and was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Hyde, at E F G Winchester.

After Edwyn, succeeded his younger brother Edgar, at the age of sixteen years; but his Coronation, when, and where, and by whom, so uncertain, that some say he was Crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury, in the first year of his reign; others say not till the twelfth, and William of Malmesbury not till the thirtieth: Another Chronicle faith, in his eleventh year; and that in the City of Bathe, by the hands of Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury. This King, by reason of the tranquillity of his reign, was surnamed the Peaceable; for as he was something inclined to the Danes, so the Danes never offered to stir in all H I his time; and as for the Saxons, they acknowledged him their sole Sovereign, without division of Provinces or Titles. His Acts were, some Virtuous, some Politick, some Just, some Pious; and yet all these not without some mixture of vice. To repress drunkenness, which the Dames had brought in, he made a Law, ordaining a fine, by certain pints in the pot; with penalty to any that should presume to drink deeper than the mark. It was a politick device which he used for the destruction of Wolves that in his daies, did great annoyance to the Land: For the tribute imposed on the Princes of Wales, by King Athelstan, he wholly remitted, appointing in lieu thereof, a certain number of Wolves yearly to be paid; whereof the Prince of North-Wales, for his part was to pay three hundred; which continued for three years space: and in the fourth year, there was not a Wolf to be found; and so the tribute ceased. He had in his Navy Royal, three thousand and six hundred ships, which he divided into three parts, appointing every one of them to a several Quarter, to scowre the Seas, and to secure the Coasts from Pirates: and left his Officers might be careless, or corrupted, he would himself in person sail about all the Coasts of his Kingdom every Summer. It was a notable Act of Justice, that in his Circuits, and Progresses through the Countrey, he would take special account of the demeanour of his Lords; and specially of his Judges; whom he severely punished, if he found them Delinquents. Wars he had none in all his reign, only towards his end, the Welshmen moved some rebellion; against whom he went with a mighty Army, and chastised the Authors; but when his Souldiers had gotten great spoils, and made prey upon the innocent Countrey people; he commanded them to restore it all back again; which, if it made some few English angry, it made the whole Countrey of the Welsh well pleased, and found forth his praises. His pious Acts were, that he built and prepared seven and forty Monasteries, and meant to have made them up fifty, but was prevented by death. But now his mixture of Vice marred all; especially being a Vice opposite to all those Virtues, which was Lasciviousness. For first, he deflowered a sacred Nun, called Wolfschilde; on whom yet he begot a Saint, the chaste Edyth. After her another Virgin, called Ethelstede, for her excellent beauty surnamed the White, on whom he begot his eldest Son Edward; for which Fact he did seven years penance enjoined him by the Archbishop Dunstan. After this he chanced to hear of a Virgin, Daughter to a Western Duke, exceedingly praised for her beauty, and coming to Andover, commanded her to his bed. But the Mother, tender of her Daughters honour, brought in the dark her maid to him; who in the morning making haste to rise, and the King not suffering her to depart, she told him what great work she had to do, and how she should incur her Ladies displeasure, if it were not done; by which words the King perceiving the deceit, turned it to a jest; but so well liked her company, that he kept himself true to her ever after, till he married. But now his marriage it self happened by a greater vice than any of these; For hearing of the admirable beauty of Elfrida, the only daughter of Ordgannus Duke of Devonshire, Founder of Tavestock Abby in that Countrey, he sent his great Favorite Earl Ethelwold, (who could well judge of beauty) to try the truth thereof; with Commission, that if he found her such as Fame reported, he should seize her for him, and he would make her his Queen. The young Earl, upon sight of the Lady, was so surprized with her love, that he began to woo her for himself, and got her Fathers good will, so as the King would give his consent. Hereupon the Earl posted to the King, relating to him that the Maid was fair indeed, but nothing answerable to the Fame that went of her; yet desired the King that he might marry her, as being her Fathers Heir, thereby to raise his Fortunes. The King consented, and the marriage was solemnized. Soon after, the fame of her beauty began to spread more then before; so as the King much doubting that he had been abused, meant to try the truth himself, and thereupon taking occasion of hunting in the Dukes Park, came to his house; where coming Ethelwold suspecting, acquainted his wife with the wrong he had done both her, and the King, and therefore to prevent the Kings displeasure, intreated her by all the persuasions he could use, to clothe her self in such attire, as might be least fit to set her forth; but she considering that now was the time to make the most of her beauty, and longing to be a Queen, would not be accessary to her own wrong, but decked her self in her richest Ornaments, which so improved her beauty, that the King at the first sight was struck with admiration, and meant to be revenged of his perfidious Favourite; yet dissembling his passion, till he could take him at advantage, he then with a Javelin ran him through; and having thereby made fair Elfrida a Widow, took her to be his Wife. This King founded the Monastery of Ramsiey in Hampshire, reigned sixteen years, lived seven and thirty, and with great Funeral pomp was buried in the Abby of Glastenbury. He had children by his first wife Ethelstede, one Son named Edward; and by his second wife Elfrida, two Sons, one named Edmund, who died young, the other Ethelred. He had also one natural Daughter, named Edgyth, by a Lady named Wolfschilde, the daughter of Wolholme, the Son of Birding, the Son of Nefling; which two latter, bear in their names the memory of their Fortunes; the last of them being found in an Eagles nest, by King Alfred as he was a hunting. This Edgyth built the Monastery and Church of Saint Dennis at Wilton, and was there buried.

After the death of King Edgar succeeded his Son Edward, but not without some opposition, for Queen Elfrida combined with divers of the Lords, to make her Son Ethelred King, saying that Prince Edward was illegitimate; on the other side, the Archbishop Dunstan, and the Monks stood for Edward, abetting his title as being lawfully born; but while the Council was

A was assembled to argue their Rights, the Archbishop came in with his Banner and Cross, and not staying for debating de Jure, de Facto presented Prince Edward for their lawful King, and the Assembly consisting most of Clergy men, drew the approbation of the rest; and thereupon Prince Edward was admitted, being but twelve years of age, and was Crowned King at Kingston upon Thames, by Archbishop Dunstan, in the year 975. In the beginning of his reign, it fell into debate whether married Priests were to be allowed to live in Monasteries upon the revenues of the Church. The Mercian Duke Alferus, favouring the cause of the married Priests, destroyed the Monasteries in his Province, cast out the Monks, and restored again the ancient revenues to the Priests and their Wives. On the other side, Edelwyn Duke of the East Angles, and Brynoth Earl of Suffex, who stood for the Monks, cast married Priests out of their Provinces. The matter being debated in a Council at Westminster, the Monks cause was like to have the foil, till it was referred to the Rood, placed on the Refectory wall, where the Council sate: For to this great Oracle, Saint Dunstan desired them devoutly to pray, and to give diligent ear for an Answer, when suddenly a voice was heard to say, God forbid it should be so, God forbid it should be so. This was thought Authority sufficient, to suppress the Priests, till they persuading the people, that this was but a cunning practise of the Monks, in placing behind the wall, a man of their own who through a Trunk uttered these words in the mouth of the Rood. Whereupon another Assembly was appointed at Cleve in Wiltshire, whither repaired the Prelates, with most of all the Lords and Gentlemen of the Kingdom. The Synod being set, and the matter at the height of discussing, it happened that the Joys of the room, where the Synod was held, suddenly brake, and the floor with all the people thereon, fell down, whereof many were hurt, and some slain; Only the Archbishop Dunstan then President, and mouth for the Monks, remained unhurt; which whether it were done by practise, or were miraculous, it served the Monks turn for justifying their cause; and married Priests were thereupon discarded. It were infinite, and indeed ridiculous, to speak of all the Miracles, reported to be done by this Saint Dunstan, which may be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle.

But now a most lamentable dyfaller comes to be remembered: For King Edward, hunting one time in the Island of Purbeck: not far from Corfe Castle, where his mother in Law Queen Elfrida, with his brother Prince Ethelred, were then residing, he out of his love to both, would needs himself alone go visit them; where the cruel woman, out of ambition to bring her own Son to the Crown, caused one to run him into the back with a knife, as he was drinking a Cup of Wine on Horseback at his departing; who feeling himself hurt, set spurs to his Horse, thinking thereby to get to his company, but the wound being mortal, and he fainting through loss of much blood, fell from his Horse; but one foot being intangled in the stirrup, he was thereby rudely dragged up and down, through Woods, and Lands: and lastly left dead at Corfe gate; for which untimely death, he was ever after called by the name of Edward the Martyr. He reigned only three years and six months, and was buried first at Winchester, without all Funeral pomp; but after three years, by Duke Alferus removed, and with great solemnity interred in the Minster of Shaftsbury. Queen Elfrida, to expiate this her bloody fact, built the two Monasteries of Almesbury, and Wormsley, in the Counties of Wiltshire and Southampton, in which latter with great repentance, she lived till her death.

After the death of Edward the Martyr, dying at the age of sixteen years, his half brother Ethelred, at the age of twelve years, in the year 979. was Crowned King at Kingston upon Thames by Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, though much against his will; which King by reason of his backwardness in Action, was commonly called the Unready. At the Coronation of this Prince St. Dunstan in a Prophetick spirit denounced on him and the Kingdom, the wrath and indignation of Almighty God in these words following: Because (saith he) thou hast aspired to the Crown by the death of thy brother whom thy Mother hath murdered, therefore hear the word of the Lord: The sword shall not depart from thy house, but shall furiously rage all the days of thy life, killing of thy seed, till such time as thy kingdom shall be given to a people whose customs and language the Nation thou now governest know not. Neither shall thy sin, the sin of thy Mother, and the sin of those men, who were partakers of her Counsils, and Executors of her wicked designs, be expiated but by a long, and most severe vengeance. Which prediction of the holy Archbishop was seconded by prodigies, and by the dyfallous calamities which fell on him, his house, and the whole confirmed for truth. Besides this, most remarkable are the prophecies of a holy man in the time of this King Ethelred. Before whete time, for two and twenty years past the Dames had lived as quiet Inmates with the English, but whether weary of so long doing nothing, or finding now opportunity of doing something, in the second year of this King, they begin to stir, and inviting from home forces, who in seven Ships arrived upon the coast of Kent, they spoiled all the Countrey, specially the Isle of Thanet, and continued this course of forraging the Kingdom, sometimes in one part, and sometimes in another, for eleven years together: till at last in the year 991. the King by advice of his Lords, of whom Siricinus the now Archbishop of Canterbury was chief, was contented to pay them ten thousand pounds, upon condition they should quietly depart the Realm. This served the turn for the present, but was so far from satisfying them, that it did but give them the greater appetite: for the year following they came again, and that with a greater fleet then before, against whom the King prepared a competent Navie, and committed it to Elfrick, Earl of Mercia, but he proving treacherous (as indeed all other for the most part did, whom the King employed against the Dames, as with whom they were allied in blood) the Dames so prevailed, that for the next composition, they had sixteen thousand pounds given them them, and a year after, twenty thousand; and so every year more and more, till it came at last to forty thousand: by which means, the Land was emptied of all coyn, and the English were brought so low, that they were fain to Till, and ear the Ground, whilst the Danes sat idle, and eat the fruit of their labours; abusing the Wives and Daughters of their Hosts where they lay, and yet in every place, for very fear, were called Lord-Danes; (which afterward became a word of derision, when one would signifie a lazy Lubber.) In this distressed state, the King at last bethought himself of a course: he sent forth a secret Commission into every City within his Dominions; that at an appointed time, they should massacre all the Danes that were amongst them; The day was the thirteenth of November, being the Festival of St. Brice, in the year 1002. His command was accordingly performed, and with such rigour, that in Oxford the Danes for refuge took into the Church of St. Frideswide, as into a Sanctuary, when the English, neither regarding place nor person, set the Church on fire, wherein many of the Danes were burnt, and the Library thereof utterly defaced. And who would not now think, but that England by this Fact had clean shaken of the Danish yoke for ever? yet it proved clean otherwise: For the news of this massacre, adding a new edge of revenge, to the old edge of ambition, made the Danes sharper set against the English; then ever they had been before; so as the year following, their King Sweyne, with a mighty Navy entered the Countrey, razed and levelled with the ground the City of Excester, all along from the East Gate to the West: against whom the King levied an Army, and made General over it, the Earl Edrick, his great Favourite, whom he had created Duke of Mercia, and given him his Daughter Edgith in marriage; yet all this great favour could not keep him from being treacherous, for being sent Ambassadour to the Danes, to mediate for Peace, he revealed to them the weakness of the Land, and treacherously dissuaded them from consenting to any Truce. Upon this King Ethelred gave order, That every three hundred and ten Hydes of Land should build a Ship, and every eight Hydes finde a compleat Armour furnished; yet all this great preparation came to nothing, but only to make a show. After this, the King seeing no end of their Invasions, nor promise kept upon any composition; (for three Danish Princes, with a great Fleet, were now newly arrived,) He intended to adventure once for all, and to commit his cause to God, by the fortune of a Battail. To which end he secretly gathered a mighty power, and coming unlooked for, when the Enemy was unprepared, he had certainly given an end to the Quarrel, if the wicked Edrick had not dissuaded him from fighting, and put him into a causeless fear, by forged tales. After this the Danes foraged many Countries; burnt Oxford, Thersford, and Cambridge; and lastly entered Wiltshire, which was the seventh thire in number, they had laid waste like a Wilderness. The year after they make a new Expedition, and besiege Canterbury; which by treason of a Church-man they won, took Alphegus the Archbishop, and slew nine hundred Monks, and men of Religion, besides many Citizens, without all mercy; for they Tyethed the people, slaying all by nines, and reserving only the tenth to live; so that of all the Monks in the Town, there were but four saved, and of the Lay-people, four thousand eight hundred; by which account Master Lambert collecteth, that there dyed in this Massacre three and forty thousand, and two hundred persons. The Archbishop Alphegus, for that he refused to charge his Tenants with three thousand pounds to pay for his ransom, they most cruelly stoned to death at Greenwich. Turkillus the leader of these Murderers, took into his possession all Norfolk and Suffolk, over whom he tyrannized in most savage manner; the rest compounding with the English for eight thousand pounds, quietly for a while sojourned among them. The year following came King Sweyne again, and with a great Navy arrived in the mouth of Humber, and landed at Gainsborough, to whom the Northumbrians, and the people of Lindsey, yielded themselves; so that now over all the North from Wallingstreet, he reigned sole King, and exacted pledges of them for their further obedience. From the North he passed into the South, subduing all before him till he came to London, where he was so valiantly encountered by the Londoners, that he was glad to retire, in which retyring notwithstanding he entred Bathe; where Ethelmore Earl of Devonshire, with his Western people, submitted himself to him. Yet after this, between him and the English was struck a fierce battail, which had been with good success, if the treachery of some in turning to the Danes, had not hindered it. After this the Danes proceeded on victoriously, and had gotten most part of the Land, and even London also by submission: whereupon the unfortunate King Ethelred sending his Wife Emma, with her two Sons Edward and Alfred, to her Brother Duke of Normandy, himself also the Winter following passed thither, leaving the Danes Lording it in his Realm. Sweyne now as an absolute King, extorted from the English both Victuals and pay for his Souldiers; and demanding such a Composition for preserving of St. Edmunds Monastery in Suffolk, as the Inhabitants were not able, and therefore refused to pay; he thereupon threatened spoil, both to the Place, and to the Martyrs bones there interred, when suddenly, in the midst of his jollity (saith Hoveden) he cried out, that he was struck by St. Edmund with a Sword, being then in the midst of his Lords, and no man seeing from whose hand it came; and so with great horror and torment, three days after, upon the third of February, he ended his life at Thersford, or (as others say) at Gainsborough. And now who would not think but this was a fair opportunity offered to the English, to free themselves wholly from the Danish yoke? but when all was done, either crossed by treachery, or frustrated by misfortune, nothing prospered. It is true, upon this occasion of Sweyns death, King Ethelred returned out of Normandy, but at his coming,

CANUTUS

The Danes massacred.

In revenge whereof King Sweyne the next year invades the Kingdom, and prevails by the treachery of Edrick.

King Sweyne is stricken by the divine hand, for offering violence to St. Edmund the Martyrs bones.

A Canutus the Son of Sweyne, had gotten the people of Lindsey to be at his devotion, and to find him both Horse and Men against their own King; so as Ethelred was now to encounter as well his own Subjects, as Danes, which he did so valiantly, that he made Canutus glad to return into Denmark, as utterly hopeless of any good to be done in England. And now one would certainly think the Danes had been removed, Root and Branch, out of England; and never like to trouble the Land any more; and indeed there was all the appearance of probability for it that could be. But it is a true saying, That which will be, shall be, let all be done that can be. For now Turkill the Dane, who had before revolted to K. Ethelred, growing sensible of his fault, which was this, or no way to be redeemed; and tender of his Countrey-mens case, which was now or never to be helped; with nine of his Ships sailed into Denmark, and first excusing himself to Canutus for his former defection, as though he had done it of purpose, to learn all advantages against the English, which now he could discover to him, so he prevailed with Canutus once again to try his fortune, that with a Navy of two hundred Ships he set sail for England, and landed at Sandwich, where he gave the English a great overthrow, and passed victoriously through the Counties of Dorset, Somerset, and Wilts. When (Ethelred lying dangerously sick at Cossam) the managing of the War was committed to Prince Edmund his Son, who preparing to give the Danes battail, had suddenly notice given him, that his Brother in law Edrick, meant to betray him into his Enemies hands, which made him suspend his proceeding; and Edrick, perceiving his design to be discovered, cast off the masque, and with forty of the Kings Ships fled openly to the Enemy; and thereupon, all the West Countreys submitted themselves unto Canutus. By this time King Ethelred having recovered his sickness, prepared to go on with the Battail, which his Son Edmund had intended, but his Forces being assembled, he likewise had suddenly notice given him, that his Subjects meant to betray him to the Danes. Hereupon he withdrew himself to London, as the place in which he most confided; where falling into a relapse of his former sickness, he ended his unfortunate daies, in the year 1016. when he had reigned 37 years, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, whose bones as yet remain in the North wall of the Chancel, in a chest of gray marble; adjoining to that of Seba King of the East Saxons. He had by his two Wives, eight Sons, and four Daughters; of whom, his youngest named Goda, was married to one Walter de Maigne, a Noble man of Normandy: by whom she had a Son named Rodolph, which Rodolph had a Son named Harold, created afterward by King William the Conquerour, Baron of Sudeley in the County of Gloucester, and Ancestor to the Barons of that place succeeding, and of the Lord Chandovers of Sudeley, now being.

Ethelred being dead, his third Son Edmund called Ironside (of his ability in enduring labour) but the eldest living at his fathers death, succeeded, and was crowned at Kingstone upon Thames, by Levingus Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1016. A great part of the English both feared and favoured, and indeed out of fear favoured Canutus; especially the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, and swore Fealty to him: but the Londoners stood firm to Prince Edmund, and were the principal authors of his Election. Canutus before the death of King Ethelred, had besieged the City, and now with a large Trench encompassed it: but the new King Edmund coming on, raised the siege, and made Canutus flee to the Isle of Sheppey, where having stayed the Winter, the Spring following, he assailed the West of England, and at Penham in Dorsetshire, a battel was fought, and the Danes discomfited. After this, in Worcestershire at a place called Sheroston, another battail was fought, where the Danes were like again to be discomfited, but the traitorous Edrick perceiving it, he cut off the head of a Souldier like unto King Edmund both in hair and countenance, and shaking his bloody sword, with the gasping head, crying to the Army of the English, Flee ye wretches, flee, and get away, for your King is slain; behold, here is his head; but King Edward having notice of this treacherous stratagem, halted to shew himself where he might best be seen: whose sight so encouraged his men, that they had gotten that day a final victory, if night had not prevented them. Duke Edrick excuses his fact, as being mistaken in the countenance of the man, and desirous to save the blood of the English; upon which false colour he was received into favour again. After this, Canutus secretly in the night brake up his camp, and marched towards London, which in a fort was still besieged by the Danish Ships: but King Edmund hearing of his departure, followed him, and with small adoe removed the siege, and in Triumphant manner entered the City. After this near unto Oxford in Kent, was another great battail fought, in which Canutus lost four thousand five hundred men, and King Edmund only six hundred; the rest of the Danes saving themselves by flight; whom if King Edmund had pursued, it is thought that day had ended the wars between these two Nations for ever. But the ever traitorous Edrick, kept King Edmund from pursuing them, by telling him of Ambushes and other dangers: So as Canutus had leisure to pass over into Essex, but thither also King Edmund followed him; where at Asfdone three miles from Saffron Walden, another battail was fought, in which the Danes being at the point to be overthrown, the traitorous Edrick with all his Forces revolted to their side, by which treachery the English lost the day. There died of King Edmunds Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Godwyn, Duke Athelwald, Duke Athelwyn, Earl Archibald Codrath Bishop of Lincoln, Wolfey Abbot of Ramsey, with many other. The remembrance of which battail is retained to this day, by certain small hills there remaining, whence have been digged the bones of men, armour, and horse-bridles. After this, at Dereberf, near to the river Severn, another battail was ready to be fought;

when suddenly, a certain Captain steps forth, and for saving of blood, used great persuasions, that either they should try the battail by single Combat, or else divide the Kingdom betwixt them: Upon this the Combat is agreed on, and the two Princes entering into a small Island called Alney, adjoining to the City of Gloester, in compleat Armour assailed each other; at first on horseback, and after on foot: when Canutus having received a dangerous wound, and finding himself over-marched in strength, desired a Compromise, and with a loud voice used these words. What necessity should move us most Valiant Prince, for obtaining of a Title to endanger our lives? were it not better to lay malice aside, and condescend to a loving agreement? let us therefore become sworn Brothers, and divide the Kingdom between us. This motion was by King Edmund accepted, and thus was the Kingdom divided between these two Princes; Edmund enjoying that part which lies upon the coast of France, and Canutus the rest. But now Duke Edrick hath his last and greatest Act of treachery to play; for King Edmund being retired to a place for natures necessity, he thrust from under the draught a sharp spear into his body, and then cutting off his head presented it to Canutus, with these fawning words, All hail, thou sole Monarch now of England, for here behold the head of thy Copartner, which for thy sake I have adventured to cut off. Canutus though ambitious enough of soveraignty, yet abashed at so disloyal a fact, replied and vowed, that in reward of that service his own head should be advanced above all the Peers of his Kingdom: which soon after he performed; for by his command the false Edricks head was cut off, and placed upon the highest gate in London. Matthew of Westminster and Huntingdon, relates this murder to have been acted by Edricks own Son at the commandment of his Father: William of Malmesbury writes that the King was killed by two Gentlemen of his Bed-chamber hired by the same disloyal Edrick; notwithstanding Roger Hoveden reports that he died a natural death at London. The death of this King in this manner, some say was acted at Oxford; others, that he died of a natural sickness in London; but howsoever he came to his death, his reign was but only seven months, and his body was buried at Glastenbury, near to his Grandfather King Edgar. This King Edmund had by his Wife Algyth, two Sons; the eldest named Edward, surnamed the Out-law, because he lived out of England in Hungary as a banished man, for fear of King Canutus; but when his Uncle King Edward the Confessor, had obtained the Crown, he was recalled, and honourably entertained till he died. He married Agatha, Sister to Queen Sophia, Wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and Daughter to the Emperour Henry the second; by whom he had Edgar surnamed Atheling, the right Heir of the English Crown, though he never enjoyed it. The second Son of Ironside was called after his Fathers name Edmund. King Edmund had also two Daughters, Margaret and Christiane, of whom the younger became a Veiled Nun at Ramsay in Hampshire; the elder Margaret, after sole Heir to the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolm the third King of Scotland, from which princely bed in a lineal Descent, our High and mighty Monarch King James the first, doth in his most Royal person, unite the Britains, Saxons, Normands, and Scotish Imperial Crowns in one.

Of the first DANISH King in England.

He marries Queen Emma.

Canutus being posselt of half the Kingdom by composition with King Edward, now after his death seized upon the whole, and to prevent all further question, he called a Council of the English Nobility, wherein it was propounded, whether in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claim of Title to the Crown had been reserved for King Edmunds Brethren or Sons: to which (not daring to say otherwise) they absolutely answered no, and thereupon took all of them the Oath of Allegiance to Canutus. Being thus cleared of all Opposites, he prepared with great solemnity for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Levingus surnamed Elfsane, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1017. being the first Dane that reigned Monarch of England. But Canutus not thinking himself sufficiently safe, as long as any that might pretend, were in the peoples eye, caused first Edwyn the Son of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund, to abjure the Realm, who was yet afterward recalled, and treacherously murdered by his own men, and his body buried at Tauestock in Devonshire. Next were the two Sons of Edmund Ironside, Edward and Edmund, whom to the end the people might not see him shed the blood of Innocents, he sent to his half Brother King of Sweden, to be made away: But the King of Sweden more compassionate and noble, then this jealous and cruel Dane, sent the young Princes into Hungary to Salomon (the King thereof) in whose Court they were brought up and preferred, as we have before mentioned. Then remained Edward and Alfred, the Sons of King Ethelred, and them their Mother Queen Emma had sent away before to her Brother the Duke of Normandy, there to be in safety: so as none of the Royal blood was now left in the land, to give Canutus any fear of competition. After this, he took to wife the virtuous Lady Emma, the Relict of King Ethelred, by which match he procured to himself three great benefits: one that he won the love of the people by marrying a Lady whom they so intirely loved; another, that he got the Alliance of the Duke of Normandy, a neighbouring Prince of great power; the third, that by marrying the Mother, he secured himself against the Sons: as likewise Queen Emma was not unwillingly persuaded to the match, upon agreement to make her issue, if he had any by her, to inherit the Crown of England. And to win the love of the people more, he caused

A great numbers of his Danes, who pestered the Countrey, to return home, bestowing amongst them for their satisfaction, fourscore and two thousand pounds. And to win the love of the people yet more, he now set himself to the making of good Laws, in a Parliament at Oxford; whereof, for a pattern of those times, some that concern Religion, may not unfitly be here related. First, for the celebration of Divine Service, it was ordained, that all Ceremonies tending to the encrease of Reverence and Devotion should be used as need required. Secondly, that upon the Sabbath day, all publique Fairs, Markets, Synods, Huntings, and all secular actions should be forborn, unless some urgent necessity should require it. Thirdly, that every Christian should thrice in the year receive the blessed Sacrament of the Lords Supper. Fourthly, that if a Minister of an Altar killed a man, or committed any notorious crime, he should be deprived both of his Order and Dignity. Fifthly, that a married woman convicted of adultery, should have her nose and ears cut off. Sixthly, that a widow marrying within a twelve moneth after her husbands decease should lose her Joynture. These and many other good Laws were made, whereby the Kingdom remained during all his time, in a most peaceable state and government. In the third year of his reign, he heard how the Vandals taking advantage of his absence, had entred Denmark, and annoyed his Subjects; whereupon with a great Army of English he passed over the Seas, and gave them battail, but with ill success the first day; when preparing for the next days battail, the Earl Godwyn who was General of the English, secretly in the dead of the night, set upon the Vandals Camp, and with a great slaughter of their Souldiers, made their two Princes Ulfus and Anlave, to flee the field. In the morning it was told Canutus, that the English were fled, for that their station was left, and not a man of them to be found, which did not a little trouble his patience: but he going in person to see the truth, found the great overthrow the English had given, for which service ever after, he held the English, and especially the Earl Godwyn in great estimation. After this, returning home, he made a prosperous Expedition against Malcolm King of Scots; and at last, in the fifteenth year of his reign, wearied with the honorable troubles of the World, and out of a devotion, he took a Journey to Rome, to visit the Sepulchre of St. Peter and Paul, from whence he writ to the Bishops and Nobility of England, that they should carefully administer Justice, and never seek to advance his profit by any undue ways, or with the detriment of any man. At his return from Rome, he built in Essex the Church of Abdene, where he got the victory against King Edmund; in Norfolk, the Abbey of St. Benets, which Saint he greatly revered; and in Suffolk the Monastery of St. Edmund, which Saint he deadly feared. To the Church of Winchester he gave many rich Jewels, whereof one was a Crofs, valued to be worth as much as the whole revenue of England amounted to in one year. To Conventry he gave the arm of the great St. Austin, which he bought at Pavia in his return from Rome, for which he paid an hundred Talents of silver, and one of gold. One strange act is recorded, which he did for convincing his fawning flatterers, who used to tell him that his powers were more then humane: For being one time at Southampton, he commanded that his chair of State should be set on the shoar when the Sea began to flow, and then sitting down there in the presence of his many attendants, he spake thus to that Element; I charge thee that thou presume not to enter my Land, nor wet these Robes of thy Lord that are about me. But the Sea giving no heed to his command, but keeping on his usual course of Tyde, first wet his skirts, and after his thighs, whereupon suddenly arising, he thus spake in the hearing of them all; Let all the worlds Inhabitants know, that vain and weak is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy of the name of King, but he that keeps both Heaven and Earth and Sea in obedience. After which time he would never suffer the Crown to be set upon his head, but presently Crowned therewith the Picture of Christ on the Crofs at Winchester: from which example arose perhaps the custom, to hang up the Armour of worthy men in Churches, as Offerings consecrated to him who is the Lord of battail. When he had reigned nineteen years, he deceased at Shaftesbury in the County of Dorset, the twelfth of November, in the year 1035, and was buried in the Church of the old Monastery at Winchester, which being after new built, his bones with many other English Saxon Kings, were taken up, and are preserved in gilt Coffers, fixed upon the wals of the Quire in that Cathedral Church. He had by his two Wives, three Sons, Sweyne and Harold by his first wife Alfgive; and Hardikute by his second wife Queen Emma, and two Daughters, of whom the eldest, called Guinbilla, was married to the Roman Emperour Henry the third, who being accused of adultery, and none found to defend her cause, at last an English Page, a very boy and dwarf, who for the littleness of his stature, was generally, and jestingly surnamed Mimecan, adventured to maintain his Innocency against a mighty Giantlike Combatant; who in fight, at one blow cutting the sinews of his adversaries leg, with another he felled him to the ground, and then with his Sword taking his head from his shoulders, redeemed both the Emperesses life and honour. But the Emperers after this hard usage forsook her Husbands bed, and took upon her the Veil of a Nun, in the Town of Burges in Flanders, where she devoutly spent the rest of her life.

Of the Second DANISH King in England.

King Canutus dying, left his Kingdom of Norway to his eldest Son Sweyne, and his Kingdom of England, to his youngest Son Hardiknute, whom he had by his wife Emma, but he being at the time of his Fathers death in Denmark, Harold his elder Brother, by a former wife, taking advantage of his absence, layes claim to the Crown. For determining of which Right, the Lords assembled at Oxford, where Queen Emma pleaded for her Son Hardiknute, urging the Covenant of Canutus at their marriage, and his last Will at his death; as also Earl Godwyn of Kent did the like, being left Guardian of her Children, and keeper of his last Will. But Harold's presence, together with the favour of the Londoners, Danes, and Northumbrians, so wrought with the Lords, that the absent Hardiknute was neglected, and Harold was proclaimed and Crowned King at Oxford, by Elnothus Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1036.

His plot to intercept Competitors.

His cruelty against his Brother in law Alfred.

Called Harefoot for his swift running.

Harold having now attained the Crown, was not so jealous of his brother Hardiknute, as of his Mother in Law Queen Emma, and her Sons by King Ethelred who were beyond Sea, and therefore how to secure himself against these was his first care: For effecting whereof, he framed a Letter, as written by Queen Emma, to her two Sons Edward and Alfred; instigating them to attempt the Crown usurped by Harold, against their Right: to which Letter, coming first to the hands of Alfred, he suspecting no fraud, returned answer, that he would shortly come over, and follow her counsel. And thereupon with a small Fleet, and some few Souldiers lent him by Baldwyn Earl of Flanders, he took the Sea for England, where coming to shore, Earl Godwyn met him, and bound himself by Oath to be his guide to his Mother Queen Emma, but being wrought firm for Harold, he led him and his company a contrary way, and lodged them at Gailford, making known to King Harold what he had done, who presently committed them all to slaughter, sparing only every tenth man, for service of sale. Prince Alfred himself he sent Prisoner to the Isle of Ely, where having his eyes inhumanely put out, in grief and torment he ended his life. Some add a more horrible kind of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawn out, and fastened to a stake, his body pricked with Needles, or Poignards, and forced about till all his Entrails were extracted. This done, then he set upon Queen Emma, confiscating her Goods, and banished her the Realm. And now further to secure himself, he kept the Seas with sixteen Danish Ships, to the maintenance whereof, he charged the English with great payments; by which, if he procured the safety of his Person, he certainly procured the hatred of his Subjects. This King for his swiftness in running was called Harefoot, but though by his swiftness he out-run his Brother for the Kingdom, yet could not he run so fast, but that death quickly overtook him: For having reigned only four years and some months, he dyed at Oxford and was buried at Westminster, having never had Wife or Children.

Of the Third and last DANISH King in England.

King Harold being dead, the Lords to make amends for their former neglect, send now for Hardiknute, and offer him their Allegiance, who accepteth their offer, and thereupon taking Sea, arrived upon the Coast of Kent, the sixth day after he had set sail out of Denmark; and with great pomp conveyed to London, was there Crowned King by Elnothus Archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1040. His first Act, was to be revenged of his deceased Brother Harold, whose body he caused to be digged up, and thrown into the Thames, where it remained till a Fisherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of St. Clement without Temple-Bar, commonly called St. Clement Danes, because it was the burying place of the Danes, as some write. But towards his Mother and half Brother Prince Edward, he shewed true natural affection, inviting them both to return into England; where he received them with all the honour, that from a Son or Brother could be expected.

St. Clement Danes, why so called.

His intemperance in diet.

He imposeth Ship-money upon his Subjects.
He dies suddenly.

But now, as the King Harold, for his swiftness in running, was surnamed Harefoot; so this King for his intemperance in dyet, might have been surnamed Swinesmouth, or Bocca di Porco: for his Tables were spread every day four times, and furnished with all kinds of curious dishes, as delighting in nothing but gormandizing and twilling; and as for managing the State, he committed it wholly to his Mother Queen Emma, and to the politick Earl of Kent, Godwyn; who finding this weakness in the King, began to think himself aspiring; and to make the better way for it, he sought by all means to alien the subjects hearts from the Prince; amongst other courses he caused him to lay heavy Taxes upon them, only for Ship-money to pay his Danes, amounting to two and thirty thousand pounds: which was so offensive to the people, that the Citizens of Worcester slew two of his officers, Thurstan and Feudax, that came to collect it. But this King had soon the reward of his intemperance; for in a solemn Assembly and banquet at Lambeth, revelling and carousing, he suddenly fell down without speech, or breath, after he had reigned only two years, and was buried at Winchester. His death was so welcome to his Subjects, that the day of his death is to this day commonly celebrated with open pastimes in the street, and is called

A called Hock-tide, signifying scorn or contempt, which fell upon the Danes by his death: For with him ended the Reign of the Danes in England; after they had miserably afflicted the Kingdom, for the space of two hundred and forty years; though in Regal Government, but only fix and twenty.

A day called Hock-tide, and why.

Of ENGLISH Kings again, and first of EDWARD the Confessor.

King Hardiknute dying without issue, as having never been married, and the Danish line clean extinguished, Edward for his Piety called the Confessor, half Brother to the deceased Hardiknute, and Son to King Ethelred by his Wife Queen Emma, was by a general content admitted King of England, and was Crowned at Winchester by Edsne Archbishop of Canterbury, on Easter day, in the year 1042. being then of the age of forty years. He was born at Islip, near to Oxford, and after his Fathers death, for safety sent into France, to the Duke of Normandy his Mothers Brother, from whence he now came to take upon him the Crown of England. His Acts for gaining the peoples love, were first, the remitting the yearly tribute of forty thousand pounds, gathered by the name of Dane-gilt, which had been imposed by his Father, and for forty years together paid out of all mens Lands, but only the Clergy; and then from the divers Laws of the Mercians, West Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he selected the best, and made of them one body certain, and written in Latin, being in a fort the Fountain of those which at this day we term the Common Laws, though the forms of pleading, and process therein, were afterward brought in by the Conquerour. The Reign of this King was very peaceably: Only in his sixth year, the Danish Pirats entred the Port of Sandwich; which with all the Sea-coasts of Essex they spoiled, and then in Flanders made merchandise of their prey. As likewise the Irish, with thirty ships entred Severn, and with the assistance of Griffyth King of Southwales, burnt or slew all in their way, till at last, Reest the Brother of Griffyth was slain at Bulenden, and his head presented to King Edward at Gloucester. His Domestical troubles were only by Earl Godwin and his Sons; who yet after many contestations and affronts were reconciled, and Godwin received again into as great favour as before. But although King Edward forgave his Treasons, yet the Divine Providence did not; for soon after as he sat at Table with the King, on Easter Monday, he was suddenly stricken with death, and on the Thursday following dyed, and was buried at Winchester. Some make his death more exemplar, as that justifying himself for Prince Alfreds death, he should pray to God, that if he were any way guilty of it, he might never swallow down one morsel of bread, and thereupon by the just Judgment of God was choaked by the first morsel he offered to eat.

Extremity of Snow.

In this Kings time such abundance of snow fell in January, continuing till the middle of March following, that almost all Cattel and Fowl perished, and therewith an excessive dearth followed.

Two Acts are related of this King, that seem nothing correspondent to the general opinion he had of his Virtue, one concerning his Mother, the other touching his Wife: That concerning his Mother Queen Emma was this, that because after King Ethelred's death, she married the Danish King Canutus; and seemed to favour her issue by him, more then her issue by King Ethelred, therefore he dispossessed her of all her Goods; and committed her to custody, in the Abbey of Worpwell; and more then this, so far hearkened to an aspersion cast upon her, of unchast familiarity with Aethne Bishop of Winchester, that for her Purgation, she was fain to pass the tryal of Fire Ordeal, which was in this manner; Nine Plow-shares red hot were laid in unequal distance, which she must pass bare-foot and blind-fold, and if she passed them unhurt, then she was judged Innocent, if otherwise, Guilty. And this tryal she passed, and came off fairly, to the great astonishment of all beholders. The other touching his Wife was this; He had married Editha the beautiful, and indeed virtuous daughter of Earl Godwyn, and because he had taken displeasure against the Father, he would shew no kindness to the daughter; he had made her his wife, but converted not with her as his Wife, only at board, but not at bed, or if at bed, no otherwise then David with Abigail, and yet was content to hear her accused of Incontinency, whereof if she were guilty, he could not be innocent. So as, what the virtues were, for which after his death he should be reputed a Saint, doth not easily appear. It seems he was chaste, but not without injury to his Wife; Pious, but not without ungratefulness to his Mother; Just in his present government, but not without neglect of Posterity; for through his want of providence in that point, he left the Crown to so doubtful succession, that soon after his decease it was translated out of English into French, and the Kingdom made servile to a fourth forain Nation.

One Ability he had which raised him above the pitch of ordinary Kings, and yet at this day is ordinary with Kings, that by his only touching and laying his hand upon it, he cured a Disease, which from his Curing, is called, The Kings Evil. His Mother Queen Emma, in memory of the nine Plow-shares she had passed in her Tryal, gave nine Mannors to the Miltier of Winchester, and himself remembering the wrong he had done her, bestowed on the same place, the Island of Portland in Dorsetshire, being about seven miles in compass. He made also of a little Monastery in the west of London, by the River of Thames, a most beautiful Church, (called of the place Westminster) where he provided for his own Sepulchre, and another dedicated to St. Margaret, standing

This of Westminster he endowed with many rich revenues, and confirmed his Charters under his Broad Seal, being the first of the Kings of England, who used that large and stately impression in their Charters and Patents. He founded also the Colledge of St. Mary Ottery in Devonshire, and gave unto it the Village of Ottery, and removed the Bishops See from Cridington to Exeter, as a place of far more dignity: and when he had reigned the space of three and twenty years and six moneths, he ended his life the fourth of January, in that room of his Palace at Westminster, which is now called the Painted Chamber, in the year 1066. and was buried in the Church at Westminster, which he had builded.

King Edward the Confessor, being himself without issue, had in his life time sent into Hungary for his Nephew Edward called the Outlaw, the Son of Edmund Ironside; with a purpose to delign him his Succesour in the Crown, but he dying soon after his coming into England, King Edward then gave his son Edgar the name of Etheling; as to say, Prince Edgar, meaning to delign him for his Succesour, but being prevented by death, before the Succesour was fully established, and Edgar Atheling, though he had right, yet being young, and not of power to make good his Right, Harold the Son of Earl Godwyn steps into the Throne, and never standing upon Ceremonies, set himself the Crown upon his own head, wherein, though as a violater of holy Rites, he offended the Clergy, yet not any either of Clergy or Laity, durst oppose him, as being at that time the most martial man in the Kingdom; and such a one, as the state of the Realm stood at that time in need of, and besides his own worthiness had the assistance of Edwyn and Maregar, the two great Earls of Yorkshire and Chester, whose sister Algyth he had married. It is true withal, that King Edward had appointed the Crown after his own decease, sometime to William Duke of Normandy, sometimes to Edgar Atheling, and sometimes to this Harold, so as he was Crowned by Aldred Archbishop of York, as not coming in by intrusion or wrong, but by the appointment of King Edward, though that appointment of King Edward, was rather to make him Regent, during the minority of Edgar, then to make him absolute King; but howsoever being once in the Throne, he was then able to make his own Title, and to make Prince Edgar some amends, he created him Earl of Oxford, which was indeed to use him like a Childe, take a way a Jewel, and please him with an Apple. Yet Harold having once gotten into the Throne, he carried himself with great Valour and Justice, for the time he fate in it, which was but very short, (only nine moneths) as being indeed but tottering from the very beginning, and that chiefly by means of his own Brother Tostayne, who by diverting his Forces to suppress a Rebellion, made him of less force to resist an Invasion. But now that we have shewed how Harold entred the Throne, we must forbear to shew how he was cast out, till we come to him that cast him out, who because he was not only of another Family, but of another Nation, we must necessarily take the beginning from a deeper root; and indeed, seeing in him, we shall joyn our Island to the Continent, which is a larger world, our Kings hereafter will afford a larger Extent for matter of Discourse then heretofore they have done.

THE L I F E O F KING WILLIAM THE FIRST: Called the CONQUEROUR!

His Parentage and Descent.

Here were six Dukes of Normandy in France, in a direct line succeeding from Father to Son. The first was Rollo, who of a private man in Denmark, coming forth with the exuberancy of his Nation, wrested by force of Arms from Charles the Simple King of France, to be made Duke of Normandy. The second was William his Son, called Long-Espee, or Long-Sword. The third was Richard his Son, called the Hardy, who had Richard, and a Daughter called Emma, married to Ethelred King of England, Father of Edward the Confessor. The fourth was Richard the second, his Son, called the Good. The fifth was Richard the third his Son, who by a first Wife had three Sons, Richard, Robert, and William, and by a second, two other Sons, William Earl of Arguon, and Mauger Archbishop of Roan. So as Richard his eldest Son by his first Wife succeeded him by the name of Richard the fourth, and dying without issue, the Dukedom descended to Robert his second Son by his first Wife; which Robert was Father to our William the Conquerour, of whom it is thus recorded; That riding one time abroad, he happened to pass by a company of Countrey Maids that were a dancing, where staying a while to look upon them, he was so taken with the handsomeness, and graceful carriage of one of them whose name was Arlette, a Skinners Daughter (from whence as some think our word Harlot comes) that affection commanding him, and authority her, he caused her that night to be brought to his bed; where being together, what was done or said between them, is no matter for History to record, though some Historians have recorded both; making her not so modest as was fit for a Maid: only ten moneths after, it appeared that at this time our Duke William was begotten; who proving a man of extraordinary spirit, we may attribute it to the heat of affection in which he was begotten. Neither did there want before and at his birth fore-running tokens which prefiged his future greatness: for his mother Arlette being great with him, had a dream like that of Mandane, the Mother of Cyrus the first Persian Monarch; namely, that her bowels were extended and dilated over all Normandy and England. Also as soon as he was born, being laid on the chamber floor, with both his hands he took up rushes, and shutting his little fists, held them very fast; which gave occasion to the Gossiping wives to congratulate Arlette in the birth of such a boy, and the Midwife cry'd out, the childe would prove a King.

His succeeding in the Dukedom, notwithstanding his Bastardy.

Bastardy no bar to succession.

Princes to appoint their Successors.

It appears by many examples, that Bastardy in those daies was no bar to succession, till a law was afterward made to make it a bar. It brought some disgrace, where the Mother was mean, but no impediment where the Father was Noble; and even his Bastardy seemed to have some allay, if it be true (as some write) that his Father took the said Arlotte afterward to be his Wife: and yet perhaps he had not the Dukedom so much by succession, as by gift. For when he was about nine years old, his Father calling his Nobility together, caused them to swear Allegiance to this base Son of his, and to take him for their Leige Lord after his decease. Neither was this in those daies unfrequent, for Princes to confer their Principalities after their own deceases upon whom they pleased; counting it as lawful to appoint Successors after them, as Substitutes under them; even in our time and Kingdom the Duke of Northumberland prevailed with King Edward the sixth, to exclude his two Sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, and to appoint the Lady Jane Grey, Daughter of the Duke of Suffolk, to succeed him.

His Education and Tuition in his Minority.

His Father having declared and appointed him to be his Successor, went soon after (whether out of devotion, or to do Penance for procuring his Brothers death, whereof he was suspected) into the Holy Land, in which Journey he died, having left the tuition of his young Son to his two Brothers, and the Guardianship to the King of France, in whose Court for a time he was brought up. A strange confidence, to commit the tuition of a Son that was base, to pretenders that were legitimate, and to a King of France, who aimed at nothing more, then to re-annex this Dukedom to his Crown. But it seems his confidence was grounded upon the proximity of blood in his Brothers, and upon the merits of his own service formerly done to the King of France; which though it proved well enough with him, yet is not to be taken into example to follow.

His Troubles in his Minority.

First, Roger de Tresney, who derived his Pedegree directly from Rollo, and had won much Honour by his Valour in the Wars, (notwithstanding the Oath of Allegiance he had formerly taken) takes exception to his Bastardy, and invites complices to assist him in recovering the Dukedom to a legitimate Race: a fair pretext, if the Fate of Duke William had not been against it; who though he were himself but young, and could not do much in his own person, yet the Divine Providence raised him up friends that supplied him with Assistance, and particularly Roger de Beaumont, by whose valour this Roger de Tresney, with his two Brothers was defeated and slain. After Roger de Tresney, William de Arques his Uncle laies claim to the Duchy, and assisted by the King of France comes to a battail, but by the Valour of Count Gifford, the Dukes General, was likewise defeated; and these were troubles before he arrived to seventeen years of age. After this, one Guy Earl of Burgoyne, Grandchilde to Richard the second, Duke of Normandy, grew sensible of his Right to the Dukedom, and joyning with Viscount Neele, and the Earl of Bessin, two powerful Normans, conspired Duke William's death, and had affected it, if a certain fool about him had not stoln away in the night, to the place where the Duke was, and never left knocking and crying at the gate, till he was admitted to his presence, willing him to flie for his life instantly, or he would be murdered. The Duke considering, that being related by a Fool, it was like to be the more palpable, and that there might be danger in staying, none in going, rode instantly away, all alone, toward Falaife, his principal Castle, but missing his way, he happened to pass where a Gentleman was standing at his door, of whom he asked the way, and was by him, as knowing him, directed; which he had no sooner done, but the conspirators came presently inquiring if such a one had not passed that way, which the Gentleman affirmed, and undertook to be their guide to overtake him, but leading them of purpose a contrary way, the Duke by this means came safely to Falaife; and from thence journeys to the King of France, complaining of his injuries; and imploring his aid, as one that was his homager, and committed to his care by his servant his Father; The King of France moved with his distress, and remembrance of his Fathers merits, though he wished he was less then he was, yet he so aided him, that he made him greater then he was; for himself in person, suffering much in the Battail, procured him the Victory. By which we may see, that Folly, and Fortune, and even Enemies themselves are all assistants to the Destinies; or to say better, indeed to the divine Providence. Many other affronts were offered him, some by meaner Princes; some afterwards by the King of France himself, who was now grown jealous of his Greatness; all which he encountered with such dexterity, that made his Bastardy, as it were, become Legitimate, and Virtue her self grow proud of his person.

A Fool saves Duke William's life.

His

His Carriage afterwards in Peace.

By this time he was come to the age of two and twenty years, and whereas all this while he had shewed himself a valiant General in War, he now began to shew himself a provident Governour in Peace, composing and ordering his state, wherein he so carryed himself, that as his Subjects did both fear and love him, so his neighbouring Princes did both fear and hate him, or if not hate him; at least emulate him.

His Incitements for Invading of England.

Duke William had incitements to invade England, and some shew of a title. To understand this more fully, we will reflect upon some passages transacted betwixt the two former Kings, Edward the Confessour, and Harold the Son of Earl Godwin. And this recapitulation will give some light, and is very pertinent to our intended purpose.

Earl Godwin falling out with King Edward, the business was carryed with such heat on both sides, that the Earl and all his Allies were in a manner banished the Realm. Godwin makes his refuge to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, Harold his Son into Ireland. Emma the Kings Mother decealing, they both return with a great Navy, and strong Army. The Nobility fearing a Civil War, labour for a reconciliation betwixt the King and the Exiles: but Edward jealous of Godwin's arts and treachery, would by no means hearken unto it. At last upon conditions they are restored to the Kings favour and their Countrey: Hostages are delivered; Walnoth the Son of Godwyn, and Harrn his Grandchild; whom the King for more security sends into Normandy, there to be detained by Duke William, his kinsman. After the death of Godwin, Harold succeeds him Earl of Kent, who craves leave of the King to go to Normandy, and bring back his Brother and kinsman: the King in this manner answers him; Harold you may do your pleasure, and I may permit though will not consent, for I do foresee, that if you undertake this journey, it will prove to the ruine of the Kingdom, and your own confusion. Harold notwithstanding, obstinate in his resolution, after a tempestuous voyage, arrives in France, where he is taken prisoner by the Lord of Pontive, and at the command and threats of Duke William dismist; and though first robbed of his treasures, and choicest things he transported, at last sent into Normandy; where relating the cause of his journey, he was honourably entertained, and fairly promised, unless himself were the obstacle, all things should succeed as he wished. After some time the Duke taking his opportunity entred into private discourse with him, and told him, that K. Edward being brought up in his youth together with him, had faithfully promised him, that if ever he came to be King of England, he would make him his heir, and settle the Kingdom on him. Wherefore Harold (quoth the Duke) if you will assist me in gaining that Crown, when I come over into England, you shall have your Brother and Nephew: and to make our tie of friendship the stronger, you shall promise to take one of my Daughters for Wife, and send your Sister hither, whom I will bestow on one of my chief Lords; you shall also promise me to secure the Castle of Dover for my service; and I promise you that when I am King of England, I will deny you nothing, which in reason you shall demand. Harold having heard the Duke, was much perplexed; but seeing himself in such streights, that he must either venture on a promise, or hazard an imprisonment, condescends to all the Duke demanded, and for more security, with a solemn Oath confirms his agreement: and returning into England acquaints Edward with all these passages, who replied, Did not I know William's disposition, and foretell thee how much mischief this journey would bring upon England? Duke William having the Word of Edward, and the Oath of Harold, had sufficient obligations to expect the Kingdom: but hearing of the death of Edward, and that Harold was Crowned King; he thought himself not more forgotten by Edward, then wronged by Harold, and therefore sent a messenger to put him in mind of King Edward's promise, and his own Oath. Harold returns answer, that he could not send his Sister over, because she was dead, but if William would have her Carcase he should. Secondly, that he could neither promise, nor dispose of a Kingdom, which was none of his own. Lastly, he should be injurious to his own Nobility, if he should without their consent and advice take a stranger for Wife. William having heard his answer, was as yet patient, and again sending to Harold mildly, demands of him at last to take his Daughter for his Wife and Queen; otherwise by force of arms he would recover that Kingdom, which was his own by the promise of King Edward. To this Harold peremptorily replies, that he feared not the one, so by no means would he do the other. Duke William thus slighted by Harold endeavours to make him honest by force, and assured himself he should find him a weak Enemy, who had proved so perjured a Friend. These were the incitements which caused William in his declining age to undertake this expedition; but who can think himself too old for a Kingdom, when Gaius above 73. years of age buckled on an Armour on his unwieldy limbs for the attaining of the Roman Empire?

The

The Reasons that facilitated his Conquest of England.

Duke William incensed with Harold's answers, acquaints the Nobility with his purpose, who with some ado consented to aid him, as likewise many other great Lords of France, but specially Baldwin Earl of Flanders, whose daughter he had married: and who being at that time Guardian of the young King of France, procured aid from him also; and to make the Enterprise the more successful, Pope Alexander the second sent him a Banner with an Agnus of Gold, and one of the hairs of St. Peter. So as the preparation of the Duke, both by Sea and Land, was very great, having three hundred fail of Ships, and as some write, 890. and as one Norman above a thousand, and as Gemeticensis, three thousand: and though Harold had likewise provided a warlike Fleet to encounter him, yet it was at that time unfortunately diverted another way; for Toussayne his Brother, being then in rebellion in the North, and Harold Harfager King of Norway, at the same time invading those parts, and perhaps upon a bruit, that the Dukes Fleet was not yet ready to come forth, removed both his Fleet and Army thither: where though he got the Victory at Stamford, with the death both of his Brother Toussayne, and of the King of Norway, yet it made way for the Duke to land quietly, and he entered the Kingdom, as easily as one may enter a house, when the doors are all left open. By this means King Harold's shipping (the best wall of defence to an Island) was utterly frustrate: and as for his Land Forces, they were by his Battail at Stamford, exceedingly both weakened and impaired; yet hearing that Duke William was landed at Pemsey, not far from Hastings in Sussex, he repaired thither with all speed, and gathering together his broken Forces, and increasing them by all the means he could, made himself ready to give the Duke battail. Duke William in the mean time, as soon as he had landed his men, sent his Ships presently away, that there might be no thinking of any thing, but either Death or Victory: And then going himself on land, it is said, his foot slipped, and he fell down: which some that stood by, taking for an evil sign, No, (saith he) I have by this taken possession of this Land. And indeed presages are but as Animus ejus qui presagit, as in this Dukes fall it afterwards fell out. The like confidence of spirit shewed he not long after, when the Armies were ready to joyn; for he that put on the Dukes Armour, whether out of haught, or out of perturbation of minde, putting the forepart behind, and the backpart before: the Duke seeing it, merrily said, I see now by this inversion of my Armour, that my Dukedom will be turned into a Kingdom: taking that for a good omen, which some other of weaker spirits would have taken for a bad. Many wayes of compulsion between Duke William and King Harold were propounded, yet Harold would hearken to none, as nothing doubting of success, and perhaps thinking it a disgrace, to capitulate for that, which was now his own: and when one of his Brothers called Gyrth, being less interested, and therefore clearer sighted, intreated him to consider what a fearful thing it was to break an Oath, which he so solemnly had sworn: Harold seemed to conceive, that nothing which he did being a private man, could be of force to bind him, now being a Prince; and so on the fourteenth day of October, being Saturday, in the year 1066. (which day he liked the better, because it was his Birth-day, hoping, that the day of his Birth, would not so much degenerate, to prove the Day of his Death, though this also even bred no good blood to the Action: For the Souldiers of Harold, thinking thereby to honour their Kings Birth-day, spent the night before in revelling and drinking, where the Souldiers of the Duke out of consideration of their next days work, spent the night in quietness and devotion) they joyned battail, (the Kentish-men being placed in the fore-front, as by an ancient custom is their due, and King Harold with his Londoners, leading the main battail) where though their Armies were not much unequal in number, (for they were each of them near about three-score thousand men) yet there was great odds in the expertness of their Souldiers, and more in the advantage of their weapons: for, the Duke had with him all the flower of France and Flanders, where King Harold had lost his best men, in his late battail; and for advantage of weapons, the Normans had long Bows and Arrows, which among the English at that time were not at all in use; what marvel that the Normans got the victory, though King Harold losing his life, yet lost no reputation; and though the English Souldiers shewed no less valour, in being conquered, then the Normans did in conquering? One circumstance may not be omitted, that King Harold as an expert General, had ordered his men in so firm a Body, that no force of the Normans could disorder their Ranks, till Duke William used a Stratagem, commanding his men to retire, and to counterfeit flight; by which he drew the English on, upon a hollow ground covered with earth; whereinto many of them fell and perished, and besides into an ambush of his horsemen, which unexpectedly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces. Which, there seems one great error to have been committed (at least, if it were an error, and not rather a necessity) that there was not a supplemental Army provided; (as his Brother Gyrth would have had it) which might have come on if the first had failed, and would have been of great advantage against a wearied Army. But when Sic visum est superis, all humane force is weak and cannot withstand, all humane Providence is unprovided, and cannot prevent. It is true, Duke William that day fought so valiantly, that he had three Horses killed under him: but King Harold shewed no less valour, in killing many Normans with his own hands: so as the fight continued doubtful along time; till at last, King Harold being struck into the brains with an Arrow, fell down dead: upon whose falling, a

A base Norman Souldier, cut off one of his thighs, while he was yet breathing: which Duke William hearing, was so much offended, that he caused the Souldier to be disarmed, and with shame cashiered. The body of King Harold, his Mother Thyra offered a great sum, to have it delivered to her; but the Duke out of the nobleness of his mind, would take no money; but delivered it freely, and then it was buried in Waltham Abbey; which himself had begun to build; at least, to repair. But here Gyranus Cambrensis tells a strange story, that Harold was not slain in the Battail, but only wounded and lost his left eye, and then escaped by flight to Chester, where he afterwards led a holy Anchorets life, in the Cell of St. James, slain by St. Johns Church.

How Duke William proceeded after his Victory at Hastings.

AS his Valour won him the Victory, so his Victory won him a Crown; that now of an old Duke, he was suddenly become a young King: and indeed, nothing so much renews life, and makes the years in a manner young again, as addition of honour, specially when it is the fruit of merit. First therefore, having given publick thanks to God for his happy success, he led his Army towards London, not the direct way (perhaps doubting of some new encounter) but coasting about through part of Kent, through Sussex, Surry, Hampshire, and Barkshire, Where at Wallingford he passed over the Thames; and then through Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hartfordshire, until he came to Barkhamstead, where there came unto him Aldred Archbishop of York, Woolstan Bishop of Worcester, Wilfere Bishop of Hereford, and many other Prelates, accompanied with Edgar Atheling, with Earl Edwyn and Marchar, Brothers; and men of the greatest sway in the Kingdom, and many others of the Nobility. It is true, upon the defeat at Hastings, Earl Edwyn and Marchar, had a purpose to set up Edgar Atheling, as next Heir of the Royal blood; and Grandchild to Edmund Ironside, and so beloved of the people, that he was called their darling: but considering his young years, and other inabilities, but specially finding the minds of the Bishops, (who at that time bare all the sway) to be otherwise inclined, they desisted from that course, and thus the Duke without any opposition, coming to London, was received by Bishops and Lords, and all, with great joy, though small gladness, and if he had not their hearts, yet he had their knees, for in most humble manner they submitted themselves to him, acknowledging him for their Sovereign Lord, and upon Christmas day after, he was Crowned at Westminster by Aldred Archbishop of York, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Stigand, not being admitted to do that office, for some defect in his Investiture; and perhaps for some asperion in his manners.

Duke William is Crowned King of England.

How he rewarded his Followers.

THOUGH he hath had the name of Conquerour, yet he used not the Kingdom as gotten by Conquest, for he took no mans living from him, nor dispossessed any of their goods, but such only, whose demerit made unworthy to hold them; as appears by his Act to one Warren a Norman, to whom he had given the Castle of Sherborne in Norfolk; for when Sherborne, who was owner of it, acquainted the King, that the Castle was his, and that he had never born Arms against him; he presently commanded Warren, to deliver it quietly up unto him. Only vacancies of Offices, and filling up the places of those who were slain or fled, were the present means he made use of, for preferring his Followers. One special preferment we cannot omit, that where one Herlowyn a Noble man in Normandy, had married his Mother Arlotte, and had by her a Son named Hugh Lupus, he gave to the said Hugh, the Earldom of Chester, to hold of him as freely by his Sword, as himself held England by his Crown, by virtue of which Grant, the said Hugh ordained under him four Barons, Nigel, he made Baron of Hglton; Matbank, Baron of Nantwich; Eustace, Baron of Mawpafe, and Vernon, Baron of Shiplrooke. Such an honour, as no Subject before or since ever enjoyed the like. Also he gave to his Nephew Alane Earl of Brittain, the better to secure the Kings gift, built him a strong Castle near to his Mannor of Gillingham, and named it Richmont; from which Castle the Earls of Richmont bear their titles of honour.

He useth his conquest moderately.

What means he used for securing himself in the Kingdom.

BESIDES the Oath of Fealty, which he took of all his Lords both Spiritual and Temporal, at his Coronation; in Lent following going into Normandy, he took along with him the greatest part of the great men of the Kingdom, of whom, Edwyn and Marchar, the two Earls of Northumberland and Mercia, Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, Edgar Atheling, Waltbeoff Son to Syward formerly Earl of Northumberland, and Agelnoth Abbot of Glastenbury were the chief; leaving the care of the Kingdom in his absence to Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his Brother by the Mother; and to William Fitz Osborne, whom he had made Earl of Hereford: and to abate the greatness of the Prelates, which at that time was grown in a manner unlimited, he ordained that from thenceforth they should not command with any Temporal Authority whatsoever. And because the common people are no less to be feared for their number, then the Nobility for their greatness, he first took from them all their Armour, to the end, that leaving them without stings, they might afterward be but Droans. And because there is seldome any danger from singular numbers, but all the danger ariseth from plurality: therefore to prevent conspiracies and combinations, which are commonly contrived in the night, he commanded that in all Towns and Villages a Bell should be rung at eight a clock in the Evening, and that in every house they should then put out their Fire and Lights (which was called Courte seu) and go to Bed. And for more security he erected Castles in the most doubtful places of the Kingdom. One at Tork, another at Lincoln, a third at Nottingham, (at that time called Snottingham) and a fourth at Hastings, where he first landed. By these means the Kingdom was quiet all the time of his being away at Normandy, saving only that Edrick the Forester in the County of Hereford, calling in to his aid the Kings of Wales, made some small disturbance: And indeed all the States of the Kingdom might in his very person find something to make them apt to tolerate his Government. For first, the People might think themselves in a fort advanced, being now made members of a greater body; when the Dukedom of Normandy should come to be annexed to the Kingdom of England; and by experience of his good Government being a Duke, they might well hope, he would not govern worse being made a King. And the Nobility might be well content, as having a King of their former Kings choosing, and though a stranger, yet no Alien, as having in him many veins of the same blood, and therefore likely also to have some veins of the same goodness of their good King Edward. But specially the Clergy could not chuse but be content, as having a King who came commended to them, by a commending as strong as a commanding, the Popes Benediction.

What Troubles or insurrections were during his Reign.

Whose sister Margaret King Malcolm married.

But the body of a State being more obnoxious to crudities and ill humours, than the state of a Natural body; it is impossible to continue long without distempers; notwithstanding any preservatives that can be applied. And therefore in the second year of his reign, brake forth the discontentment of Edgar Atheling, justly the first, as having most cause, being the next of the late Royal blood, and therefore the most apt to be sensible of servitude; who taking along with him his mother Agatha, and his two sisters, Margaret and Christine, stole secretly away to Sea, with intention to pass into Hungary, the Countrey where he was born; but by contrary winds was cast upon the coasts of Scotland, where the King Malcolm, not only most kindly entertained him, but for a stricter bond of kindness took his Sister Margaret to Wife, by whom he had many children, out of which, in the second Generation after, a match was found, by which in the person of King Henry the second, the Saxon and Norman blood were conjoynd, the union whereof continues in the race of our Kings of England to this day. Not long after to Edgar in Scotland, came the two great Earls, Edwyn and Marchar, brothers to Agatha the late King Harold's Wife; also Hereward, Gospatrick, and Synard, with many other Lords; and shortly after Stigand and Aldred Archbishops, with divers of the Clergy. And these Lords being together in Scotland, did but watch opportunity, to recover that, which for want of taking opportunity they had lost; And assisted by the Scots, they invade the North parts, spoyling the Countrey, and killing many for the fault they had themselves committed, but all they could do, was but to forrage the Countrey, and so return.

After this, in the third year of his reign, the two Sons of Swayne King of Denmark, Harold and Cnutin, with a fleet of 240 ships entred Humber, and invaded the North parts, with whom the English Lords in Scotland joyned, and forraged all the Countrey, till they came near to Tork. When the Normans that were in the Town, to save the City, set fire on the Suburbs; but the fire not so contented, by assistance of a violent wind, took hold of the City it self, burning a great part of it, and which perhaps was more worth then the City, a Library of excellent books; and the Normans that were left in defence of the City, to the number of three thousand, were all slain. King William hearing hereof was so much incensed, that with all speed he raised an Army, and entred Northumberland, waiting the Countrey that already lay wast; and yet for all this great rage, was contented with a great sum of money, to purchase the Danes departure. By these devastations in many Shires of the Kingdom, but especially in Northumberland, so great a Dearth and Famine followed, that men were glad to eat horses and dogs, cats and rats, and what else is most abhorrent to nature; and between Tork and Durham the space of 60 miles, for nine years together, there was so utter desolation, as that neither any house was left standing, nor any ground tilled.

Many other insurrections there were in his reign; as at Excester, at Oxford, in the Isle of Ely, and many times by the Scots in the Northern parts; the most dangerous of all the conspiracies, and most distasteful of him, was that of Roger Fitz Aube Earl of Hereford, Ralph Waler Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, Waltheoff Earl of Northumberland, with Eustace Earl of Boloinne, (sent purposely, as it was thought, by the King of France into England to incite and joyn with the conspirators) Ralph Waler married the Sister of Roger the young Earl of Hereford, contrary to the express commandement of K. William: at the solemnization of the marriage, these Lords conspire to keep the King now in Normandy, and dispossess him of his soveraignty, which to perform, they agreed

A agreed to joyn theirs with the Danish forces, whom they intended to call in. This was the most dangerous combination of all, it happening when he was out of England at the siege of Dole; a Castle in Brittain belonging to Ralph Waler, and defended against him by the King of France: and at such a time as almost all Christendom had declared their jealousies of him, and ill affections towards him. The King of Scotland, and Princes of Wales ready to assist the rebels at home; Swayne King of Denmark invading England with a Navie of 200. sail, to which Drone King of Ireland, added 65. Ships. How much such an action did distaste and offend him, may be conjectured, by that most of these great Noblemen were either his kinsmen, or in affinity nearly allied to him. But William's fortune secures him as well at home against Traitors, as in the field against his Enemies. This grand conspiracy is discovered by Waltheoff to Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, who persuades the Earl to go over to King William and inform him in what danger he was. Notwithstanding this discovery, Roger and Ralph persist in their intentions, raise forces to prosecute their designs: but by the diligence of Odo the Kings Brother B. of Baton, the Bishop of Worcester, and the Abbot of Evesham, were so prevented that they could never unite their forces. Ralph flies into France, Roger Earl of Hereford is taken, put in prison, and as some report; to death; Waltheoff, of all lamented, beheaded. But all these were easily suppressed, for they were but scattered Forces; Et dum singuli pugnant, universi vincuntur; whereas if they had united themselves into an Army: they might perhaps have made it a War, which now were little more then Routs and Riots. Yet some write, that King William granted Cumberland to Malcolm King of Scots, to hold from him conditionally, that the Scots should not attempt any thing prejudicial to the Crown of England, for which grant King Malcolm did him homage.

The greatest and last was an Insurrection raised in Normandy, by his Son Robert, the more dangerous because unnatural, for by the instigation and assistance of Philip King of France, (emulous now of King William's greatness) he entred Normandy, and claimed it as in his own right. His father indeed had made him a promise of it long before, but Robert impatient of delay, as counting so long staying to be little better then disinheriting, endeavoured by strong hand to wrest it from his father. But his father King William hearing hereof, with a strong Army passed over into Normandy, where in a battail meeting hand to hand with his Son, he was by him unhorsed, and hurt in the arm: but his Son perceiving him by his voyce to be his father, suddenly leaps off his horse, takes up his father, casts himself down at his feet, and humbly intreats his pardon; which as a father he easily grants, embraceth his Son, and ever after, the Son from the Father had fatherly love; and the Father from the Son a filial obedience. But though his Father did thus pardon him, yet it seems there is a Nemesis, or to say better, a Divine Providence, that did not pardon him; for after this, it is observed he never prospered in any thing he undertook. It cannot perhaps be discovered, whether the Kings severity begat his subjects Insurrections; or his subjects Nurfes each of them to other. Yet after this, King William so far trusted his Son Robert, that he sent him with an Army against Malcolm King of Scotland, who had invaded Northumberland: but at the coming of Duke Robert retired: at which time, Duke Robert began the foundation of a Castle upon the River of Tyne; whereof the Town of Newcastle did after take both beginning and name: which before this time was called Monceaster. In his 20. year in Whitsun week, he honoured his Son Henry with the order of Knighthood, wherein what Ceremony he used, is not certainly known; but it is worth observing, that before his time, the custom among the Saxons was; first, he who should receive the order of Knighthood, confessed himself in the evening to a Priest: Then he continued all that night in the Church; watching and applying himself to his private devotion. The next morning, he heard Mass, and offered his Sword upon the Altar. After the Gospel was read, the Sword was hallowed, and with a benediction put about his neck. Lastly, He communicated the mysteries of the blessed Body of Christ; and from that time, remained a perfect Knight. But this custom of consecrating Knights, the Normans abhorred.

His Son Robert riseth in arms against him.

He unhorseth his father.

His aptness to forget Injuries.

Certainly there is no such goodness of nature, as aptness to be reconciled; of which vertue it seems King William had a large proportion, for he seldom remembered injuries after submission. Edrick the first that rebelled against him, he placed in Office near about him. Gospatrick, who had been a factious man, and a plotter of conspiracies against him, he made Earl of Glocester, and trusted him with managing a war against Malcolm King of Scots. Eustace Earl of Boloinne, who in the Kings absence in Normandy attempted to seize upon Dover Castle, he received afterward into great favour and respect. The Earls Marchar and Synard, with Wolnoth the brother of Harold, a little before his death, he released out of Prison. Edgar, who as next heir to the Saxon Kings, had often attempted by Arms to recover his right, he not only after twice defection pardoned, but gave him also allowance as a Prince: It is said twenty shillings a day, or rather a pound weight of Silver, and other large livings beside; so as Edgar finding the sweetness of safety, and the pleasures of a Countrey life, spent the rest of his dayes (which were many) retired from Court, neither envying nor being envied. Only Waltheoff, Earl of Northumberland, and Northampton, of all the English Nobility was put to death in all the time of this Kings reign; and nor he neither, till he had twice falsified his Oath of Allegiance.

Of new Acquests to this Kingdom, by this Kings means.

An. Reg. 13.

IN the thirteenth year of his Reign, he subdued Wales, and made it tributary to him, as before in the seventh year of his Reign, he brought Malcolm King of Scots to do him Homage, and thereupon to give him Hostages; that if England made him greater then he was before, a King of a Duke; he no less made England greater then it was before, three Kingdoms in one.

Of his Exactions and Courses for Raising of Money.

AS his Taxations were many in number, so they were various in kind, not always bringing in money directly, but sometimes obliquely saving it. The first Tax he laid upon his Subjects was in the first year of his reign, after his return out of Normandy; a grievous Tax all Writers say, but none what it was. In the third year of his reign he ranked all Monasteries, and all the gold and silver of either Chalices or Shrines, he took to his own use. Moreover, whereas many of the more principal; and richer persons of the Realm, fearing King Williams cruelty, and insatiable desire of moneys, deposited their Treasures, Jewels and chiefest commodities in the Monasteries and Abbeys, as in sure sanctuaries to be safely kept for their own uses; the King violently seized on all for himself, neither regarding the sanctity of the places, nor what injustice he did to his own subjects, but as a Conquering Tyrant made their poverty his own security. Likewise he seized all Bishops and Abbots what number of Souldiers they should find to serve him in his wars: also the strangers which he maintained in Pay, he dispersed into Religious houses, and some also among the Nobility to be maintained at their charge. Many other Taxations he made, but last of all in the eighteenth year of his reign, by the advice of

Winton, or Doomed-day Book.

Roger Earl of Hertford, he caused the whole Realm to be described in a Censal Roll, (whereof he took a Precedent from King Alfred) so as there was not one Hyde of Land, but both the yearly rent, and the owner thereof was therein set down: How many Ploughlands, what Pastures, Fens or Marishes, what Woods, Farms, and Tenements were in every Shire, and what every one was worth: Also how many Villains every man had; what Beasts, what Cattel, what Fees, what other goods, what rent or commodity his Possessions did yield. This Book was called the Roll of Winton, because it was kept in the City of Winchester. By the English it was called Doomed-day book, either by reason of the generality thereof, or else corruptly, in stead of Domus Dei book, for that it was laid in the Church of Winchester, in a place called Domus Dei. According to this Roll Taxations were imposed, sometimes two shillings, and at this time six shillings upon every Hyde of Land, (a Hyde containing, as some account it, twenty Acres, but as Master Lambert proveth, a hundred Acres). In all those Lands which he gave to any man, he reserved Dominion in chief to himself, as also a yearly rent, and likewise a Fine whensoever the Tenant did alien or die. These were bound to him by Oath of Fealty and Homage, and if any died, his heir being within age, the King received the profits of his Lands, and had the custody and disposing of the heirs body, until his age of one and twenty years. To be short, his greediness of money, was so great, that he spared not his own brother Odo, but found accusations against him, to the end he might seize upon his Treasure; which was infinite great, and which he had gathered in hope to buy the Papacy. Only one kind of profit he forbore to meddle with, that is, Vacancies of Abbeys and Bishopricks; which he always reserved for the Successors: but then he took another course of far greater profit, for he compelled all men to make new Fines at his pleasure, for confirmation of any Grant or Privileges formerly granted by any Prince of the Realm: by which devise he got into his possession the greatest part of all the riches of the Land, as well of the Clergy, as of the Laity. And one particular may not be omitted that is reported of him, which was this: The Monks of Ely, to purchase their peace, agreed to give him seven hundred Marks, when coming to pay it, there wanted a Groat in the weight, (for in those days greater sums were not paid by tale, but by weight) which the King understanding, denied them all composition for Peace, until with much suit he was intreated to accept of a thousand Marks more.

Of his Laws and Ordinances, and Courts of Justice erected by him.

ALTHOUGH at his Coronation he had taken an Oath to observe the Laws of King Edward then in use, yet afterwards (perhaps counting his Coronation Oath but a matter of course) he abrogated many, and in their stead brought in the Laws of Normandy; commanding them to be written in French; and also that all Causes should be Pleaded, and all matters of Forms dispatched in French; upon a pretense to dignify the French tongue, but with a purpose to intrap men through ignorance of the language, as indeed it did: or perhaps to make the Norman language predominant in the Kingdom as he had made their persons; which yet was so far from effecting, that there is not so much as any footsteps remaining of the Norman language in the English tongue. Forms of Judgment, and tryals by Fire and Water, called Ordeal, formerly used, used, were in short time after the Conquest disused, and in the end utterly abrogated by the Pope, as derived from Paganism. That of Combat continued longer, but of no ordinary use: and all actions both criminal and real, began now to be wholly adjudged by the Verdict of twelve men, according to the custome of Normandy, where the like form is used, and called by the name of Enquest, with the same cautions for the Jurors, as it is here continued to this day; though by the Laws of Etheldred it appears, that the trial by twelve men was in use long before his time. And where before the Bishop and the Alderman were the absolute Judges to determine all business in every Shire, and the Bishop, in many Cases shared in the benefit of the Mulcts with the King; now he confined the Clergie within the Province of their own Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, to deal only in business concerning rule of souls, according to the Canons and Laws Episcopall. And where the Causes of the Kingdom were before determined in every Shire, and by a Law of King Edward, all matters in question were upon special penalty decided in their Gemote, or Conventicle held monetly in every Hundred: now he ordained that four times in the year, for certain daies, the same businesses should be determined in such places as he would appoint, where he constituted Judges to attend for that purpose. Also he decreed there should be Sheriffs in every Shire, and Justices of Peace for punishment of Malefactors. Finally, he ordained his Council of State, his Chancery, his Exchequer, (Scacarium, corruptly called so, of the word Statarium, or rather of the board or Table, where the Officers sat;) also his Courts of Justice, which always removed with his Court. These places he furnished with officers, and assigned four Terms in the year for determining controversies among the people.

He brought in the trial by
twelve men.

The place of these Courts was Westminster, where King William Rufus afterwards built a stately Palace. Now for his provisionary Revenues, the Kings Tenants, who held Lands of the Crown, paid him no money at all, but only Corn and other Victuals; and a just note of the quality and quantity of every mans ratemement, was taken throughout all the Shires of the Kingdom, and levied ever certain, for maintenance of the Kings house. Only the Kentish men procured the continuance of their ancient Laws by a trick; for King William riding towards Dover, at Swancombe, two miles from Gravesend, the Kentish men met him, but in the form of a moving wood, by reason of the great boughs they had cut, and carried in their hands, and compassing the King about, they only made suit for the continuance of their Laws, and Customes; of which one special was, that the Tenure of their Lands was Gavelkind; by which they defended not the eldest alone, as in other Countreys, but were partable between all the Sons: and the Priviledges which the owners of such Lands enjoyed were chiefly these: Not to forfeit them for Felony: Not to be subject to services before the Justices: Not to be challenged for Villains. So the Conquerour considering, that he might as well allow them, as other Kings had done before him, easily condescended to their request. But see the levity of these Kentish men, to hazard themselves more, for the preserving a simple Custome; then for preserving the Liberty of themselves, and their Countrey: But such is the violence of conceit, till it be mastered by time, or rather to very a Changeling is Humane Reason, that what they then cut down great Woods to defend, they have since been content to see abolished, without cutting down so much as a twig. But one Law especially he made, extremely distasteful to all the Gentry of the Land, for where before they might at their pleasure hunt, and take Deer which they found abroad in the woods; now it was ordained under a great penalty, no less than putting out their eyes; that none should presume to kill, or take any of them, as reserving them only for his own delight. And indeed so great delight he took in that kind of sport, that he depopulated a great part of Hampshire, the space of thirty miles, where there had been (saith Caxton) six and twenty Towns, and fourscore Religious Houses, and made it a habitation for such kind of Beasts; which was then, and to this day is called the New Forest. But the lamentable disasters that have happened to this Kings issue, do plainly shew, that there is a Power, that observes all our Actions, and which we may know to be Memorem Fandi atque Nefandi. But in the first year of this Kings Reign, he granted to the City of London, their first Charter and Liberties, in as large form, as they enjoyed them in the time of King Edward the Confessor, which he granted at the suit of William a Norman, Bishop of London; in grateful remembrance whereof, the Lord Major and Aldermen, upon the solemn daies of their resort to Pauls, do still use to walk to the Grave-stone, where this Bishop lies interred. Also this King was the first, that brought the Jewes to inhabit here in England: as likewise he made a Law, that whosoever forced a woman should lose his Genitals: and in his time, long Bowes came first into use in England, which as they were the weapons with which France under this King conquered England: so they were the weapons with which England under after Kings, conquered France; as if it were not enough for us to beat them, if we did not beat them with their own weapons. This King also appointed a Constable of Dover Castle, and a Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, with Immunities, as they are at this day. And to be short, this King ordained so good Laws, and had them so well executed; that it is said a girl might carry a bag of Money all the Countrey over without danger of robbing; and in his time, the setting Seals to Bonds and Writings was first used, where before there were only witnesses to Deeds.

IN his time, Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, was for divers causes deprived of his dignity, and kept private all his life after in the Castle of Winchester: after whom succeeded Lanfrank, an Italian, in that See: who in the twelfth year of this Kings Reign, held a Synod at London, where amongst other things he removed Bishops Sees, from small Towns to great Cities, as from Sillway to Chichester; from Kyrton to Excester; from Wells to Bathe; from Shirborn to Salisbury; from Dorchester to Lincoln; and from Lichfield to Chester, and from thence again to Coventry: and not long before, the Bishoprick of Lindisfern, otherwise called Holy Land, upon the River Tweede, had been translated to Durham. In the sixth year of his reign, a controverſie arising between the two Archbishops of Canterbury and York, they appealed to Rome, and the Pope remitted it to the King and Bishops of England. Hereupon a Synod is holden at Windsor, where sentence was given on Lanfrank, then Archbishop of Canterbury side: That in matters of Religion, the Archbishop of York, should ever be subject to the Archbishop of Canterbury: Only at Rome it was decreed, for matter of Title, that the See of York should be stiled Primas Anglie; and the See of Canterbury, Primas totius Anglie, as it is at this day. And as the Archbishop of York oweth obedience to the Archbishop of Canterbury; so all the Bishops of Scotland owe obedience to the Archbishop of York, as to the Primate of Scotland. It shall not be amiss here to write the journey of Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury to Rome; who in the fifth year of King William's Reign made Bishop of Canterbury, went to Rome to obtain the Pall, due to Archbishops, taking for his companions Thomas Archbishop of York, and Remigius Bishop of Lincoln; arrived at Rome, and admitted to the Popes presence, Pope Alexander rose from his seat, and gently saluting him, faith with all, This honour I do not give, as due to your Archbishoprick, but as due to my Master: to whose labour I must acknowledge to be due what learning I have. The next day having audience he accused the two companions of his journey.

But as this King took down the Prelates in Temporalities, for he ordained they should exercise no Temporal Authority at all; so in Spiritualities, he rather raised them, as may be seen by a passage between Aldred Archbishop of York and the King: for at a time, upon the repulse of a certain suitor, the Archbishop in great discontentment offered to depart, when the King in awe of his displeasure, stayed him, fell down at his feet, desired pardon, and promised to grant his suit. The King all this while being down at the Archbishops feet, the Noblemen that were present put him in mind that he should cause the King to rise: Nay (saith the Archbishop) let him alone, let him find what it is to anger Saint Peter. And as by this story we see the insulting pride of a Prelate in those daies: so by another, we may see the equivocating falsehood of a Prelate at that time; For Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury would often swear, he had not one penny upon the Earth, when under the Earth it was afterwards found he had hidden great Treasure. Also it is memorable, but scarce credible of another Bishop, who being accused of Simonie, and denying it, the Cardinal before whom he was to answer, told him that a Bishoprick was the gift of the Holy Ghost; and therefore to buy a Bishoprick, was against the Holy Ghost, and thereupon bid him say, Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; which the Bishop beginning, and oft assaying, could never say [and to the Holy Ghost] but said it plainly when he was put out of his Bishoprick. And yet was not the Church in that age so barren of virtue, but that it afforded some good Bishops, as William Bishop of Durham, Founder of University-Colledge in Oxford, but specially Bishop Woolstan; whom upon Lanfranks reporting to be insufficient for the place, for want of Learning, the King commanded to put off his Pontifical Robes, and to leave his Bishoprick: when suddenly out of a divine Inspiration, Woolstan answered: A better then you, O King, belottowed these Robes upon me, and to him I will restore them. And therewithall going to St. Edwards shrine, who had made him a Bishop, and putting off his Robes, he struck his Staffe upon St. Edwards Monument, which stuck so fast in the stone of it, that by no strength it could be drawn forth, till he drew it forth himself: which so terrified both Lanfrank and the King, that they intreated him to take his Robes again, and keep his Bishoprick. Also Oswald Bishop of Salisbury, who devised a Form of Prayers to be daily used in his Church, and was used afterwards in other Churches, from whence proceeded the common saying of Secundum usum Sarum. In this Kings time was Berengarius, who denied the true body of Christ to be in the Sacrament; Also in his time, Pope Gregory the seventh, removed married Priests from executing Divine Service, whereof great troubles arose in England: also in his time was instituted the Feast of the conception of the Virgin Mary: also in his time, Pope Gregory the seventh, in a Synod holden at Rome, ordained that none should be called Pope but only the Bishop of Rome; where before all Bishops were called Popes.

Works of Piety, by him, and others in his time.

THis King founded the Abbey of Battell in Sussex, where he overcame Harold, as a monument in memory of his victory; but there succeeded a greater monument in memory of this battel, if it be true which Nenrigensis faith, that after every small rain, the grafs where the battel was fought, shews to be of the colour of blood, and had continued to do so, to his dayes, who lived in the time of King Stephen, almost an hundred years after the battail was fought. The Abbey of Selby in Yorkshire; and a third near London, called St. Saviours. He founded also the Priory of St. Nicholas at Excester; and gave great privileges to St. Martins le Grand in London; which Church was founded before the Conquest, by Ingebricus and Emardus his Brother, Cousins to King Edward the Confessor. He also builded the Tower of London: namely the great white and square Tower there. These were this Kings works of Piety in England; but in Normandy he founded also an Abbey at Caen: where his Wife Maude built also a Monastery of Nuns. He gave also to the Church of St. Stephens in Caen, two Manors in Dorsetshire, one Manor in Devonshire, another in Essex, much land in Barkshire, some in Norfolk, a Mansion in Woodstreet, London; with many Advowsons of Churches; and even he gave his Crown and Regal Ornaments to the said Church, being of his own Foundation, for the redemption whereof, his Son Henry gave the Mannor of Brydleton in Dorsetshire. In this Kings time, Robert, Son to Hyldebert Lacies founded the Priory of Pouffraight; Henry Earl Ferrers founded a Priory within his Castle at Tutbury; Alwyne Chylde, a Citizen of London, founded the Monastery of St. Saviours at Burmondsey in Southwark, and gave the Monks there divers Rents in London: Also in this Kings time, Maurice Bishop of London, after the firing of the former Church of St. Paul in London, began the foundation of the new Church, a work so admirable, that many thought it would never have been finished. Towards the building of the East end whereof, the King gave the choice stones of his Castle, at the West end of the City, upon the bank of the River Thames; which Castle having been at that time fired, in place thereof Edward Kilmarly Archbishop of Canterbury, did afterwards found a Monastery of Black-fryers. The King also gave the Mannor of Starford to the same Maurice, and to his successours in that See; after whose decease, Richard his next successour bestowed all the Rents of his Bishoprick to advance the building of this Church, maintaining himself by his private Patrimony; and yet all he could do, made no great shew, but the finishing of the work was left to many other succeeding Bishops. In the fifteenth year of this Kings reign, William Bishop of Durham, founded University-Colledge in Oxford: Also one Gillert a Norman Lord, founded the Abbey of Merton in Surrey, seven miles from London; and Thomas Archbishop of York, first builded the Minster of York. In this Kings sixteenth year, his Brother Duke Robert being sent against the Scots, builded a Fort, where at this day standeth New-Castle upon Tyne: but the Town and Walls were builded afterward by King John. Also in this Kings time Ledes Castle in Kent was builded by Creveken, and the Castle of Oxford, by Robert d'Oyle: two Noble men that came into England with him. Osmund Bishop of Salisbury builded the new Church there; Also Waring Earl of Shrewsbury, built two Abbeys, one in the Suburbs of Shrewsbury; and another at Wenlock.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN the twentieth year of his Reign, so great a fire happened in London, that from the West-gate to the East-gate, it consumed Houses and Churches all the way, and amongst the rest the Church of St. Paul, the most grievous fire that ever happened in that City. Also this year, by reason of distemperature of Weather, thunders and lightnings, by which many men perished, there ensued a famine, and afterwards a miserable mortality of Men and cattel; and which is very strange, Hens, Peacocks, Geese and Ducks bred in, and accustomed to houses forsook their wonted hives, and turned wilde. (Matth. Westmon. An. Dom. 1087.) Also this year in the Province of Wales, upon the Sea-shore, was found the body of Gawen, Sisters son to Arthur, the great King of the Britains: reported to be fourteen foot in length. Also in this Kings time, a great Lord sitting at a Feast, was set upon by Mice, and though he were removed from Land to Sea, and from Sea again to Land, yet the Mice still followed him; and at last devoured him.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE had to Wife, and her only, Mathilde or Maude, Daughter to Baldwyn Earl of Flanders. She was Crowned Queen of England, the second year of his reign: the seventeenth year of his reign, she dyed; a Woman only memorable for this, that nothing memorable is recorded of her, but that she built a Nunnery at Caen in Normandy, where she lies buried. By her he had four Sons and five Daughters. His Sons were, Robert, Richard, William, and Henry: of whom Robert the eldest called Court-cayse, of his short Thighs, or Court-hose, of his short Breeches, or Courtois, of his courteous behaviour: (for so many are the comments upon his name) succeeded his Father in the Dutchy of Normandy. Richard his second Son was kill'd by misfortune, hunting in the New-Forest. William his third Son, called Rufus, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of England. Henry his youngest Son, called Beauclerk, for his learning, had by his Fathers will, five thousand pounds in money, and the inheritance also of his Mother. His Daughters were Cicelle, Constance, Adela, Margaret, and Elenor, of whom Cicelle was Abbess of Caen in Normandy. Constance was married to Alan Earl of Britain. Adela to Stephen Earl of Blois. Margaret affianced to Harold King of England, but never married, and died young. Elenor, betrothed to Alphonso King of Gallicia, but desiring to die a Virgin, she had her wish, spending her time so much in Prayer, that with continual kneeling her knees were brawned.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was but mean of stature, yet big of Body, and therewithall so strong, that few were able to draw his Bow: growing in years, he was Bald before; his beard alwaies shaven, after the manner of the Normans; and in his younger time, he was much given to that infirmity of Youth, which grows out of strength of Youth, Incontinency: after he was once married, whether out of satiety, or out of Grace, he was never known to offend in that kind. Of perfect health, that he was never sick, till that sickness whereof he died. Of a stern countenance, yet of an affable nature: In War, as expert as valiant: In Peace, as provident as prudent: and in all his Enterprizes, as fortunate, as bold and hardy. Much given to Hunting and Feasting, where he was no less pleasant then magnificent. He made no great proficiency in learning; as having had his Education in the licentiousness of the French Court; yet he favoured learned men; and drew out of Italy, Langfrank, Anselm, Durand, Tarberne, and divers others, famous at that time for Learning and Piety. Very devout he was, and alwaies held the Clergy in exceeding great Reverence: And this is one special honour attributed unto him, that from him we begin the Computation of our Kings of England.

His Places of Residence.

His Christmas he commonly kept at Glocester; his Easter at Winchester; and his Whitson-tide at Westminster; and once in the year, at one of these places would be new Crowned; as though by often putting on his Crown, he thought to make it sit the easier upon his head. And for the houses which the Kings of England had in those daies in London; I find that at Westminster was a Palace, the ancient habitation of the Kings of England, from the time of Edward the Confessor: which in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth, was by casual fire burnt down to the ground. A very large and stately Palace this was, and in that Age, for building, incomparable. The Remains whereof, are the Chamber of assembling the High Court of Parliament, and the next unto it; wherein anciently they were wont to begin the Parliament, called St. Edwards Painted Chamber, because the Tradition holdeth, that the said King Edward died in it. Adjoining unto this, is the White-hall, wherein at this pay the Court of Requests is kept: Beneath this, is the Great Hall, where Courts of Justice are now kept: This Hall which we now have, was built by King Richard the second, out of the ground; as appeareth by his Arms engraven in the stone work: (when he had plucked down the old Hall, built before by William Rufus) and made it his own habitation. But the aforesaid Palace, after it was burnt down in anno 1512. lay desolate, and King Henry the Eighth shortly after translated the Kings seat, to a house not far off, built by Cardinal Woolsey; and is called White-hall. The Tower of London was anciently used by the Kings of England to lodge in. Other Houses they anciently had; one where Bridewel now standeth, out of the ruines whereof, the now Bridewel was built. Another called the Tower Royal, now the Kings Wardrobe. Another in Bucklers-bury, called Sermes Tower. Another where now the Popes-head Tavern is, over against the Old Exchange, thought to have been the Kings house; also another in Lincolntre called the Kings Artifice. Also another in the Old Jury: and oft-times they made

And as for his Arms, he gave Three Lions passant Gold in a Field Gules; which have ever since been used as peculiar to the Crown of England; to which the three Flowre de Luces were added by King Edward the Third, by reason of his claim to the Crown of France.

His Death and Burial.

Towards the end of his reign, he appointed his two Sons Robert and Henry with joyne authority, Governours of Normandy: These went together, to visit the King of France lying at Constance; where entertaining the time with variety of sports, Henry played with Lewis the Heir of France at Chesse, and winning much money of him, Lewis grew so cholericke, that he threw the Chesse-men at Henries face; calling him the Son of a Bastard: and thereupon Henry struck Lewis with the Chesse-board, and had presently slain him, if his Brother Robert had not stepped in, and stayed him. Upon this the King of France invades Normandy, and draws Robert, King William's eldest Son, to joyn with him against his Father: but King William coming presently over with an Army, was soon reconciled to his Son, yet being corpulent and in years, was by this means much dis tempered in body, and so retired to Rom, where he stayed, as not being well in health. The French King hearing of his sickness, scoffingly said, that he lay in Child-bed of his great belly. Which so incensed King William, that he swore by Gods Resurrection and his Brightness, (his usual Oath) that as soon as he should be Churchd of that child, he would offer a thousand Lights in France: and indeed he performed it; for he entred France in Arms, and set many Towns and Corn-fields on fire, in which he was so violent, that by reason of his travail and the unreasonable heat, being in the month of August, it brought upon him a relapse of his sickness, and withal, leaping on Horseback over a ditch, his fat belly did bear so hard upon the pommel of his saddle, that he took a rupture in his inner parts; whereupon returning to Rom, his sickness so increased, that in short time he dyed; and that which is scarce credible, yet recorded for certain, the very same day he dyed at Rom, his death was known at Rome, a thousand miles off: which if it be true, it seems there are certain Invisible Intelligencers, that can make such speed: whereof Freissard tells a strange story: and for the strangeness, not unworthy to be there related. There was (saith he) in the time of King Edward the Third, a Knight in France, called Covasse, who could tell any thing that was done all the World over, the very day it was done; or within a day or two, how far so ever it were off: and this he did by such an invisible Intelligencer, for he had gotten a Familiar Spirit, called Orthone, who brought him the news continually; and held on this course with him divers years till at last he lost him, by this occasion. He had only heard the voyce of his spirit Orthone: and now had a great longing to see his shape: whereupon the spirit seeing his earnestness; Well then (saith he) to morrow morning when you rise out of your bed, the first thing you see shall be I. So the Knight rising the next morning, looked out, but could see nothing: whereupon he blamed his spirit Orthone, for not keeping his promise with him. Orthone answered, he had kept his promise: for saith he, bethink your self, what it was you first saw after your rising. Then the Knight bethinking himself, remembered he saw two straws upon the ground, tumbling upon one another: Why (saith Orthone) that was I. Then the Knight desired he might see him in such a shape, as that he might take notice of him. Well then said Orthone, to morrow morning when you rise, the first thing you see, that shall be I. So the next morning, the Knight rising, and looking out of his chamber window, the first thing he saw was a Sow, so lean and deformed, that he could not abide to see it: and thereupon caused his men to set Dogs upon it, to drive it away: which being done, the Sow vanished away; after this his spirit Orthone, never came to him any more. And this Relation Freissard had from the Knights own mouth: and by such a like means, it might perhaps be, that the death of King William was known at Rome, the very day he dyed at Rom, though a thousand miles asunder. And now to go on with the story: William the Conquerour in all the time of his sickness retained to the very last his memory and speech. and shewed many demonstrations of his Devotion, and true contrition, specially for his severity used towards the English: And thus he who was a Conquerour of men, was conquered himself by death; the ninth day of September, when he had reigned twenty years, and near eleven months, in the threescore and fourth year of his age: Malmesbury saith in the fifty ninth. I may well say he was conquered by death; seeing death used him more despitefully, then ever he living used any whom he had conquered: For no sooner was the breath out of his body, but his attendants purloining what they could lay hands on, forsook him and fled: leaving his body almost naked upon the ground. Afterwards, William Archbishop of Rom, commanded his body should be conveyed to Caen, but his command was little regarded: till at last, one Herlewyne, a Countrey Knight, at his own charges caused his body to be Embalmed, and conveyed thither; where the Abbot and Monks meeting the corps, suddenly in the midst of their solemnities, a violent fire brake out in the Town, with the fright whereof, every man left the place; and thus was his body the second time left forlorn. In the end a few Monks returned, and accompanied the Herfe to the Abbey Church; but when the Divine Office was ended, and the body ready to be laid in the grave, one one Anselm Fits Arthur, stood up and claimed that ground to have been the Floor of his Fathers house, which King William had violently wrested from him; and thereupon charged them, as they would answer it before the dreadful face of God, not to cover his Body with the earth of his inheritance. Whereupon after some pause, agreement was made with him, and three pound was payed in hand for the ground broken up, and an hundred pounds more afterwards for the ground it self, paid him by Henry the Kings youngest Son, who only of all his Sons was present at the Funeral. And yet this was not all, but when his body was to be put in the Earth, it happened that the Sepulchre of Stone which stood within the grave, was hewen somewhat too strait for his fat belly, so as they were fain to press it down with some violence, with which, whether his bowels burst, or whether some Excrements were forced out of their natural passage, such an intolerable stink proceeded from him, that none were able to indure it, but made all the haste they could to be gone. And yet neither was this the last of his miseries; for in the year 1562. when Castillon took the City of Caen, certain dissolute Souldiers opened his Tomb, and not finding the Treasure they expected, threw forth his bones with great derision: whereof some were afterward brought into England. So that if we consider his many troubles in life, and after his death, we may well think, that notwithstanding all his greatness, a very mean man would hardly be perwaded to change fortunes with him. He bare the same Arms as peculiar to the Crown of England; which all succeeding Princes have used: namely, Three Lions passant gold in a Field Gules: for as for the three Flower de Lucies, they were added by King Edward the third, upon his claim of the Crown of France.

Men of Note in his time.

Men of Learning in his time, were but rare in this Island, yet some there were, particularly Marianus Scottus, a Historiographer, and Alphredus a Monk of Beoverly, a Writer also of Historical Argument. And as for the Men of Valour, they are not to be expected in a time of servitude, but as if all the English Valour were now remaining in the Kentish men, they only made resistance, when all other Countries had submitted. Yet it is memorable in this time, what a private Norwegian Souldier did; who himself alone upon a Bridge, resisted the whole Army of the English, slew forty of them; and maintained the place for divers hours together, till one getting under the bridge, found means to thrust up a spear into his body and killed him.

THE REIGN OF KING WILLIAM THE SECOND.

KING William the second, called Rufus, second Son to William the Conquerour, appointed Successour by his Fathers Will; was upon the fifth of October, in the year 1087. by Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, Crowned, at Westminster King of England. Wherein his Father seems to have followed the example of Jacob, who gave to his younger Son Joseph, the Land which he had taken with his Sword and his Bow: for with his Sword and his Bow, had King William gotten the Land of England; and therefore might justly bestow it on which of his Sons he pleased. And besides, there was cause enough, why he should shew this Son of his some extraordinary favour, seeing in the Rebellion of his Brother Robert, yet he stood firmly for his Father: and in his quarrel incurred no small hazard of his life, as wherein he received divers wounds: and perhaps also, his Father thought the rough disposition of this Son, fitter to bridle the insurrections of the English, then the softly disposition of his Son Robert.

But though he have thus quietly gotten the Crown, he must not look to hold it so; and indeed at his very beginning is assaulted with two troubles in one: for both his Brother Robert prepares to recover it from him, and the Lords of the Kingdom combine with Robert to assist him in it. The first mover of this trouble was Odo Bishop of Bayeux, his Uncle, who finding himself not to bear the sway he expected, and specially for an old grudge he bore to Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, and by whose means, in the former King's time he had been imprisoned, the Archbishop telling him, that though he might not imprison a Bishop, yet he might imprison an Earl of Kent (as this Odo was made not long before) he draws many other Bishops and Temporal Lords to joyn with him, in behalf of Duke Robert against the King; but though the storm were violent for a while, yet it soon passed over; that indeed of his Lords, with more difficulty: but that of his Brother Robert with more cost: for it was at last agreed, that Rufus should pay him three thousand marks a year, during his life, and leave him the Kingdom after his own decease. But there was difficulty in repressing his Rebel Lords by reason of their spreading themselves abroad in many quarters. For Odo fortified himself in Kent, Roger Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire; Hugh de Grandmunt, in Leicestershire, and Northamptonshire; Robert Mowbray Earl of Northumberland, posselt himself of Briflow; William Bishop of Durham, of the North parts of the Realm; and divers other of the Clergy, and Nobility, fortified themselves in Herefordshire, Shropshire, Worcestershire, and all the Countreys adjoining to Wales, thinking by this means to distract the King that he should not know where to begin, nor whither to turn him. But this course, as it made it hard to repress them suddenly, so it made it easie to repress them at leisure; for being thus divided, they were but as single ticks, that are easly broken; where if they had united themselves, as into a Faggot, they might have made a strength of far greater resistance. But the King having Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, and Woolstan Bishop of Worcester, firm of his side: partly by their Authority and love amongst the people; but chiefly by his own promises, to restore their ancient Laws, and to allow them liberty of hunting in his Forests, he so firmly won the hearts of all unto him; that some of the Rebel Lords he reconciled with fair words; as Robert Montgomery; (a principal line of the Faction) some again he mastered by strong hand; and Odo the chief Engineer of all the work, he besieged in the Castle of Rochester, took him Prisoner, and forced him to abjure the Realm. And thus this great Rebellion was suppressed: In which it is observable, that though so many hot bloods were up, yet there was but little blood spilt. A happy rebellion for the English; for the Rebel Lords and Bishops being all Normans, the King had none to trust to, but the English, whom for their faithfulness to him in this service, he ever after respected more than he had done before.

This year died Lanfrank, after he had been Archbishop of Canterbury eighteen years, who had brought the Monks to some good order, that before his time followed hunting and hawking, dicing and carding, to the great discredit of their profession.

After this storm was over in the South, there arose another in the North; For now Malcolm King of Scots, thinking it a fit time to do some feats when King William was troubled at home; invades Northumberland, and having burnt and spoiled the Countrey, returns home laden with booties: Which King William hearing, he takes his brother Robert along with him, and with a mighty Army enters Scotland, brings Malcolm to acknowledge his ancient homage: and upon Faith given, returns to London. After this, Duke Robert finding his brother King William not to keep his promise, in paying his Pension, complains to the King of France, and with his aid, assaults and takes some Towns; which he before had delivered in pawn for money to his brother King William; who hearing of it, hastens into Normandy with an Army, and by the mediation of money takes off the King of France, and makes his brother, being left destitute of assistance, to ask him pardon; a wife and merciful course in King William; for to buy his peace with the King of France, did cost him but money, where to have purchased it by War, must besides money, have cost the lives of many.

After this Malcolm, K. of Scots, came in kindness to visit K. William at Gloucester: but the King not vouchsafing so much as to see him, put him into so great an indignation, that returning home, he makes ready an Army, invades Northumberland, making great spoil, and getting great spoils, but by Robert Morbray, the Kings Lieutenant there, was taken in ambush, and together with his eldest Son Edward, defeated and slain. This King Malcolm was a most valiant Prince, who appeared by an Act of his of an extraordinary strain; for hearing of a conspiracy plotted to murder him, whereof one was author, whose name is not recorded, he dissembled the knowing of it, till being abroad one day a hunting, he took the fellow apart from the company, and being alone, said unto him: Here now is a fit time and place, to do that manfully, which you have intended to do treacherously; draw your weapon, and if you kill me, none being present; you can incur no danger; with which speech of the King, the fellow was so daunted, that presently he fell down at his feet, confessed his fault, humbly asked forgiveness, and being granted him, was ever after serviceable and faithful to him. The death of King Malcolm and his Son, was so grievous, and so grievously taken of Margaret his Queen, the Sister of Edgar Atheling; that she made it her Prayer, and had it granted, not to over-live them, and so within three daies after died: a woman as full of virtues all her life, as at this time of sorrows; whom yet I should not break order to mention, but for one pious Act of hers, in causing a most barbarous custome of Scotland to be abrogated, that when a man married, his Lord should lie the first night with his Bride. Which custome by her endeavour was altered to a payment in money.

After these troubles were ended in the North, a new trouble arose in the West; for now the Welsh men hearing of King William's distractions, enter upon the English borders, making spoil and havock of men and Towns: whom King William went with an Army to encounter, but could do no good upon them, till he was fain to return to London, and provide him a stronger Army. About this time also Robert Morbray Earl of Northumberland, by whom Malcolm King of Scots was in King William's service formerly slain; finding his service not rewarded as he expected, enters into conspiracy against the King; but the King being informed of the practice, seizes suddenly upon many of his Complices, and himself, after many devices and shifts for flight, is taken and put in prison in the Castle of Windsor. After this, King William to take a further revenge of the Welsh, and to make an absolute conquest of that unquiet people, with a far greater Army than ever before, enters Wales, and thinks with new devices of Castles and Forts, utterly to subdue them, but they defending themselves, with their Woods and Mountainous passages, tyre and weary out the King and his Army, so as he leaves the business to two Hugh, one Earl of Salop, the other of Chester, who first invaded and took Anglesey, (their Island of refuge) where they used all kind of cruelty, pulling out of eyes, and cutting off hands and noses: in prosecuting of which business, Hugh Earl of Salop was slain; but Hugh Earl of Chester, entered Wales; and in the end with the slaughter of Rees, the last King of Wales, made an absolute conquest of the Countrey. For after this, though they often rebelled, yet they were in a true subjection. And these for the most part, were all the troubles of his reign: where we may observe, that none of them did overtake him, but still he met them, and from none of them he ever fled, but was still the pursuer, and yet so many as might well have taken away all the comfort of a Crown, and have made him willing to change his Diadem for a pair of Beads, but that Ambition, though sometimes weary, yet never tires.

His Exactions and courses for raising of Money.

IN the second year of his reign, Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury dyed, who had kept the Kingdom and King in some good Order; but as soon as he was dead, the King, as though he were then got loose, ranged without reins; in all licentiousness, preying especially upon the Clergy, as amongst whom he found the richest Booties. When Bishopricks or Abbeys were vacant, it was familiar with him to seize them into his own hands, as this of Lanfranks, he kept to his own use four years together, and longer would have kept it, if a sickness of his Body had not healed this disease of his mind: For finding himself in some hazard of death, he then conferred the Archbishopricks of Canterbury upon Anselm, and the Bishoprick of Lincoln upon Robert Bloet, two eminent men of that time; but as soon as he was well again; it repented him of that he had done, and he was not quiet, till he had drawn from the said Bloet, five thousand pounds, and from Anselm also good sums of money: For he repented not more in time of sickness for the evil he had done in health, then being in health he repented of the good he had done in sickness; that it may in a manner be said, there was nothing made him sick but health, and nothing made him be in health but sickness. But this preying upon the Clergy was grown into such a custom with him, that he kept in his hands at one time, three Bishopricks; Canterbury, Winchester; and Salisbury; and twelve Abbeys; all which he let out to Farm, and received the profits; and from this King the use is said to have risen first in England, that the Kings succeeding had the Temporalities of Bishops Sees, as long as they remained void. Having agreed to pay the King of France a great sum of money, he raised it in this manner; He caused twenty thousand men to be levied, under pretence for his wars in Normandy; but when they were ready to be shipped, it was signified to them from the King, that whosoever would pay ten shillings towards the levying of Souldiers in Normandy, should be excused from going, and stay at home; which was so plausible an offer to the Army, that scarce a man was found that accepted not that condition. When Duke Robert went into the Holy Land he pawned his Duchy of Normandy to his Brother King William for 6666 pounds, or as some write, for 12600, which money King William took up part by a grievous Imposition: so that Bishops melted their Plate, and the Temporal Lords spoiled their Tenants for the payment thereof: and part by loan; but chiefly of Religious Persons. He sold the Abbey of Glassebury to Thurstan for five hundred pounds; and when he built Westminster Hall, he made that an occasion to lay a heavy tax upon the people, who grugged at it, as done on purpose. He usually sold all Spiritual Preferments, to them who would give most; and took Fines of Priests for Fornication, as also he took money of Jews, to cause give of them as were converted, to renounce Christianity, and return to Judaism, as making more benefit by their unbelief then by their conversion. He caused divers of the Nobility to pay grievous Fines for transgressing his Laws, though the fault were never so small. He set forth a Proclamation that none should go out of the Realm without his Licence, by which he drew much money from many; for either they must tarry at home and live discontented, or else content him for giving them leave to go abroad. And from thence the Custom or Law of Ne exeat Regnum, seems to have taken its beginning: for Precedents of servitude are sure to live, where Precedents of Liberty are commonly still-born. These were his wayes for raising of money, wherein Promoters and Informers were his darling servants; and the most officious of all was Ralph Bishop of Durham, of whom he would often say, there was not such another man in the world to serve a Kings turn. And yet he was not so greedy of lucre, but that he did some acts that may serve for examples: as one time, an Abbey being vacant, two Monks of the Covent came suiters to him for the place, offering great sums; and each of them out-bidding the other; whereupon the King looking about, and espying another Monk standing not far off, asked him what he would give for the place? Who answering, he neither had any thing to give, nor would give any thing if he had it: Well (said the King) thou hast spoken honestly, thou art fitter to be Abbot then either of these; and so bestowed the place upon him gratis.

Of his Magnanimity.

Word was brought him as he sat at dinner, that his City of Mans in Normandy was besieged, and in great danger to be taken, if not presently relieved: whereupon the King asked which way Mans lay; and then caused Mafons presently to take down the Wall, to make him passage the next way, and so rode instantly towards the Sea. His Lords about him, advising him to stay till his people were ready, No (saith he) such as love me I know will follow me. And being come on Shipboard, and the weather growing very tempestuous, he was advised by the Master of his Ship, to stay for some calmer season: No (saith he), Fear nothing, I never yet heard of any King that was drowned. And thereby coming to Mans unexpected, he presently dispersed the Besiegers, and took Helias Count de la Fleche, who had been Author of the tumult, prisoner; who vaunting to the King, and saying, Now indeed you have taken me by a wife; but if I were at liberty again, you should find me to do other kind of feats: at which the King laughing, Well then (saith he) go your wayes and do your worst, and let us see what feats you you will do. Being reconciled to his Brother Robert, he assisted him to recover the Fort of Mount St. Michael, which their Brother Henry did formerly hold in Normandy: during which siege, stragling one time alone upon the shoar, he was set upon by three Horsemen, who assaulted him so fiercely, that they drove him from his saddle, and his saddle from his Horse; but he taking up his saddle, and withal drawing out his Sword, defended himself till rescue came: and being afterward blamed for being so obdurate to save his saddle, he answered: It would have angered me at the very heart, that the knaves should have bragged they had won the saddle from me.

In what he was just in keeping his word, in what he was failing.

His virtue specially was commended in him, and he would often say, That even God himself was obliged by his Word. But if we observe the course of his life, we shall find that howsoever he might keep his word in small matters, yet certainly not in great: For he kept not his word with his brother Robert, to whom he promised to leave his Kingdom of England after his decease, but performed it not. Nor he kept not his word with his Subjects, for in the rebellion of the Norman Lords, he promised the English, if they would now stick to him, they should have their ancient Laws restored, and be allowed liberty to hunt in his Forests; which promise he kept not at all, or at least soon brake. Nor he kept not his word with God himself; for being sick at Glocester, and in some hazard of his life, he made a solemn vow, that if he recovered, he would lead a new life, and give over all his disorderly courses: but being recovered, he grew more disorderly than he was before: that if domination be made from the greatest actions, it cannot be truly said, that he was just of his word; but such is the privilege of Princes over their Subjects, that if they make a promise, it must be believed; and if they break it, it must not be questioned.

Of his Incontinency, and Prodigality.

Much is spoken of his lascivious life in general, but nothing in particular: for neither is mentioned any violence he ever offered to any; nor is any woman named to have been his Concubine; and Princes Concubines are seldom concealed. It is true, he was never married, and of a strong constitution of body, and so probable he might be inclined to that vice: but probabilities are not always concluding, and therefore whether it be a true accusation, or but a slander, it may well be doubted: only one base Son is spoken of, called Bertram, whom he advanced in honour, and matched in a Noble Family. But why should we look more for particulars of his Incontinency, then of his Prodigality? for he was taxed no less for being Prodigal, then for being Incontinent; and yet for his Prodigality there is not so much as one instance recorded, unless we take this for an instance; that when his Chamberlain brought him a pair of hose, which because they were new, he asked what they cost? And being told they cost three shillings, in a great chafe he threw them away; asking him, If he thought a pair of hose of three shillings to be fit for a King to wear? Get thee gone (saith he) and let me have a pair of a Mark. His Chamberlain went, and bringing him another pair scarce so good as the former, and telling him they cost a Mark; I marry (saith the King) these are something like, and was better satisfied with hearing what they cost, then with seeing what they were worth: and yet was this no imputation to his wisdom, for to say the truth, it is no defect of wisdom in a King to be ignorant what his clothes are worth.

Of his wavering in Religion.

He appointed a disputation to be held between Christians and Jews, and before the day came, the Jews brought the King a Present, to the end they might have an indifferent hearing: The King took the Present, encouraging them to quit themselves like men: and swore by St. Luke's face (his usual Oath) that if they prevailed in Disputation, he would himself turn Jew, and be of their Religion. A young Jew on a time was converted to the Christian Faith, whose Father being much troubled at it, presented the King sixty Marks, intreating him to make his Son to return to his Judaism; whereupon the King sent for his Son, commanding him without more ado to return to the Religion of his Nation. But the young man answered, he wondred his Majesty would use such words; for being a Christian, he should rather perswade him to Christianity: with which answer the King was so confounded, that he commanded the young man to get him out of his sight. But his Father finding the King could do no good upon his Son, required his money again. Nay (saith the King) I have taken pains enough for it, and yet that thou maist see how kindly I will deal, you shall have one half; and the other half you cannot in conscience deny me. There were fifty Gentlemen accused for hunting and killing the Kings Deer, which they denied, and were therefore condemned to the trial of fire; which by Gods merciful judgment they passed through untouched: the King hearing it, and deceived of the confes-

tion expected is laid in a great chafe to say; How happens this? Is God a just Judge in suffering it? Now a murrain take him that believes it. It seems also he doubted of many points of Religion, then in credit: For he would often protest, that he believed not that Saints could profit any man in Gods sight, and therefore neither would he, nor any other that were wise (as he affirmed) make Intercession either to Peter, or to any other for help.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

The King claimed the Investiture of Bishops to be his right, and forbad Appeals and Inter-course to Rome; for Appeals had been seldom used till Anselm in this Kings reign appealed to the Pope; upon whose complaint the Pope was about to Excommunicate the King, but having a little before Excommunicated the Emperour Henry the fourth, he forbore at that time to do it, left by making Excommunication common, he should make it be slighted. At this time great contention arose between the King and Archbishop Anselm: and Anselm not yielding to the King in any point prejudicial to the Popes authority; nor the King yielding to Anselm in any point prejudicial to his own Prerogative; (which were points indeed incompatible) the contention continued long and hot, and the hotter, because there were at that time two Popes on foot at once: one elected by the Conclave, called Urbanus the second; another set up by the Emperour called Clement the third: for Anselm held with Urban, the King with Clement: and thus not agreeing in a third, it was impossible they should agree between themselves; and this contention, though palliated with pretensions, sometimes of one side, sometimes of another, yet brake out again, and was renewed both in this Kings time, and in the time of many Kings after. Anselm often threatening his going to Rome, the King told him plainly he would not thrust him out of the Realm, but if he would go without his leave, he would then keep him out during his pleasure; and besides, he should carry nothing out of the Realm with him: yet Anselm ventured it, and the King performed it; for William Warlewast was sent to rifle him in his passage at Sea of all he had, neither was he suffered to return as long as the King lived; during all which time, the King took the profits of his Archbishopric to his own use. It may not be amiss to shew a passage here concerning the first cause of contention between the King and Anselm, which some say was this; The King required a thousand Marks of him for having preferred him to that See: which Anselm refused to give, as judging it no less Simony to give after the preferment then before; but yet afterward offering five hundred pounds, the King refused to accept it, as being worth (he said) five times as much: whereupon Anselm told him, Your Grace may have me, and all that is mine, to serve your turn in a friendly manner; but in the way of servitude and bondage, you shall neither have me nor mine: Which words so angered the King, that they could never after be reconciled. In this Kings reign Pope Urban exhorted all Christian Princes to joyn together for recovery of Jerusalem and the Holy Land: and by the soliciting of Peter an Hermite, there assembled for that enterprise, under the conduct of Godfrey of Bulloigne; to the number of three hundred thousand men; amongst whom was Robert Duke of Normandy, who so valiantly carried himself in the action, that after Jerusalem was won, the Kingdom of it (as some write) was offered to him: but he looking more after the Kingdom of England, and therefore refusing it; it is observed he never prospered all his life after. In this Kings reign, although he had no command in Ireland, yet their Bishop of Dublin was sent over to Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, to be consecrated by him; and the Citizens of Waterford also desiring to have a Bishop procured Mercherdach, King of Ireland, to write to Anselm, to give his consent. Also in this Kings days the Pope forbad the marriage of Priests. And in his time, was the first Appeal to Rome, made by Anselm, that ever before had been made in England.

Works of piety by this King, or by others in his time.

This King gave the Monks of Southwark, the Church of St. Saviour of Bermondsey, and Bermondsey it self; He also Founded at York the Hospital of St. Leonards: He gave the Church of St. Peter in the City of Bathe to be a Bishops See. Hugh Earl of Chester in this Kings days builded the Abbey of Chester: Oswald Bishop of Salisbury, founded the Cathedral Church of Salisbury: Remigius Bishop of Dorchester, to the end his Bishoprick might be removed to Lincoln; began to build the Cathedral Church of Lincoln; and Laufank Archbishop of Canterbury builded two Hospitals without the City; the one of St. John, the other at Harbaldown; repaired Christs Church, and caused five and twenty Manours to be restored to that See, which had unjustly been withholden. He repaired also the Abbey of St. Albans, and the Church of Rochester, where for four secular Priests he placed to the number of fifty Monks. In the sixth year of this Kings reign, William Warren the first Earl of Surrey, (who came with Duke William into England) and Gundred his Wife, founded the Abbey of Lewis in Suffex: and Warren Earl of Shrewsbury, built two Abbeys, one in the Suburbs of Shrewsbury, the other at Wenlock. In his twelfth year, Robert Lofange Bishop of Thetford, removed his See from Thetford to Normich, and founded there a fair Monastery.

His Building and Structures.

Westminster-hall built by this King.

This King enlarged the Tower of London, and compassed it with new wals: he also built the great Hall at Westminster, being 270. foot in length, and 74. in breadth; but thinking it too little, he intended to have built another Hall which should have stretched from the Thames to the Kings street. He repaired the City and Castle of Carlisle, which had been waited by the Danes two hundred years before, and because it had but few Inhabitants, he brought a Colony thither out of the Southern parts. He finished New-Castle upon Tyne and many other Castles erected or repaired upon the borders of Scotland; many also upon the frontiers, and within the very Breach of Wales.

Casualties happening in his Reign.

A strange Fall.
The streets in this Kings time not paved with stone.
Godwins sands
in Kent.

In the fourth year of his reign, on St. Lukes day, above six hundred houses in London were thrown down with tempest, and the roof of St. Mary Bow Church in Cheapside, was so raised, that in the fall six of the beams being 27. foot long, were driven so deep into the ground (the streets being not then paved with stone) that not above four foot remained in sight, and yet stood in such rank and order as the workman had placed them upon the Church. Also in this Kings reign all the Lands in Kent, sometimes belonging to Earl Godwin, were by breaking in of the Sea covered with Sands, and are called Godwin's Sands to this day. In his eleventh year, at a Town called Finchamstead in the County of Berkshire, a Well cast out blood, as before it had done water: and after by the space of fifteen dayes, great flames of fire were seen in sundry places, and at sundry times.

Of his Personage and Condition.

He was but mean of stature, thick and square bodied, his belly swelling somewhat round, his face was red, his hair deep yellow, whereof he was called Rufus, his forehead four square like a window; his eyes spotted, and not one like another; his speech unpleasant, and stammering, especially when he was moved with anger. Concerning the qualities of his mind, they may best be known by looking upon the actions of his life; in which we shall find he was never more assured, then when he was least sure; never less dejected, then when in most extremity; being like a Cube, that which way so ever he fell, he was still upon his bottom. For his delights to pass the time, there was none in more request with him then hunting, a delight hereditary to him; which was the cause that as his Father had begun the great new Forest, so he enlarged it to a far greater extent. Other delights of his we find not any, unless we shall reckon his Wars for delights; for though they were oftentimes forced upon him, when he could not avoid them; yet sometimes he entered into them when he needed not, but for his pleasure. And in general, it may be said that one of his greatest virtues, was that which is one of the greatest virtues, Magnanimity; and his worst vice, was that which is the worst of vices, Irreligion.

Presages that preceeded his Death.

No warning can prevent destiny.

At Finchamstead in Berkshire, near unto Abington, a spring cast up liquor for the space of fifteen dayes, in substance and colour like to blood. The night before the King was kild, a certain Monk dreamed, that he saw the King gnaw the Image of Christ crucified with his teeth; and that as he was about to bite away the legs of the same Image, Christ with his feet spurned him down to the ground: and that as he lay on the earth, there came out of his mouth a flame of fire, with abundance of smoke. This being related to the King by Robert Fitz Mammion; he made a jest of it, saying, This Monk would fain have something for his Dream: Go, give him a hundred shillings; but bid him look that he dream more auspicious Dreams hereafter. Also the same night, the King himself dream'd that the veins of his arms were broken, and that the blood issued out in great abundance: and many other like passages there were, by which it seems he had friends somewhere, as well as Julius Caesar, that did all they could to give him warning: but that as Cafars, so his malus Genius would not suffer him to take.

Of his Death and Burial.

King William is slain in hunting in the New Forest.

King William having kept his Christmas at Gloucester, his Easter at Winchester, his Whitfontide at Westminster, notwithstanding forewarned by many signs of some great dyfaster toward him, would needs the day after Lammas, go a hunting in the New Forrest; yet something resenting the many presages, he stayed within all the forenoon: about dinner time, an Artificer

A came and brought him six Cross-bow Arrows, very strong and sharp; whereof four he kept himself, and the other two he delivered to Sir Walter Tyrell, a Knight of Normandy his Bow-bearer; saying, Here Tyrell, take you two, for you know how to shoot them to purpose: and to having at dinner drunk more liberally then his custom, as it were in contempt of Presages, out he rides into the New Forest, where Sir Walter Tyrell shooting at a Deer, at a place called Charingham, (where since a Chappel hath been erected) the arrow glanced against a tree, or as some write, grazed upon the back of the Deer, and flying forward, hit the King upon the breast: with which he instantly fell down dead. Thus it is delivered by a common consent of all; only one Sugerius, a writer that lived at that time, and was a familiar acquaintance of the said Tyrells; against the current of all Writers, affirms that he had often heard the said Sir Walter swear that he was not in the Forest with the King all that day. I have been the longer upon this point, because a more pregnant Example of Gods judgment remains not any where upon record. For not only this King at this time, but before this, a Brother of his named Richard, a young Prince of great hope; and also a Nephew of his, the Son of his Brother Robert, came all in this place to violent deaths: that although King William the Founder of the Forest escaped the punishment in his own person, yet it was doubled and trebled upon him in his issue. Thus died King William Rufus, in the three and fortieth year of his age, and twelfth and some moneths, of his reign. His Body was drawn in a Colliers Cart with one Horse to the City of Winchester, where the day following it was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Swithin, and was laid there in the Quire under a Marble stone; till afterward it was translated, and laid by King Caninus bones.

Men of Note in his time.

For men of Valour, he must stand alone by himself: for men of Learning, there was Lanfrank, a Lombard, but Bishop of Canterbury: also Robert, a Lorain, who Epitomized the Chronicle of Marianus Scotus: also Turgotus an English man, Dean of Durham, who wrote the Annals of his own time, and divers other works: but especially Osmond Bishop of Salisbury, who composed the ordinary Office, or Book of Prayer.

Of his coming to the Crown.

Anno Dom.
1100.

King Henry is Crowned.

The Bishop of
Dean to all the Bishops of England.

Why Henry preferred before Robert his elder Brother.

Although Henry came not to the Crown, as his Brother William did, by the gift of his Father, yet he came to it by the prophecy of his Father: For when his Father made his Will, and divided all his Estate in Land between his two eldest Sons, giving to Henry his youngest only a portion in money, with which division he perceived him to be much discontented; he said unto him, Content thy self Henry, for the time will come, that thy turn shall be served as well as theirs. And now the time was come that his Prediction was accomplished; for on the fifth of August, in the year 1100. he was Crowned King of England, by Maurice Bishop of London, (as Dean of all the Bishops of England, and therefore might do it without any prejudice to the Archbishop of Canterbury, though he had been present, who was indeed at this time in Exile.) But though it appears fuisse in Fatis, to be decreed by the Divine Providence that it should be so, yet it would not have been so, if his own endeavours had not been concurring. And therefore being in the New Forest, when his Brother King William was killed, he never stayed to complement the Dysfaster, but rode presently to Winchester, and there, not without some opposition of the keepers, seized upon his Brothers Treasure, as knowing Treasure to be the means of getting of Friends, and Friends the means for getting the Crown; and having now gotten the first means, he made use of it for the second; and both of them together brought him to this he is. Yet withall there were circumstances in his own person that conducted to it; his Brother was born, when their Father was but a Duke, he, when he was a King; Robert but a Forainer, being born in Normandy, himself a Native, born at Selby in Yorkshire; and it was not the least circumstance, that he was called Beauclerk, as much as to say, a good Scholar, having been bred in Cambridge; not perhaps that his learning was so great, but that it was great, either in respect of that age, which had but little; or in respect of his Brothers, who had none at all: and the People having been oppressed before, by the ill Government of two Kings, that were illiterate; could not chuse but be glad to come under the Government of a King that was learned. And though his Brother Robert, as being the Elder had right unto it, yet he as out of sight was out of mind, and perhaps neglected, as being himself negligent; withall it was given out, that he was chosen King of Hierusalem, and therefore no looking for him to come home; and to give force to all these reasons, Henry Norwich Earl of Warwick, was a principal furtherer.

His course for establishing himself in the Kingdom.

It is a hard matter to keep that safely, which is unjustly gotten; and therefore he took all possible care to overcome that hardness; which he effected by these means; First he called Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury home from Exile; placed William Gifford a learned man, in the Bishoprick of Winchester: and Monasteries that had been long vacant, he furnished with good Abbots. And because it is no less pleasing to the People, to have bad instruments punished, then the good to be advanced, he cast Ralph Bishop of Durham (a principal cause of their late oppressions) into prison: then mitigated the rigour of the new Laws; and promised restitution of the old. And that there might be no abuse in measures, he ordained a measure, made by the length of his own Arm, which is called a Yard. He restored to his Subjects the use of Lights and Fire in the night, which before had been forbidden after eight a clock at night. He acquitted the People from the Tax of Dane-gilt, and from all other unjust payments, which had been imposed upon them by the two former Kings. He gave free liberty to the Nobility and Gentry of the Realm, to inclose Parks for Deer, and Warrens for Conies; and such like game. And because he knew Scotland might be an ill Neighbour to him, if not tyed by some Bond, and none so sure as the Bond of Alliance, he therefore takes Matild sister of the present King Edgar to be his Wife.

His troubles during his Reign.

Ralph Bishop of Durham, the late King William's great Instrument for Exactions, that had by this King been committed to the Tower, made an escape, and passing over to Duke Robert in Normandy; incensed him, not to suffer himself to be baffled by a younger brother; as for his Brother William there was some reason, because his Father had given him the Kingdom by his Will, but what could Henry pretend, who had his Portion given him in money? Besides, it was an agreement with his Brother William, with consent of all the Lords of the Realm, that the Survivor of them should succeed. With such like instigations, and withall assuring him, there were many in England would take his part; he easily persuaded the Duke to that, from which he could hardly have dissuaded him; who thereupon with a convenient Army puts to Sea, and lands at Portsmouth, while Henry waited for his coming about Hastings; and being landed there, much people resorted to him, that it was like to have been a bloody business; but by mediation of Friends, working upon the flexible nature of Duke Robert, it was brought at last to this agreement, that King Henry should pay to Duke Robert, three thousand marks yearly, and Duke Robert should succeed him in the Kingdom, if he survived. And thus, this cloud, that threatened to great a storm, brought with it rather Sun-shine and fair weather: for now to his possession of the Kingdom, there was added a right, and he might now justify his being a King, without any scandal or usurpation. After this another little cloud arose, but was soon dispersed: For Robert de Belesm Earl of Shrewsbury, a rash young man of disposition, but more through discontentment, though discontented for nothing, but that having a great Estate, he was not a King as well as some others, fortified the Town of Shrewsbury, and the Castle of Bridge-north, and got many Welshmen to assist him, but the King coming with a mighty Army, so terrified the Welsh, that they abandoned the Earl, and left him a prey to the King in his person, and more in his Estate, for the King seized his Estate into his hands, but for his person he only banished it the Realm. For as yet the shedding of blood and putting to death, though for great Treasonable practices, was not much in use; Policy of State was not yet grown to that height of severity. The like attempt, and upon the like occasion, was made by William Earl of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornwall in England, Uncle to the King, only for denying him the Earldom of Kent, which because he could not obtain, he entered into Treasonable practices, by which he lost the Earldoms he had before. But these troubles were but as the labour of a Woman that is safely delivered; painful for a time, but ending in joy: and indeed for the most part this King had the fortune to be a gainer by his losses.

After this Duke Robert came in Kindness into England, to visit his Brother Henry; where he was so well pleased with his entertainment, that in requital thereof, and to do favour to the Queen, that was his God-daughter; he released to King Henry, the three thousand marks, which he was yearly to pay him. But returning into Normandy, and considering better what he had done, he so repented him, that he spared not to give out, that his Brother had directly conspired him. Which coming to King Henry's ear, so incensed him, that he presently sent over a mighty Army, which foraged the Countrey, and won many Towns and Cities, and soon after went over himself; where he so prevailed, that he left Duke Robert but only Rouen in all Normandy to put his head in, and this done returns into England. And now Duke Robert begins to be sensible of his own weakness, and therefore comes over into England to try the utmost of his Brothers good nature; Himself had sent him a Tun of Wine to refresh him withall, when in a siege he was ready to perish for want of water: and that gratefulness and natural affection, meeting together, must needs work something in the mind of a Brother.

Brother. Thus resolved, he presents himself to the King, referring both his Dukedom and himself, and all differences and debates to his will and pleasure. But whether incensed with the scandalous words Duke Robert had given out of him, or whether aspiring to joyn Normandy to England, as his Father had done before, King Henry scarce vouchsafed to hear him speak, at least vouchsafed not to make him any answer, but in a sudden manner turned away, and so left him: which scornful usage put the Duke into such indignation, that he resolved to set his whole state to stake, and either to redeem his disgrace, or to forfeit his life. So returning into Normandy, he used all his force in raising of Forces, but King Henry suspecting his intentions, and not using to give Insurrections time to ripen, came upon him so suddenly with a mighty Army, that he drew him to a battail before he was half ready to fight. In which battail King Henry received sundry stripes on the head, at the hands of one William Crispine Count de Eureux; so as the blood burst out of his mouth; yet nothing abashed, he struck down divers of his enemies: and particularly the said Crispine, who was there taken prisoner at the Kings feet. And now desire of revenge so animated the Duke, and the Duke his Souldiers, that never battail was more fiercely fought, and the Normans seemed at first to have the better, till King Henry shewing himself in the Army, put such courage into his Souldiers, that they quickly made good the advantage they had in number, and King Henry obtained a complete victory, both in slaughter of men, (of whom there were slain above ten thousand) and in taking of Prisoners (to the number of four hundred) amongst whom, besides other Great ones, as the Earl of Mortaigne, William Crispine, and William Ferrers, was Duke Robert himself, whom the King (having first taken order for all things, in his new State of Normandy) brought over with him into England, and committed him to the Castle of Cardiffe in Wales, where he remained a Prisoner till he died, used for a time with reasonable liberty for Recreation, till attempting to make an escape, it was thought fit to put out his eyes; which though it encreased his misery, yet it shortened not his life, for he lived many years after, in all, from the time of his first imprisonment, eight and twenty. And thus this great Duke, who in his birth was the joy of Nature, in this life was the scorn of Fortune; and it is not unworthy the observing, that the English won Normandy, the very same day fortieth year, the Normans had won England. Such Revolutions of Fortune there are in Kingdoms, and so unfatible is the state of all worldly Greatness. He died, Anno Dom. 1134. and lies buried at Gloucester. Matth. Westmon. writes that King Henry his Brother sent him according to his custome a Robe of Scarlet, and putting it first on himself, perceived the Capouch to be somewhat strait: whereupon he said, Carry this garment to my Brother, for his head is less then mine; the messenger delivering the Robe, Duke Robert demanded, if any had worn it, and being told him the King had first assayed it, and what speeches he had used; the Duke replied; I have now too long protracted a miserable life, since my Brother is so injurious to me, that he sends me his old cloathes to wear, and from that time would never eat any meat, nor receive any comfort.

And now is King Henry as great as ever his Father was, and as greatness draws envy, as much envied as ever his Father was; and as envie makes Enemies, as much opposed as ever his Father was: for now Fulke Earl of Angiou, and Baldwyne Earl of Flanders, upon small occasions, and Lewis the Gros, King of France, upon none but such as envie suggested, seeking to place William, Sonto Duke Robert, in his Right to Normandy, assaulted the Kings Dominions, perhaps to try whether greatness had not made him unwieldy; but King Henry, to shew that greatness had made him more active, went over into Normandy with a mighty Army, and at Nice encountered the French King, where a bloody battail was fought, with exceeding valour on both sides, but at last King Henry repelled the French King, and recovered Nice, and after many other conflicts between them, with variety of Fortune, at last the King made peace with the Earl of Angiou; confirmed by a marriage of the Earls Daughter with his Son William: and upon this also the two Kings grew to a peace, in which William Son to King Henry, being about seventeen years of age, was invested into the Duchy of Normandy, doing homage for the same to the King of France: From whence it was afterward a custom, that the King of England's eldest Son (as long as Normandy remained in their hands) was made alwaies Duke of Normandy. After this, Charles Earl of Flanders, being slain at Brussels by a conspiracy of his own people, and leaving no issue behind him, Lewis King of France invaded William, Son to Duke Robert, in the Earldom of Flanders, as descended from Earl Baldwin, whose daughter Maude was Wife to King William the first, and Grandmother to this William: so as William now having gotten this step of advancement, seeks to go on, and to recover Normandy, and was thereof by the assistance of the King of France, in a fair possibility, when in a certain light conflict, receiving a wound in his hand, the thread of his fair possibility was upon a sudden cut off, and of that light wound he shortly after died.

King Henry now in perfect peace abroad, was not without some little disquietings at home, and marching through Powis-Land in South Wales, to repress some insurrections of the Welsh, he came to certain straight, where his main Army could not pass, in which place the King was smitten with an Arrow full upon the breast, whereat he swore by our Lords Death (his usual Oath) that it was no Welsh arm had shot that Arrow, yet in his distress, for a thousand head of Cattel, he had the passage left open, and came safely off. And these were his troubles of Arms, both at home and abroad, during all his reign.

His Taxations and wayes for raising of Money.

Towards the marriage of his Daughter Maude with the Emperour, he obtained at his first Parliament at Salisbury, three shillings upon every Hide of Land, throughout the Kingdom, which was afterwards drawn to a custom, to receive aid from the Subjects, whenever the King gave his eldest Daughter in marriage. Besides this he had no more in all his reign, but only one supply for his wars in France; but he kept Bishopricks and Abbeyes void in his hands, and that of Canterbury five years together. By an Act of Parliament, or rather by a Synod of Bishops holden at London, he was authorized to punish marriage, and incontinency of Priests; which the Bishops afterwards repented, for he suffered Priests to have Wives for Fines, or rather took Fines of them, whether they had Wives or no, because they might have them if they would. Punishments which before his time were mutilation of Member, he made Pecuniary. And the Provisions of his house, which were used to be paid in kinde, were in his time rated at certain prices, and received in money. By this Chapter and the next before, it appears there were in this Kings days, but few troubles at home, nor but few Taxations; whereof the one may be thought to be cause of the other, the first perhaps of the second, but certainly the second of the first.

Laws first instituted in his time.

HE first instituted the form of the High Court of Parliament, for before his time, only certain of the Nobility, and Prelates of the Realm were called to consultation, about the most important affairs of State, but he caused the Commons also to be assembled, by Knights and Burgeses of their own appointment, and made the Court to consist of three parts, the Nobility, the Clergy, and the Common people, representing the whole body of the Realm, and appointed them to sit in several Chambers; the King, the Bishops, and Lords of the Realm in one Chamber, and the Commons in another, to confer together by themselves. Other Orders of that Court he Ordained, as they are in use at this day. The first Council of this sort was held at Salisbury, on the 19. day of April, in the 15. year of his reign. He forbade the wearing of long hair, which at that time was frequent, after the manner of the French. He commanded Robbers upon the High way, to be hanged without redemption: of whom a famous one at that time was one Dunne, and of him, the place where he most used, by reason of the great Woods thereabout, is to this day called Dunstable, where the King built the Borough as now it standeth. Counterfeiters of money he punished with pulling out their eyes, or cutting off their privy members, a punishment both less then death, and greater.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

AT his first coming to the Crown, he forbore his claim to the investitures of Bishops, but after he had been King some time, he claimed that both to invest Bishops, and to allow, or hinder appeals to Rome, belonged to him; In these Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, who was now returned into England, opposed him; affirming that both of them belonged to the Pope: the contention at last was brought to the Pope, to whom King Henry sent William Warlewast, elect Bishop of Excester, who saying to the Pope, that his Master would not for the Crown of his Realm, lose the Authority of Investing his Prelates; the Pope started up and answered, Neither will I lose the disposing of Spiritual Promotions in England, for the Kings head that wears the Crown; before God (said he) I avow it. So the contention grew long and hot, and many messengers were sent to and fro about it: The conclusion was (which proved no conclusion) that the King should receive homage of the Bishops elect; but should not invest them by Staffe and Ring: to which the King said nothing for the present, but forbore not to do it ever the less: for five years after the death of Anselm, Ralph Bishop of Rochester, was by the King made Archbishop of Canterbury, and notwithstanding all former Decrees and Threatnings of the Pope, he received his Investiture of the King. About this time a Council of Bishops was held at London; at which the Temporal Lords were present: to the end that the Decree of the Council might be confirmed by both Orders. If any man desire to know more of the passages between the King and Anselm; and of the many great virtues of Anselm, let him read Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, who was as his Secretary; and hath written of purpose to set forth his praises. About this time a Canon was made against the marriage of Priests, to which purpose Johannes Cremenstis, a Priest Cardinal, by the Kings license came into England, and held a solemn Synod at London, where inveighing sharply against it, affirming it to be no better then profest Adultery, he was himself the night following taken in bed with a common Harlot. Even Anselm himself, the most earnest earnest enforcer of single life, dyed not, it seems, a Virgin, for else he would never in his writings make such lamentation for the loss thereof. A little before this, Anselm being at Roan, Bocmundus one of the chief Princes that had been at Jersusalem, came thither; and amongst other holy Reliques, gave unto him certain hairs of the blessed Virgin Mary; which Anselm held always in great veneration, and *my self having the custody of them committed to me, have found by experience great holiness to be in them. About this time Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, held a Council at Westminster: where divers constitutions were made; of which there were two, That Priests should no more be suffered to have Wives: and that there should be no more buying and selling of men in England, which was hitherto accustomed, as if they had been Kine or Oxen. Anselm about this time dying at the age of 76. years, Rodolph succeeded in the See of Canterbury, but not till five years after the death of Anselm; and Thomas dying, Thurstone succeeded in the Archbishoprick of York: between which two Prelates, there arose great contention; Rodolph would not consecrate Thurstone, unless he would profess obedience; Thurstone was content to embrace his benediction, but profess obedience he would not: In this contention the King takes part with Rodolph, the Pope with Thurstone: after many passages, in the business, upon the Popes Threatning to Excommunicate the King, Thurstone entred upon his Bishoprick, and the King connived. In the tenth year of his reign, the Abbey of Ely was made a Bishops See, and Cambridgeshire was appointed for the Diocese thereof, which because it belonged before to the Jurisdiction of Lincoln, the King gave the Bishop of Lincoln, in recompense thereof, the manner of Spalding. This King also created a Bishoprick at Carlisle, and endowed it with many Honours. In his time, the Order of the Templars began, in the 27. year of his reign, the Grey Friars by procurement of the King, came first into England, and had their first house builded at Canterbury. Also in this Kings time, the first Legat to supply the Popes room came into England, but as yet not admitted. I may here have leave to tell two stories of Church-men, for refreshing of the Reader: Guymond the Kings Chaplain, observing that unworthy men for the most part were advanced to the best dignities of the Church, as he celebrated Divine Service before him, and was to read these words out of St. James, [It rained not upon the Earth, 111 years and VI moneths] he read it thus; It rained not upon the Earth, one, one, one years, and five one moneths. The King observed his readings, and afterwards blamed him for it; but Guymond answered, that he did it of purpose, for that such Readers were soonest preferred by his Majesty. The King smiled, and in short time after preferred him to the Government of St. Frideswids in Oxford. The other is this, Thomas Archbishop of York falling sick, his Physicians told him, that nothing would do him good, but to company with a woman; to whom he answered, that the Remedy was worse then the Disease, and so dyed a Virgin. This King granted to the Church of Canterbury, and to William and his successors, the custody of Constable-ship of the Castle of Rocheſter for ever. In this Kings time the errors of Gilbertus Porretas, were condemned in a Council holden at Rheims, by Pope Calixtus: also in his time Innocentius and Anacletus contended for the Papacy, whereby a great Schism arose in the Church.

Works of Piety done by this King, or by others in his time.

His King founded and erected the Priory of Dunstable, the Abbey of Cirenceſter, the Abbey of Reading, the Abbey of Hide, without the Walls of Wincheſter, the Abbey of Shirburne: He also new builded the Castle of Windſor, with a Colledge there: He made also the Navigable River between Torkeſay and Lincoln, a work of great charge, but greater use. His Wife Queen Maude, passing over the River of Luc, was somewhat endangered; whereupon she caused two Stone-Bridges to be built, one at the head of the Town of Stratford, the other over another stream there, called Channel-bridge, and paved the way between them with gravel. She gave also certain Manours, and a Mill called Wyggon Mill, for repairing the same Bridges and Way. These were the first Stone-Bridges that were made in England, and because they were Arched over like a Bow, the Town of Stratford was afterward called Bow. This Queen also founded the Priory of the Holy-Trinity, now called Chriſt-Church, within the East Gate of London called Aldgate; and an Hospital of St. Giles in the Field, without the West part of the City. In this Kings time Jordan Briſet Baron, founded the House of St. John of Hierusalem near to Smithfield, in London, and gave 14 Acres of ground, lying in the field next to Clerkenwell, to build thereupon a House of Nuns, wherein he with Myriol his Wife were buried in the Chapter House. Robert Fitzham, who came out of Normandy with the Conquerour, Founded a new the Church of Tukeſbury, and was there buried. Herbert Bishop of Nottingham, founded the Cathedral Church there. The Priory and Hospital of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, was founded by a Minſtre of the Kings, named Reior, who became first Prior there. Before this time, Smithfield was a Loystal of all ordure and filth, and the place where Felons were put to Execution. Hugh Lacy founded the Monastery of St. John at Lanſthony near to Glouceſter. Juga Baynard, Lady of little Dunmow, founded the Church there, and gave to maintain it half a Hyde of Land. This Lady Juga was late Wife to Baynard, that first built Baynards Castle in London. Endo the Kings Sewer, founded the Monastery of St. John at Colcheſter,

A Colcheſter, of black Canons, and those were the first of that Order in England. Simon Earl of Northampton, and Maude his Wife, Founded the Monastery of St. Andrew in Northampton. In the seventh year of this Kings reign, the first Chanons entred into the Church of our Lady in Southwarke, called St. Mary Overy; founded by William Pountelarge Knight, and William Dancyes, Normans. Robert the first Earl of Glouceſter, the Kings base Son, builded the Castles of Bristol and Cardiffe, with the Priory of St. James in Bristol: and his Son Earl William began the Abbey of Kensham. Geoffrey Clinton, Treasurer and Chamberlain to the King, founded the Priory at Kenelworth, of Regular Canons. Henry Earl of Warwick, and Margaret his Wife, Founded the Colledge of St. Mary, in the Town of Warwick; and Roger de Belemond, his Son, and Elyne his Wife translated the same Colledge into the Castle of Warwick, in the year 1123. Roger Bishop of Salisburie built the Devifes in Wiltſhire; the Castles also of Malmesbury and Shirburne. He repaired the Castle of Salisbury, and environed it with a Wall; he also built the stately Church of Salisbury: destined to a longer life then any of his other works. Ralph Bishop of Derham began to build the Castle of Norham, upon the bank of the River Tweed. In the 32. year of this Kings reign, the Priory of Norton in Cheshire, was founded by one William the Son of Nichel, and the Abbey of Cumbermere in the same shire. The Colledge of Secular Canons also in the Castle of Leiceſter, and the Abbey without the North gate of the same Town, called St. Mary de Prato. Also in this Kings reign was founded in the Monastery of Plimpton in Devonſhire, with the Cathedral Church of Exceſter; the Priory of Merton, the Hospital of Keſpar, the Priory of Oſney near Oxford, by Robert de Oylve Knight: and the Hospital of St. Croſs near Wincheſter by Henry Blois Bishop there: also Robert Earl of Ferrers founded the Abbey of Merivall: and indeed so many in his time were built, that one would think the Inhabitants of England to be all Carpenters and Masons, that were able to finish so many great buildings in so short time as this Kings reign.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN this Kings dayes all the four Elements were guilty of doing much mischief, but chiefly the water: For King Henry returning into England after his conquest of Normandy, left his Son William with his Sister Mary Countess of Perche, Richard his Son by a Concubine, the Earl of Cheſter with his Wife Lucie, the Kings Niece by his Sister Atela, and other Lords and Ladies, and passengers to the number of 180. to follow after him; who taking shipping (and the best Ship the King had) whether by carelessness, or drunkenness of the Sailors were all drowned. The Prince indeed was got into the Ship-boat, and out of danger; but hearing the lamentable cries of his Sister, compassion wrought so in him, that he turned about his boat to take her in, which over-charged with the multitude, over-turned, and they all perished: none escaped but only one Sailour, who had been a Butcher, who by swimming all night upon the Malt, came safe to land. An accident not more grievous then exemplary; for amongst other conclusions, from hence we may gather, that no state is so uncertain as prosperity; no fall so sudden as into adversity; and that the rule [He that stands, let him take heed he fall not] cannot always be observed, because a man happens sometimes to fall before it is possible for him to take heed. Another great mischief was in this Kings dayes wrought by the water; for by the breaking in of the Sea, a great part of Flanders was drowned: whereupon a great number of Flamings being suitors to King Henry for some place to inhabit; he assigned them a part in Wales near the Sea, called Pembrokeſhire, where they have inhabited to this day: the King by this one action, working two good effects, both shewing compassion to distressed strangers, and putting a bridle upon unquiet Natives. But the water had another way to do mischief as much by defect, as this was by excess; for upon the tenth of October, the River of Medway many miles together did so fail of water, that in the middle of the Channel, the smallest vessels could not pass: and the same day also in the Thames, between the Tower of London and the Bridge, men waded over on foot for the space of two dayes: also at another time the River of Trent at Nottingham was dried up a whole day. Now for the Earth, though naturally it be without motion, yet it moves sometimes when it is to do mischief, specially being assisted by the Air; as in this Kings dayes, it moved with so great a violence, that many buildings were shaken down, and Malmesbury faith, that the house wherein he fate, was lifted up with a double remove, and at the third time settled again in the proper place. Also in divers places it yielded forth a hideous noise, and cast forth flames at certain rifts many days together, which neither by water, nor by any other means could be suppressed. But yet the active Element of Fire was busiest of all, for first Chicheſter with the principal Monastery was burnt down to the ground. From West-cheap in London to Aldgate, a long tract of buildings was consumed with fire: Worceſter also and Rocheſter, even in the Kings presence; then Wincheſter, Bath, Glouceſter, Lincoln, Peterborough, and other places did also partake of this calamity, that there could be no charging the fire with any partiality: and to speak of one forain casualty, because a strange one; in Low-crdy this year was an Earthquake that continued forty dayes, and removed a Town from the place where it stood, a great way off: In the thirteenth year of this King, many prodigies were seen; a Pig was farrowed with a face like a Child; a Chicken was hatched

Of his Wives and Children.

King Henry takes a wife out of a Nunnery.

Her great humility and devotion.

Monuments for great personages erected in divers places.
An insolent part of Ralph Archbishop of Canterbury.

AT his first coming to the Crown, he married Matild or Maunder, Sister to Edgar then King of Scotland, and Daughter to Malcolm by Margaret the Sister of Edgar Atheling. This Matild, if she were not a veiled Nun, she was at least brought up in a Nunnery, and thereby grown to averse from marriage, that when the motion was first made her to marry with King Henry, she utterly refused it, as resolved, though perhaps not vowed to die a Virgin; till at last importuned, and even forced by the authority of her Brother, she rather yielded then consented; for she did it with so ill a will, that it is said, she prayed, if ever she had issue by the marriage, that it might not prosper: and indeed it prospered but untowardly, as will be seen in the sequel. But though she made this imprecation before she knew what it was to be a Mother, yet when she came to be a Mother, she shewed her self no less loving and tender of her children, then loyal and obsequious to her Husband. And to make amends for this seeming impiety towards her children, there is a story related of her real piety towards the poor: for a Brother of hers coming one morning to visit her in her Chamber, found her sitting amongst a company of Lazar people, washing and dressing their Ulcers and sores; and then kissing them after she had done: who wondering at it, and saying to her; How could she think the King should like to kiss that mouth, which had kissed such filthy Ulcerous people? she answered, she had a greater King to kiss, who she knew would like her never the worse for it. By this Queen Matild, King Henry, according to some Writers, had four children; but as the received opinion is, only two, a Son named William, and a Daughter called Maunder; of whom the Son at fourteen years old had fealty sworn to him by the Nobility of Shrewsbury: at seventeen married the Daughter of Fulke Earl of Anjou: and at eighteen was unfortunately drowned, as hath been shewed. The Daughter lived to be an Empress, and afterwards a Dutchess; but could never come to be a Queen, though born to a Kingdom; as shall be shewed hereafter. She survived her second Husband seventeen years, living a Widow, and at Roan in Normandy dyed, and was buried there in the Abbey of Bec, though there be a tradition that she was buried at Reading, in the Abby there beside her Father: but it appears to have been a custom in those days, for great personages to have their Monuments erected in divers places. After the death of this Queen Matild, who dyed at Westminster, in the eighteenth year of his reign, King Henry married Adeliza, the Daughter of Godfrey Duke of Lorraine; who though she were a beautiful and accomplished Lady, yet had he never any issue by her. When she was to be crowned, Ralph Archbishop of Canterbury, who was to do the Office, came to King Henry, sitting Crowned in his Chair of State, asking him who had set the Crown upon his head? the King answering, he had now forgotten, it was so long since. Well E (said the Archbishop) whosoever did it, did me wrong to whom it belonged; and as long as you hold it thus, I will do no Office at this Coronation. Then (saith the King) do what you think good: whereupon the Archbishop took the Crown off from the Kings head; and after at the peoples entreaty, set it on again, and then proceeded to Crown the Queen. By Concubines King Henry had many children; it is said seven Sons, and as many Daughters; of whom some perished in the great Shipwrack; of the rest, two of the Sons, Reynold and Robert, were made Earls: Reynold of Bristol, Robert of Glocester, and was a great assister of his sister Maunder, in her troubles with King Stephen; who after many acts of valour performed by him, in the twelfth year of King Stephen died, and was buried at Bristol. The Daughters were all married to Princes and Noble-men of England and France, from whom are descended many worthy Families: particularly one of those Daughters by Anne Corbet, was married to Fits-herbert, Lord Chamberlain to the King: from which Fits-herbert, our Family (alibi invidia verbo) is by Females descended; passing by the names of Cummin, Chenduit, Brimpton, Stokes, Fokcote, Dynceby, and so to Baker and Barret.

Of his Incontinency.

OF this enough hath been said, in saying he had so many children basely begotten: but if comparison be made between his Brother Rufus and him, it may be said, that howsoever they might be equal in looseness of life; yet in that looseness, William Rufus was the baser, and King Henry the more Noble; for King Henry had certain selected Concubines, to whom he kept himself constant; where King William took only such as he found: constant to the pleasure, but not to the persons.

His course for establishing the succession in Maude and her issue.

HE married his only Daughter Maunder, being but six years old, to the Emperour Henry the fourth; but he leaving her a Widow without issue, he married her again to Geoffrey Plantagenet, Son to Fulk Duke of Anjou: not the greatest Prince that was a Suitor for her; but the fittest Prince for King Henries turn: for Anjou is neighbouring upon Normandy, a great security to it, if a friend; and as great a danger, if an enemy. And having thus placed her in marriage, he now considers how to establish her succession in the Crown of England; whereupon he calls his Nobility together, and amongst them David King of Scots, and cauteh them to give their Oaths of Allegiance to her and her issue: and as thinking he could never make her succession sure enough, he cauteh his Lords the year after again to take the like Oath; and after that a third time also; as conceiving that being doubled and trebled, it would make the tie of Allegiance the stronger: wherein nothing pleased him so much, as that Stephen Earl of Blou, was the first man that took the Oath, because he was known to be, at least known he might be a pretender. But the King should have considered that Nalla-fides Regni; and therefore no Oath, though never so often iterated, sufficient to warrant loyalty in persons so deeply interested, as Stephen was: yet Providence could do no more, and this King was well satisfied with it; especially when he saw his Daughter a Mother of two Sons: for this, though it gave him not assurance, yet it gave him assured hope to have the Crown perpetuated in his Posterity.

Of Ireland in his time.

THE King of England as yet had nothing to do with Ireland, the Countrey was governed by its own Kings: and the people of both Nations, though they were neighbours, yet divided by a rough Sea, but little acquainted; but now began intercourse to be more frequented: and Mercherdach, chief King of the Irish, bore such awful respect to King Henry, that he would do nothing but by his counsel and with his good liking.

Mercherdach King of Ireland is much ruled by King Henry.

Whom King Henry used as his Vicegerent in his absence.

HE was absent sometimes in Normandy, three or four years together; during which times, he committed commonly the care of the Realm to Roger Bishop of Salisbury, a politick Prelate; and one as fit to be the second in government, as King Henry to be the first.

His Personage and Conditions.

HE was a person tall and strong, broad breasted, his limbs well knit, and fully furnished with flesh; his face well fashioned, his colour clear, his eyes large and fair, his eyebrows large and thick, his hair black and somewhat thin towards his forehead; his countenance pleasant, specially when he was disposed to mirth. A private man, vilified, and thought to have but little in him: but come to the Crown, never any man shewed more excellent abilities, so true is the saying, Magistratus indicat virum. His natural affection in a direct line was strong; in an oblique, but weak; for no man ever loved Children more, nor a Brother less. Though a King in act, yet he alwayes acted not a King; but in F battails sometimes the part of a common Souldier, though with more then common valour: as at a Battail in France; where he so far hazzarded himself, that though he lost not his life, yet he lost his blond. He delighted much in Beasts of forain Countries; as in Lions, Leopards, Camels; and such like, for which he inclosed a place at Woodstock of purpose to keep them.

Of his Death and Burial.

A Discontent of minde upon some differences between him and his Son-in-law, the Earl of Anjou, brought upon him a distemper, which encreased by eating, against his Physicians advice; of a Lamprey, a meat alwayes pleasing to him, but never agreeing with him, cast him into a Fever, which in few dayes put a period to his life: So certain it is, that one intemperate action is enough to overthrow the temperance of a whole life; as of this King Henry it is said, that he seldom did eat but when he was hungry, never did drink but when he was a thirst: yet this but once yielding to his sensual appetite, made him forfeit all benefit of his former abstinence: though some write he took his death by a fall off his Horse. He dyed upon the first of December at night, in the year 1135. when he had reigned five

His Bowels, brains, and eyes, were buried <sup>A</sup> at Roan in Normandy where he dyed: the rest of his body was stuffed with Salt, wrapped in Oxe hides, and brought over into England, and with honourable Exequies buried in the Monastery of Reading, which himself had founded. The Physician that took out his Brains; with the intolerable stench shortly after dyed. In this King Henry ended the line of the Normans, as touching the Heirs Males; and then came in the French, by the title of Heirs general.

Men of Note in his time.

<sup>B</sup> Men of Learning in his time were many: first, Stephen Harding a Benedictine Monk, who was founder to the Cistercian Order. Then Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury, who besides his assiveness in matters of State, writ many great and learned Books. Then Walter Calene, Archdeacon of Oxford, who delivered a History written in the British tongue, from Brute to Cadwallader, to Geoffrey of Munmouth to translate, and added forty years of his own time. Also Florentius a Monk of Worcester, who writ De rebus Gestis Anglorum. Also Eadmerus a Monk of Canterbury, who besides other works, writ the History of his own time, under the two Williams and Henry the first.

THE REIGN OF KING STEPHEN.

- <sup>A</sup> After the decease of King Henry, presently steps upon the Stage of Royalty, Stephen Earl of Boleyn, Son to Stephen Earl of Blois, by Adela, Daughter of King William the Conqueror; and though there were two other before him, Maud the Emperess, and Theobald his elder Brother, She in a substantial right, He in a colourable, yet taking advantage of being primus Occupans, the first Invader; (as being quickly here after King Henry's death, where the other staid lingering about other affairs) he solicits all the Orders of the Realm, Bishops, and Lords, and People, to receive him for their Sovereign: wherein besides his own large promises, what great matters he would do for them all, he had also the assistance of Henry his Brother, Bishop of Winchester, and the Popes Legate, and of Roger Bishop of Salisbury, his great friend: (two the most powerful men at that time in the State) who partly by force of Reasons, but more indeed by Force then Reasons, procure the State to accept him for their King, and so upon St. Stephen's day, in Anno 1135. he was Crowned at Westminster, in the presence of but three Bishops, few of the Nobility, and not one Abbot, by William Archbishop of Canterbury, with great solemnity. That which put a scruple in mens minds, and made them averse at first, from consenting to Stephen, was the Oath they had taken to receive King Henry's Daughter Maud to be their Queen, after his decease; but the weight of this scruple was something abated, when it was urged, that no Precedent could be shewed, that ever the Crown had been set upon a womans head. And <sup>C</sup> Robert Bishop of Salisbury, brought another Reason, because they had taken that Oath but upon condition, that the King should not marry her out of the Realm without their consents, and the King having broken the condition, was just cause to nullifie their Obligation: to which was added, that the Oath having been exacted by Authority, which is a kind of forced, it might have the Plea of Per minas, and therefore void. And yet more then all these, Hugh Bigot, sometime Steward to King Henry immediately after his decease, came over into England, and took a voluntary Oath before divers Lords of the Land, that he was present a little before King Henry's death, when he adopted and chose his Nephew Stephen to be his Successour, because his daughter Maud had grievously at that time displeased him. But howsoever their breach of Oath was thus palliated; it is certain that many of them, <sup>D</sup> as well Bishops as other Lords, came afterward to an evil end, at least to many calamities before their end.

King Stephen is Crowned.

Upon what reasons the Oath before taken to Maud
was slighted.

What course he took to establish himself in the Kingdom.

It is a true saying, Is robis optime servatur Imperium, quibus paratur; and this was Stephen's course, he got the Kingdom by promises, and he established it by performances; He pleased the People with easing them of Taxes and Impositions: He pleased the Clergy with forbearing to keep Bishopricks and Abbeyes vacant, and with exempting them from the Authority of the Temporal Magistrate; He pleased the Nobility with allowing them to build Castles upon their own Lands; He pleased the Gentry with giving them Liberty to hunt the Kings Deer in their own Woods; and besides with advancing many of them in Honors: and for his brother Theobald, who being the elder, was before him in pretence to the Crown, he pleased him with a Grant to pay him two thousand Marks a year; and then to strengthen himself abroad no less than at home, he married his Son Eustace to Constance, a Daughter of Leues King of France, which alliance alone might be thought a sufficient security against all opposition. And yet one thing more, which established him more than these, at least these the more for this, that he had seized upon King Henries treasure, which amounted to one hundred thousand pounds, besides Plate and Jewels of inestimable value, which he spent not in vain riot, but employed to his best advantage, both in procuring of Friends, and in levying of Souldiers out of Britany and Flanders.

Of his Troubles in his Reign.

There may well be made a chapter of the troubles of his reign, seeing his whole reign was in a manner but one continued trouble, at least no longer intermission, then as to give him breath against new encounters; till at last, when he grew towards his last, he rather left to be in trouble, then was at quiet, being forced to make his adversary his Heir; and to leave his Crown to him that had fought his life. For he was no sooner set in his Chair of State, but he was presently disquieted and made to rise, by the provocation of David King of Scots, who solicited by some Lords of England, but chiefly by Maud the Emperess (whose right he had sworn to defend) with a mighty Army entered Northumberland, took Carlisle and Newcastle, and was proceeding further, till King Stephen with a greater Army coming against him, yet rather bought his Peace then won it; for to recover Newcastle out of his hands, he was fain to let King David hold Cumberland, and his Son Henry the Earldom of Huntington, as their Inheritance, for which, the Father would not for his, as being engaged, but the Son for his as being free, did Homage to King Stephen.

An. Reg. 4. 1139.

The King of Scots in Maud's cause, enters England with an Army; but is compounded with.

Upon a bruit of King Stephen's death, the Lords possess themselves of several Castles.

Geoffrey Duke of Anjou enters into Normandy; but is compounded withall.

No sooner was this trouble over, but he was presently under another; for being fain somewhat ill at ease, it was bruited abroad that he was dead; which lo distracted mens minds, that every one thought it wisdom to shift for himself; and the Great Lords made a contrary use of Castles, to that which King Stephen intended, when he gave liberty to build them, for the King intended them for his own defence against his Enemies, and they made use of them in their own defence against the King; for now Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk possessed himself of Norwich, Baldwyn Rivers of Oxford, and Robert Quiscumir of other Castles. In these difficulties King Stephen, though he could not in person be in all places at once, yet in care he was; and there most, where was most danger; employing others against the rest: Against Baldwyn he went himself, whom, driven before out of Oxford, and gotten to the Isle of Wight, the King followed and drove him also from thence, and at last into Exile.

And now England afforded him once again to take a little breath, but then Normandy presently begins with him afresh: For now Geoffrey Plantagenet Duke of Anjou, in right of Maud his wife enters upon his Towns there, and seeks to get possession of the Country; when K. Stephen passeth over with an army, and arrethts his proceedings: and after some small defeats of his Enemies, brings the matter at last to a pecuniary Composition: He to pay the Duke five thousand Marks a year, and the Duke to relinquish his claim to Normandy. This done, he returns into England, where new commotions are attending him: For the Lords in his absence, resenting his breach of Promises upon which they had admitted him to the Crown, make use every one of their Castles, and stand upon their Guard: The Lord Talbot held Hereford; Earl Robert Mauds Brother, Briflow; William Lovell, the Castle of Cary; Paganell, the Castle of Ludlow; William Mowse, the Castle of Dunfer; Robert of Nichol now called Lincolne, the Castle of Warham; Eustace the Son of John, the Castle of Melton; William the Son of Alan, the Castle of Shrewsbury; and withall David King of Scots, never regarding his former agreement, enters Northumberland with an army, committing to great cruelty, in ravishing of Maids, murdering of Infants, slaughtering of Priests, even at the Altar, that never any barbarous Nation committed greater. Thus the Kingdom from the one end to the other was in combustion; that if the King had had as many hands as Briareus, there would have been work enough for them all. Yet all this dismayed not the King, but as having learned this lesson, Tu ne cede malis, sed contra audentior ito, grows the more in confidence, the less he was in assurance; and as if danger were the fuel of courage, the more erected in himself, the less he was upheld by others; and so, venturing what his Rebels at home would do in his absence, he passeth himself in person against David King of Scots; as being most dangerous, and therefore the first to be repressed: but but finding it hard to draw him to a battail, and impossible without a battel to do any good upon him; he leaves the care of that quarrel to Thurfin Archbishop of Tork, and returns himself home, if it may be called home, where he scarce had a safe place to put his head in. But though many Lords were rebellious against him, yet from there were that stuck firmly to him, by whose assistance and his own industry, partly by inticements, partly by inforcements, he reduced most of them to obedience, and all of them to submission; when in the mean time Thurfin Archbishop of Tork, and in his sickness, Ralph Bishop of Durham, assisted with William Earl of Aumerle, William Piperell of Nottingham, and Hulers de Lacy, fought a memorable battel against David King of Scots; wherein though King David himself, and his Son Henry performed wonderful Acts of Prowess, yet the English got the Victory; with the slaughter of eleven thousand Scots in the Fight, besides many other slain in the flight; where of the English none of account were slain, but only a Brother of Hubert Lacy, and some small number of common Souldiers. This Victory infinitely pleased and comforted King Stephen, who not long after to make an absolute suppression of the Scots, passeth again with an Army, and inforceth King David to demand a Peace, delivering his Son Henry into King Stephen's hands for a pledge; and coming homeward, by the way he besieged Ludlow one of the Rebels nests, where Prince Henry of Scotland had been taken Prisoner, if King Stephen in his own Person had not rescued him.

The rebel Lords are reduced to obedience.

Eleven thousand Scots slain, and but very few English.

King Stephen's good nature and valour.

The Emperess Maud comes now into England, and hath many adherents.

After this, once again the King got a little breathing time, but it was but to prepare him for greater Encounters: For now Maud the Emperess her self in Person comes into play; in whom the Oath before taken was to have its tryal; for till now, though never so really intended, yet it could not actually be performed; for how could they receive her for Queen, who came not in place to be received? but now that she came in Person, now was the time of tryal, how the Oath would work; and work it did indeed with many, and that strongly; For Maud coming into England with Robert Earl of Glocester, her base Brother was most joyfully received at Arundel Castle, by William de Aubigny, who had married Adeliza the Queen Dowager of the late King Henry, and had the said Castle and County assigned for her Dowry. King Stephen having intelligence hereof, cometh to Arundel Castle with an Army, and besiegeth it; but either diverted by counsel, or else finding the Castle to be inexpugnable, he left the siege, and suffered the Emperess to pass to Briflow. The King hearing, that Ranulph Earl of Chester, Son in law to Robert Earl of Glocester, had possessed himself of the City of Lincoln, thither he goeth with an Army and besiegeth it: thither also came the said Earl of Chester, and Robert Earl of Glocester to raise his siege; at which time a most fierce battel was fought between them upon Candlemas-day, wherein as it is memorable what wonders of valour King Stephen performed; For when all men about him were either fled or slain; yet he kept the field himself alone: no man daring to come near him; Horrentibus inimicis incomparabilem ictum ejus immanitatem, saith Hovelen: yet overmastered at last by multitude, he was taken Prisoner, and brought to Maud the Emperess, who sent him to be kept in safe custody in the Castle of Briflow, where he remained till All-hallowtide after. And now the Emperess having gotten King Stephen into her hands, she takes her journey to London; received in all places, as she went, peaceably, and at London joyfully; where Queen Matild made humble suit unto her, for the liberty of King Stephen her Husband; and that he might but be allowed to live a private life: the Londoners also made suit to have the Laws of King Edward restored; but the Emperess not only rejected both their suits, but returned them answers in harsh and insulting language: Indeed most unseasonably; and which gave a stop to the current of all her fortunes: for Queen Matild finding thereby, how high the Emperess's pulses did beat; sent presently to her Son Eustace, being then in Kenil, to raise Forces with all speed, with whom the Londoners, as much discontented as she, do afterwards joyn; and Henry Bishop of Winchester, as much discontented as either of them, fortifies his Castles at Waltham and Farnham, and especially Winchester, where he stays himself, attending upon what Coast the next wind of the Emperess would blow. Of all these things the Emperess had intelligence, and thereupon secretly in the night she fled to Oxford, sending straight charge, to have King Stephen more narrowly watched, more hardly used, put (as some write) into fetters, and fed with very bare and poor commons; withall she sends to her Uncle David King of Scots, to come unto her with all speed possible, who coming accordingly, they fall into consultation what is first to be done; the lot falls upon Winchester, as being their greatest Adversary, now, no less in appearance then in power: so Winchester they besiege, which Queen Matild hearing, she with her son Eustace & the Londoners, came presently to the succour, where a fierce battel being fought, the end was, that the party of Queen Matild prevailed, and the Emperess to make her escape, was fain to be laid upon a Horse-back in manner of a dead Corps, and so conveyed to Glocester; while Earl Robert her Brother disdainful to lie, was taken Prisoner, whom Queen Matild caused to be used the more hardly, in retaliation of the hard usage which the Emperess before had shewed to King Stephen. Things standing in these terms, propositions were made by the Lords for pacification, but such were the high spirits of the Emperess and her Brother Robert, that no conditions would please them, unless the Emperess might enjoy the Crown. But after long debate, whether by agreement between themselves, or by connivence of the Keepers, both King Stephen and Earl Robert got to be at liberty. When the first thing King Stephen did, was to look out the Emperess to requite the kindness she had shewed him in Prison; and hearing her to be at Oxford, he layes siege to the Town, and brings the Emperess to such distresses that that she had no way to free her self but by flight; and no way to flie but with manifest danger, yet she effected it by this device: It was in the Winter season, when frost and snow covered all the ground over; she therefore clad her self, and her four servants that were with her in white clothes, which being of the colour of snow, made her pass the Watches without being discerned, and by this means came safe to her friends at Wallingford. Yet Malmesbury, who lived at that time, confesseth he could never learn certainly by what means she made her escape. But howsoever she escaped this present danger; yet it left such an impression of fear upon her, that she never had after any mind to appear upon this Stage of War; but left the prosecution of it to her Son Henry, who was now about sixteen years of age, and being forward of his age and able to bear Arms, was by his great Uncle David King of Scots Knighted, to make him more forward.

No mention what became
this time.

It was now the ninth year of King Stephen's reign, when Ralph Earl of Chester, keeping possession of the City of Lincoln, was in night time assaulted by the King; but the Earl perceiving the Kings Forces to be but small, suddenly issued forth, and repelled the King with the slaughter of fourscore of his men. Yet two years after this, the Earl was reconciled to the King, and came of his own accord to wait upon him, when perfidiously he was detained by the King; and not set at liberty, till he had surrendered into the Kings hands all the Castles that were in his possession; which though it brought the King some present benefit, yet it wrought him a greater future loss; for it lost him his credit with all men, and no man afterward would trust his word.

Now was Duke Henry come to the age of nineteen years, and was in possession of the Dukedom of Anjou, by the death of his Father Geoffrey Plantagenet; and not long after this, he married Eleanor, the Daughter and Heir of William Duke of Guyen, by whom he had that Dutchy, and also the Earldom of Poitou: Normandy he had by his Mother; but more by the peoples inclination. So as being possessor now of four great Principalities, this greatness of Estate adding to the greatness of his spirit, made him aspire to recover his Right in England; and over he comes, bringing with him but small Forces, but promising himself great, from the people of this Kingdom; and many indeed resorted to him; with whom he fell presently, and besieged Marleborough: but by the Kings greater Forces was repelled.

After this, their Armies continued in the Field still; rather watching advantages to be doing, then doing any thing; sometimes advancing when no Enemy was near, and then retiring when the Enemy came; till at last it was like to come to a set Battel, when suddenly Eustace King Stephen's only Son unfortunately dyed: Unfortunately for himself, but fortunately for the Kingdom; For now King Stephen being left destitute of issue to succeed, was the more easily drawn to conditions of Peace, as likewise the Emperess Maude, having lately lost her Brother Robert Earl of Glocester, and Miles Earl of Hereford, (her two best Champions) was no less willing then he, which being furthered by the Lords of both sides, was at last concluded upon these conditions, that Stephen should hold the Kingdom of England during his life, and adopt Duke Henry as his Heir to succeed him. And this agreement thus made, and in a Parliament at Winchester confirmed, Duke Henry ever after accounted King Stephen no less then a Father, and King Stephen, Duke Henry no less then a Son: and well he might, if it be true which some write, that the Emperess, when a battel was to be fought between King Stephen and her Son, went privily to him, asking him how he could find in his heart to fight against him that was his own Son? Could he forget the familiarity he had with her in her Widow-hood? But this was no matter for the Writers of that time to deliver: It touched too near the interest of Princes then in being: and Princes must not be touched while they live, nor when they are dead neither, with uncertainties, as this could be no other: But howsoever it was, certain it is, that after this agreement between King Stephen and Duke Henry, they continued in mutual love and concord, as long after as they lived.

But what became of Maude the Emperess at this time? For that she was alive, and lived many years after this agreement between King Stephen and her Son Henry, all Writers agree; and to say that she consented to the agreement, without any provision made for her self, is to make her too much a woman; a very weak vessel: and to say there might be provision made, though it be not Recorded, is to make all Writers defective in great excess: And besides, being so stirring a woman as she was, that upon a sudden she should be so quiet, as not to deserve to have one word spoken of her in all the long time she lived after, (being no less then twelve or thirteen years) is as strange as the rest. And if she placed her contentment so wholly in her Son, that in regard of him, she regarded not her self at all; it deserves at least the Encomium of such a motherly love as is very unusual, and not always safe. Whatsoever it was, I must be fain to leave it as a Gordian knot, which no Writer helps me to untie. Matthieu Paris makes her to live one and thirty years after the death of King Stephen: and makes this her Epitaph.

Of his Taxations and wayes for raising of Moneys.

OF Taxations in his time, there is no mention made; for Taxations indeed, are properly drawn from a body of State when it is entire, where the State all this Kings time was altogether in Factions. But what he wanted in Taxations, he supplied with Confiscations, which by reason of the many revoltings of men of all sorts, could not chuse but fill his coffers; every Rebellion being in nature of a purchase to him, for whatsoever became of the persons, their Lands and Goods were sure to be his. And if it happened at any time, that Confiscations came in but slowly, he had then devices to hasten their pace, for upon light suggestions (not so much oftentimes as just suspicions) he would call men into question, and seize upon their Goods, as in the case particularly of Ralph Bishop of Salisbury, and it may not be displeasing to hear from what beginning this Bishop grew to such a height of greatness, which was thus: In the time of King William Rufus he was a poor Priest, serving a Cure in a Village near to Caen in Normandy, when the Kings younger Brother Henry chanced to pass that way, and to make some stay in the said Village; who being desirous to hear a Mass, this Roger being Curate, was the man to say it; which he dispatched with such celerity, that the Souldiers, (who commonly love not long Masses) commended him for it, telling their Lord, that there could not a fitter Priest be found for men of war then he. Whereupon Henry appointed him to follow him, and when he came to be King preferred him to many great places, and at last to be Chancellour of England, and Bishop of Salisbury. You have heard his rising, now hear his fall; When King Stephen came to the Crown, he held this man in as great account as his Predecessour King Henry had done, and perhaps in greater; For being a great begger of Suits, the King would lay off him, if this man will never give over asking, neither shall I ever give over giving. Yet this great Prelate fell first through pride into envy, and then through envy into ruine: For King Stephen having given liberty to build Castles, and then through envy into others in magnificence, (for he builded the Castles of Salisbury, the Vyas, Sherburne Malmesbury, and Newark, to which there were no Structures comparable in the Kingdom) that the Lords out of envy put it into the Kings head, that these Castles of his were built thus magnificently for entertainment of Maude the Emperess: which so possessed the King, or he would be thought to be so possessed, that taking this for a just cause, he seized them all into his hands, and forty thousand Marks besides, which he had in money: and not contented with this, he took the like course also with Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, only because he was his Nephew and of his near kindred. Another way he had for gaining of money: For in the first year of his reign, having given liberty to hunt in his Forests, he afterwards at Oxford caused many to be impeached for that liberty; a trick which perhaps he learned from hunting, first to give men leave to do a thing, and then to fine them for having done it. But this is the privilege of Princes, that their leave must be interpreted by him that gives it, and not by him that takes it.

Laws and Ordinances in his time.

HE gave licence to the City of Norwich to have Coroners and Bailiffs, before which time, they had only a Sergeant for the King to keep Courts; and after this, in the 37 year of King Henry the third, they had licence to inclose the Town with Ditches.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

UPON the Kings seizing into his hands, the Bishop of Salisbury's Castles, and Goods, complaint was made, and a Synod was called by the Bishop of Winchester the Popes Legate, to right the Bishop, where the King was cited to appear; who sending to know the cause, Answer was made, that it was to answer for his imprisoning of Bishops, and depriving them of their Goods, which being a Christian King he ought not to do. The King replies by his Lawyer, Americ de Vir, that he had not arrested the Bishop of Salisbury as a Bishop, but as his servant, that was to make him Account of his employment. To this the Bishop answereth, that he was never Servant or Accountant to the King: and many Allegations and Probations were urged to and fro, but in conclusion the Synod brake up, and nothing was done. The Bishops durst not excommunicate the King without the Popes privy; so in the end they fell from Authority to Submission; and in the Kings chamber fell down at his feet, beseeching him that he would pity the Church; and not suffer dissention to be between the Kingdom and the Priesthood. And this was no small magnanimity in the King, that he was able to pull down the high stomachs of the Prelates in that time. In the eighth year of his reign a Synod was held in London by Henry Bishop of Winchester, where it was decreed, that whosoever should lay violent hands upon any Clergy man, should not be absolved but by the Pope himself: and from this time forward, might not im-

Clergy men were exempt from the secular power. In the tenth year of his reign, by the soliciting of Saint Bernard, many took upon them the Cross, for a supply to the Holy Land, amongst whom, some English Lords also.

HE founded the Abbeys of Coggeshall in Essex; of Furneys in Lancashire; of Herguilers and Feverham in Kent; at Heigham in Kent, a house of black Nuns, also an house for Nuns at Carew: his Queen Matild built the Hospital of St. Katharines by the Tower of London: A Knight called Sir William of Mount Fitchet, founded the Abbey of Stratford Langthorn, within four miles of London; William of Tyre founded Boxeley Abbey in Kent; Robert Earl of Ferrers, founded the Abbey of Merival in Warwickshire, and in the same Shire, Robert Earl of Gloucester, the Abbey of Nonne Eaten. Thurstine Archbishop of York founded the Monastery of Fontes in Yorkshire. Also by others were founded the Abbeys of Tiltney; of Ricwall; of Newborough and Beeland; of Garedon in Leicestershire; of Kirkstead in Yorkshire: and divers others in other places, so that more Abbeys were erected in his days, then had been within the space of a hundred years before.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

Newbrigenis.

Newbrigenis and also Huntingdon, reporteth of one Raynerus, a wicked Minister of a more wicked Abbot, that crossing the Seas with his Wife, he so with his iniquity, overweighed the ship, that in the midst of the stream, it was not able to stir; at which the Mariners astonished, cast lots, and the lot fell upon Raynerus; and left this should be thought to happen by chance, they cast the lots again and again, and still the lot fell upon Raynerus; whereupon they put him out of the ship, and presently the ship as eased of her burthen, sailed away. Certainly a great judgement of God, and a great miracle: but yet recorded by one, that is no fabulous Author. In this Kings time also, there appeared two children, a boy and a girl, clad in green, in a stuff unknown, of a strange language, and of a strange diet; whereof the boy being baptized, dyed shortly after, but the girl lived to be very old; and being asked from whence they were; she answered, They were of the Land of St. Martyn, where there are Christian Churches erected: but that no Sun did ever rise unto them: but where that Land is, and how she came hither, she her self knew not. This I the rather write, that we may know there are other parts of the World, then those which to us are known: and this story I should not have believed, if it were not testified by so many, and so credible witnesses, as it is. In the fifteenth year of this King, the River of Thames was so hard frozen, that Horse and Cart passed over upon the Ice. In this Kings time lived Johannes de Temporibus, of whom it is recorded, that he lived three hundred sixty and one years: he was one of Charlemain the Emperours Guard, and dyed in the reign of Conradus the third, Anno Dom. 1139.

Of his Wife and Children.

Queen Matilds commendation.

The strange death of En-face.

HE married, by his Uncle King Henries means, Matild Daughter and Heir of Enface Earl of Boleyn, a Woman made for the proportion of both fortunes: In adversity not dejected; in prosperity not elated: while her Husband was at liberty, a Woman; during his durance, as it were a Man; Acting his part for him when he was restrained from acting it himself; not looking that fortune should fall into her lap, but industrious to procure it. By this Queen, he had only one Son named Enface, a Prince more then of hope, for he lived to the blossoming of much Valour, though it came not to maturity, as being cut off at eighteen years of age, some say by drowning, and some by a stranger accident. But strange Relations must not always be rejected, for though many of them be forged, yet some no doubt are true; and who knows but it may be of this kind, which some Writers relate of this Prince, that being at the Abbey of Bury in Norfolk, and denied some money he required to have had, he presently in a rage went forth, and set fire on the Cornfields belonging to the Abbey, but afterwards sitting down to dinner, at the first morsel of bread he put into his mouth, he fell into a fit of madness, and in that fit dyed? Certainly, the Persons of Princes are for more observation then ordinary people; and as they make Examples, so they are sometimes made Examples. This Prince Enface was so beloved of his Father, that he had a purpose to have joined him King with himself, but that the Pope upon the Bishops complaining to him of it, diverted him from it. Howsoever being dead, he was buried in Feverham Abbey, where his Mother was buried a little before. Other legitimate issue King Stephen had none, but by a Concubine he had a Son named William, whom he made Earl of Norfolk, which honour was confirmed upon him, by a special Article, in the agreement made between King Stephen and Duke Henry: Only a French Chronicle speaks of another Son of his, named Gervase, made Abbot of Westminster, and that he dyed in the year 1160. and was there buried.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of stature, of great strength, and of an excellent good complexion. Concerning the qualities of his mind, there was apparent in him a just mixture of Valour and Prudence; for if he had not had both, he could never have held out with such weak friends as he did, against such potent adversaries as he had. And specially it must be confest, he was of an excellent temper for a Souldier, seeing he never kill'd any enemy in cold blood, as Anthony did Cicero; nor any friend in hot blood, as Alexander did Clitus. What he would have been in Peace, we are left to judge by only a pattern, the short time between his agreement with Duke Henry, and his death: which seeing he spent in travelling to all parts of the Realm, and seeking to stich up the breaches which the violence of War had made; we may well think that if his life had been continued, he would have given as good Proofs of his Justice in Peace, as he had done of his Valour in War. For of his extraordinary good nature we have a sufficient example in one action of his, which was this; Duke Henry being on a time, in some streights for money, sent to his Mother Maude the Emperess, desiring her to furnish him, but she answered, that she was in as great straights her self, and therefore could not do it; then he sent to his Uncle Earl Robert to furnish him, and he answered he had little enough to serve his own turn, and therefore could not do it; at last he sent to King Stephen, and he though an Adversary, and standing in terms of opposition, yet sent presently, and supplied him with it. He was withall a great oppugner of superstition, which made him on a time to ride into Lincoln with his Crown upon his head, only to break the people of a superstitious opinion they held, that no King could enter into that City in such manner, but that some great dysalter would fall upon him. One special Virtue may be noted in him, that he was not noted for any special vice, whereof if there had been any in him, Writers certainly would not have been silent.

Of his Death and Burial.

AS a Fish cannot live out of Water, no more was it in the Destiny of this King, to live out of trouble; as soon as he came to enjoy quietness, he left to enjoy life, no time left him between his agreement with Duke Henry and his Death, but only so much as might reasonably serve him to take his last leave of all his Friends: For it was but from January to October; and the last friend he took leave of, was Theodorick Earl of Flanders, whom he met at Dover, and as soon as he had dismissed him he was suddenly taken with the Iliack Passion, and with an old disease of the Emrods: and died in the Monastery there, the five and twentieth of October, in the year 1154. when he had reigned almost nineteen years, lived nine and forty; and was buried in the Abbey of Feverham, which he had founded.

Men of Note in his time.

OF Clergy men, there was Thurstine Archbishop of York, and Henry Bishop of Winchester the Kings brother, also William another Archbishop of York, whom we may find in the Calender of Saints, as likewise St. Bernard who lived in this time, though not of this Countrey; and if we may reckon strangers, there lived at this time Peter Lombard; Master of the Sentences; Peter Comestor, writer of the Ecclesiastical Story; and Gratian, Compiler of the Canon Law, all three Brothers, and all three Basters; also Avicen, Averroes, Mesue, and Rabbi Salomon were in this time famous. Of Military men, there was Ranulph Earl of Chester; Reynold Earl of Cornwall; Robert Earl of Leicester; Hugh Bigot Earl of Norfolk; but especially Robert Earl of Gloucester, the Kings bafe Son, whose praises, if any desire to hear founded out to the full, let him read William of Malmesbury, who writ the history of these times, of purpose to be his Trumpet. Of the writers of our Nation, there was this William of Malmesbury, Henry Huntingdon, Simeon Dunelmensis, William Revellensis, and Geoffry of Monmouth, Bishop of St. Asaph in Wales. # THE LIFE and REIGN OF KING HENRY THE SECOND.

King Henry is

cestors.

ING Stephen being dead, Henry Duke of Anjou, by his Father Geoffrey Plantagenet, succeeded him in the Kingdom of England by agreement, whom he preceded by right, as being Son and Heir of Maude, sole Daughter and Heir of King Henry the first; and was Crowned at Westminster, by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, on the seventeenth of December, in the year 1155. and was now a greater Prince then any of his Ancestors had been before: and indeed, the Kingdom of England, the Dukedom of Normandy, and the Dukedom of Anjou in his own right; and in the right of his Wife Queen Eleanor, the Duchy of Guyen, and the Earldom of Poitou, being all united in his person, made him a Dominion of a larger extent then any Christian King had at that time.

Anjou.

He marries the Lady Eleanor, the divorced wife of Lewis
King of France.

He was born at Meins in Normandy, in the year 1132. a great joy to his Father Geoffrey Duke of Anjou; a greater to his Mother Maude the Emperess; but so great to his Grandfather King Henry the first, that it seemed to make amends for his Son William, whom unfortunately he had lost before by Shipwrack. The years of his childhood were spent at home under the care of his Parents: at nine years old or thereabouts, he was brought by his Uncle Robert Earl of Gloucester into England, and placed at Bristol, where under the tuition of one Matthew his Schoolmaster, to instruct him in learning, he remained four years, after which time he was sent into Scotland, to his great Uncle David King of Scots, with whom he remained about two years, initiated by him in the principles of State, but chiefly of his own estate: and being now about fifteen years of age, was by him knighted, and though scarce ripe for Arms, yet as a fruit gathered before its time, was mellowed under the Discipline of his Uncle Robert, one of the best Souldiers of that time. And now the Duke his Father not able any longer to endure his absence, sent with great instance to have him sent over to him; for satisfying of whose longing, Earl Robert provided him of passage, and conducted him himself to the Sea side, where he took his last farewell of him. Being come into Anjou, his Father perhaps overjoyed with his presence, not long after died, leaving him in present possession of that Dukedom, being now about nineteen years of age. When shortly after he married Eleanor the late Wife of Lewis King of France, but now divorced. A year or two after, he came again into England, where after some velitations with King Stephen, they were at last reconciled, and his succession to the Crown of England, ratified by Act of Parliament. Not long after he went again into France, and presently tell to besiege a Castle which was detained from him by the French King: in the time of which siege, news was brought him of King Stephen's death; which one would have thought should have made him hasten his journey into England; yet he resolved not to stir till he had won the Castle: his resolution of his being known to the Defendants, they surrendered the Castle; but yet no sooner, but that it was six weeks after before he came into England, when he was now about the age of three and twenty years.

His

His first Acts after he came to the Crown.

HE began his reign as Solomon would have begun it, if he had been in his place: for, first he made choise of wife and discreet men to be his Counsellours: then he banished out of the Realm all strangers, and especially Flemings, with whom the Kingdom swarmed: as of whom King Stephen had made use in his wars, amongst whom was William of Ypres, lately before made Earl of Kent. Castles which by King Stephens allowance had been built, he caused to be demolished, (of which there were said to be eleven hundred and fifteen) as being rather Nurseries of rebellion to the Subject, then of any safety to the Prince. He appointed the most able men of that profession, to reform abuses of the Laws, which disorder of the wars had brought in: He banished many Lords, who against their Oath had assisted King Stephen against him; as thinking that men once perjured, would never be faithful; and to the end he might be the less pressing upon the people with Taxations, he resumed all such Lands belonging to the Crown, which had any way been aliened or usurped; as thinking it better to displease a few then many: and many other things he did, which in a disjoynted State were no less profitable and expedient, then requisite and necessary.

He reformed the Laws.

He resumed
Crown Lands.

His Troubles during his Reign.

HE had no Competitors, nor Pretenders with him for the Crown; and therefore his troubles at first were not in Capite, strook not at the root, as King Stephens did: but were only some certain nibblings at inferior parts: till at last he brought them himself into his own bowels: For what was the trouble in his first year with the Welsh; but as an exercise rather to keep him in motion, then that it needed to disquiet his rest? for though they were mutinous for a time, while they looked upon their own Bucklers; their Woods and Mountainous passages: yet as soon as King Henry did but shew his sword amongst them, they were soon reduced to obedience for the present, and to a greater awfulness for the future. It is true Henry Earl of Essex that bore the Kings Standard, was so assaulted by the Welsh, that he let the Standard fall to the ground, which encouraged the Welsh, and put the English in some fear, as supposing the King had been slain; but this was soon frustrated to the Welsh, and punished afterward in the Earl, by condemning him to be shorn a Monk, and put into the Abbey of Reading, and had his lands seized into the Kings hands. And what was his trouble with Malcolm King of Scots, but a work of his own beginning? for if he would have suffered him to enjoy that which was justly his own, Cumberland and Huntingdonshire, by the grant of King Stephen, and Northumberland, by the gift of his Mother Maude the Emperess; he might have stayed quietly at home, and needed not at all to have stirred his foot; but he could not endure there should be such parings off from the body of his Kingdom: and therefore went with an Army into the North, where he won not; but took Northumberland from him: with the City of Carlisle, and the Castles of Newcastle and Bamburgh: and merely out of gratefulness, in remembrance of the many civilities done him before, by David King of Scots; he left him the County of Huntingdon; but yet his with condition to owe fealty, and to do homage to him for it. And what was his trouble with his brother Geoffrey, but a Bird of his own hatching; for his Father Geoffrey, Duke of Anjou, had three sons, Henry, Geoffrey and William: and dying, he left his Dukedom of Anjou to his eldest Son Henry, but to hold no longer then till he should come to be King of England, and then to deliver it up to his second Son Geoffrey. and he made his Lords to swear; not to suffer his body to be buried, until his son Henry had taken his Oath to do it; which Oath Henry afterward, in reference to his Fathers body, did take: but as he took it unwillingly, so he willingly brake it, and sent presently to Adrian the then Pope, for a dispensation of his Oath: which granted, he enters Anjou with an Army, and takes from his Brother Geoffrey, being little able to make resistance; not only the Dukedom of Anjou, but some other Cities also, which his Father had absolutely given him for his maintenance: yet out of brotherly kindness was content to allow him a Pension of a thousand pounds a year: which brotherly kindness was so unkindly taken by his Brother Geoffrey, that it brake his heart; and within a short time after he died.

with the Welsh
soon ended.

And thus these troubles begun by Henry himself, were soon ended; but now a trouble is coming on, begun by Lewis King of France; and this is like to stick longer by him: For King Lewis not having yet digested King Henry's marriage with his divorced wife Eleanor, seeks all opportunities to express his spleen, by doing him displeasure; and a fit opportunity was now offered: for there fell out a difference between Raymond Earl of St. Giles, and Henry King of England, about the Earldom of Tholouse, which Raymond possessed, and Henry claimed: in this difference, King Lewis takes part with Raymond, as pretending to be the juster side. Hereupon are great Forces provided on both sides, and it was like to have come to a dangerous battel; but that by mediation of friends, a peace was made; and to make the Peace the firmer, a marriage was concluded between Henry, King Henry's eldest Son, scarce yet seven years of age, and Margaret, Daughter of King Lewis not past three: who was delivered to King Henry to bring up up till fit years for conformation. This was then thought a strong link to hold them in friendship, but it proved afterward a cause to make a greater breach; and indeed when a son is once matched into a family, the Father must never look from thence afterward to have a good with; seeing the Daughter thus matched can have no advancement, but by the advancement of her Husband, and he none, at least, none so well, as by the ruine of his Father: yet this brake not out till some years after. It was now about the sixteenth year of King Henry's reign and his Son Henry grown to be seventeen years of age, when it came into the Kings mind to have his Son Henry crowned King, and reign with himself in his own time; partly out of indulgence to his Son, but chiefly, as having found by his own experience, that Oaths for Succession are commonly eluded: but Oaths for present Allegiance, as being Verba de presenti, can have no evasion: and pleasing himself with this conceit, he acquaints his Lords with his purpose, and causeth his Son Henry to be crowned King by the hands of Roger Archbishop of York; and all the Lords to swear Allegiance to him: at the Feast of which solemnity King Henry to honour his Son, would needs carry up the first dish to his Table: whereupon the Archbishop Roger standing by, and saying merrily to the new King: What an honour is this to you, to have such a waiter at your Table? Why (saith he) what great matter is it for him that was but the Son of a Duke, to do service to me, that am the Son of a King and Queen? Which the old King hearing, began to repent him, now it was too late, of that he had done: For indeed the honour which by Gods Commandement, children are to do their Parents, is by such making them their equals, in a manner abolished; at least it gives them stomachs to take more upon them than is fit. But King Henry passed it over, and meant to set the best side outward. Notwithstanding this ill success of King Henry, yet King Lewis of France soon after, did the like to his Son Philip, and caused him to be crowned King in his own life time, Paris, Anno 1179.

And now King Lewis took displeasure that his Daughter was not crowned as well as her Husband, and therefore to satisfy him in that point, King Henry sendeth his Son Henry and his Wife Margaret into England, and causeth them both to be crowned by Walter Archbishop of Roan: and shortly after, the young King Henry and his Wife go back to King Lewis her Father, and by him with great joy, and variety of sports were entertained. In the time of their being there, King Lewis partly out of his old spleen to King Henry, and partly to make his Son-in-law more absolute: falls oftentimes into conference with him, and finding his hot spirit to be fit tinder for such fire, tells him, it was a shame he should suffer himself to be made a Slave; have the title of a King, and not the authority: and that as long as he stood in such terms, that which seemed an honour was indeed a disgrace: With which words of King Lewis, the young King Henry was set a float, and from that time forward, stuck not openly to oppose his Father: whereof his Father having intelligence, sent messengers to King Lewis, desiring him from the King their Master, to be a means to bring his Son to more moderation. But King Lewis hearing the Embassadors name their Master King, with an angry countenance said unto them: What mean you by this to call him King, who hath passed his Kingdom over to his Son? and with this answer sent them away. To this evil, another worse was added: that Queen Eleanor his Wife enraged with jealousy of her Husbands Concubines, both incensed her Son Henry, and perswaded also two other of her sons, Richard and Geoffrey, to joyn against their Father; telling them, it would be better for them that their Brother should prevail, who could not chuse but allow them better maintenance, than their Father did. With these perswasions they pass over into Normandy, and joyn with their Brother Henry; who emboldened by their assistance, grows now more insolent than he was before; that when messengers were sent to him from his Father, requiring him to lay down his Arms, and to come lovingly to him: he proudly made answer, that his Father must not look he would lay down his Arms, unless himself first would lay down his authority, and resign the Kingdom. And now Lewis King of France, calling together the great Lords of his Kingdom, and with them William King of Scots, Hugh Earl of Chester, Roger Mowbray, Hugh Bigot, and other of his Sons parry, they all take their Oaths to assist the young King Henry with all their power, and thereupon all in one day, the French invade Normandy, Aquitaine and Britain, the King of Scots, Northumberland; and King Lewis the City of Vernouil, which he brought to that distress, that it was agreed by the Inhabitants, if it were not succoured within three days, then to surrender it. King Henry hearing of this agreement, promiseth to succour them by that day. But here King Lewis useth a trick, gets that by fraud, which he could not do by force; for he sends to King Henry, that if he were willing to have peace with his Sons, he should meet him at a place appointed, at such a time, and he doubted not to effect it. King Henry glad of such an offer, and with that gladness perhaps blinded, and not suspecting any deceit, promiseth to meet; and coming to the place at the day, which was the day he should have succoured Vernouil, he stayed there all day looking for King Lewis coming, who in stead of coming, sent word to Vernouil, that King Henry was defeated; and therefore their hope of succour was in vain: whereupon the Citizens thinking it to be so indeed, because he came not according to his promise, surrendered the Town: which King Lewis finding himself unable to hold, set it on fire, and so departed. But King Henry when he perceived the fraud, followed him with his Army, and took a bloody revenge of his fraud, with the slaughter of many of his men. At the same time also King Henry's Forces encountered Hugh Earl of Chester, and Robert Fulger, who had taken Dole in Britain, took them Prisoners, and brought them to King

A King Henry: and about the same time likewise in England Robert Earl of Leicester thinking to surprise Raynold Earl of Cornwall, and Richard Lacy, King Henry's Generals, at unawares, was himself by them overthrown, and the Town of Leicester taken; which only the site of the place defended from being battered to the ground. Robert Earl of Leicester being thus defeated, passed over into France, and being supplied by King Lewis with greater forces than before, is together with Hugh Bigot sent back into England, to draw the country to Henry the sons party, who at first assault take Norwich: and then sitting down before Bury, they are in a great battell, by Richard Lacy and other of King Henry's Captains, overthrown with the slaughter of ten thousand men, and as many taken prisoners; amongst whom Earl Robert himself. Yet were not Roger Mowbray, and Hugh Bigot so daunted with this overthrow, but that together with David

B the King of Scots brother, they gather new Forces, and invade Northumberland and Yorkshire, when Robert Scoyce, Ralph Granula, William Vesli, and Barnard Bayliol (of whom Baynards Castle in London, first took the name) Knights of those parts, assemble together, and fighting a great battell with them, overthrow them, and took the King of Scots prisoner, with many others. Yet is not Hugh Bigot daunted with this neither, but gathers new Forces and takes Norwich; and Robert Ferris, Nottingham: the news whereof, when King Henry the Son heard, he recovered new spirits, and obtaining new assistance from King Lewis, prepares himself afresh for war: which King Henry the Father hearing, returns speedily into England; and to appease Saint Thomas Becket's Ghost, goes to visit his Tombe, and there asks him forgiveness. This done, he goes into Suffolk, and at Framingham Castle, which belonged to Hugh Bigot, staies with his Army, when suddenly moved, by what intinct no man knows, (unless the appealing of Saint Thomas's Ghost did work it) both Hugh Bigot delivers up his Castle into King Henry's hands, and likewise Robert Mowbray, Robert Ferris, and many others of that party, come voluntarily in, and submit themselves to the Kings mercy. Hereupon King Henry returns to London, about which time he committed his wife Queen Eleanor to prison, for her practises against him. In the mean time, King Lewis understanding that Normandy was but weakly guarded, together with his Son the young King Henry, and Philip Earl of Flanders; he beliegeth Roan; which the Kings Forces valiantly defended, till he came himself in person; and thereupon King Lewis despairing of any good to be done, sends messengers to King Henry for a truce, and appointed a day to meet at Gyson, where he doubted not to make a reconciliation between his Sons and him; K. Henry agreed willingly, but at the meeting nothing was done: It seems it was but one of K. Lewis's old tricks to come fairly off.

After this truce made with King Lewis, King Henry hearing that his Son Richard had in the mean time posselt himself of a great part of the Province of Poitou, goes thither with an Army, where Richard at last, after some hesitation, as doubting his Forces, submits himself to his Father, and asks his pardon; which his Father is freely grants, as if he had never committed any fault; and thereupon King Henry imploies him to King Lewis, and his brother Henry, to perswade them to peace: who wearied now with the wars, were easily drawn, and so reconciliation on all parts is made; and to confirm the reconciliation between the two Kings, Henry and Lewis, his daughter Adela is affianced to King Henry's son Richard, as Earl of Aquitaine, and because the Lady was but young, she was committed to the care of King Henry, till she should be fit for marriage. Upon this King Henry sets Robert Earl of Lye ster, and Hugh Earl of Chester, giving hostages and oath for their Allegiance, at liberty; and William also King of Scots paying a certain mulct; for which he delivered in pawn the strong Castles of Berwick, Roxborough, and Sterling to King Henry, and was fined to lose the County of Huntington, and never to receive any Rebels into his protection. These things done, the King with his sons returns into England, where with all joyfulness they were received.

It was now the year 1179. when King Lewis began again to grow discontented with King Henry, because his daughter was not yet married to his son Richard as was agreed: but King Henry making him promise to have them married within a few daies, gave him satisfaction; though indeed he meant nothing less, for it was thought he kept her for himself, as with whom he had before that time, had unlawful familiarity.

The year 1184. was memorable for nothing, or for nothing so much as the death of the young King Henry, who died then, being of the age of one and twenty years: whose Widow Margaret returning into France, was afterward married to Bela King of Hungary. Now King Henry's Son Richard, no longer enduring to have his marriage delayed, which his Father often promised, but would never suffer to be performed, falls into his old fit of discontentment: wherein though he cannot perhaps be justified, yet he may justly be excused, for to be kept from a wife at that time of his age, for which a wife was most proper; and especially having been affianced so long before, which could not chuse but make his appetite the sharper; must needs be, if not a just cause, at least a strong provocation to make him do as he did. Howsoever from this fit of discontentment, he falls into a relapse of a Rebellion, and infecting with it his Brother John, and a great part of his Fathers Adherents; they all take part with Philip, (now after the decease of Lewis) King of France, who willing to make use of their assistance, before the stream of filial awfulness should return into the natural Channel, takes them along with him, and beliegeth the City of Meus, in which King Henry at that time was himself in person; who apprehending the danger, and then repenting the mischief of falling into his enemies hands, gets him secretly out of the City, leaving it to defend it self, till he should return with greater forces: for hearing afterward that the Town was taken, he fell into so great a distraction of mind, that it made him break out into these blasphemous words; I shall never hereafter love God any more, that hath suffered a City so dear unto me, to be taken from me: but he quickly recollected himself, and repented him that he had spoken those words. Indeed Mentz was the city in which he was born, that to have this City taken from him, was as much as to have his birthright taken from him; and to say the truth, after he had lost this City, he scarce seemed to be alive; not only because he shortly after died, but because the state of Majesty which had all his life accompanied him, after this forsook him: for now he was fain to beg peace of his enemies, who often before had begged it of him: now he was glad to yield to conditions, which no force before could have wrested from him. It is memorable, and worth observing, that when these two Kings had meeting between Turnyn and Aras, for reconciliation of differences, there suddenly happened a Thunderbolt to light just between them, with so terrible a crack, that it forced them for that time, to break off their conference; and afterward at another meeting, the like accident of thunder happened again, which so amazed King Henry, that he had fallen off his horse, if he had not been supported by those about him; which could be nothing but drops let fall of the Divine anger, and manifest prefaces of his future dyasters. And thus this great Princes troubles, which began in little ones, and were continued in great ones, ended at last in so great a trouble, that it ended his life, and left him an example of desolation, notwithstanding all his greatness; forsaken of his friends, forsaken of his wife, forsaken of his children; and (if he were not himself, when he blasphemed for the loss of Mentz) forsaken of himself; which might be exemplar in this King, if it were not the common Epilogue of all greatness.

Of his Acquest of Ireland.

Who first of all English men entered Ireland.

Ireland submits itself to King Henry.

King Henry builds a stately Palace in Dublin. He sends his son John Governour into Ireland.

Robert Fitz-Stephen was the first of all English men after the conquest that entered Ireland, the first day of May, in the year 1170. with 390 men: and there took Wexford, in the behalf of Dermotus, son of Marcherdach, called Mac Murg, King of Leynster. In September following, Richard Earl of Chepstow, surnamed Strong-bow, layled into Ireland with twelve hundred men, where he took Waterford and Dublin; and married Eve the daughter of Dermotus, as he was promised. From these beginnings, King Henry being then at rest from all hostile Arms, both at home and abroad, takes into his consideration the Kingdom of Ireland, as a Kingdom which oftentimes afforded assistance to the French; and therefore purposing with himself by all means to subdue it, he provides a mighty Army, and in the Winter season saileth thither, taking Shipping at Pembroke, and landing near to Waterford: where entering into consultation what course was fittest to be taken in the enterprise, suddenly of their own accord the Princes of the Countrey came in, and submitted themselves unto him, only Roderick King of Gomnatch stood out; who being the greatest, thought to make himself the only King of that Nation: but King Henry forbearing him for the present, who kept himself in the fastness of Boggs and Woods, and was not to be followed in the Winter season, takes his journey to Dublin, the chief City of the Countrey; and there calling the Princes and Bishops of the Nation together, requires their consent to have him and his heirs to be their King: which they affirming they could not do without the Popes authority, to whom, at their first conversion to the Christian Religion, they had submitted themselves, the King sent presently to Adrian the then Pope, an English man, requiring his assent; which upon divers good considerations he granted; and hereupon the King built him a stately Palace in the City of Dublin; and having thus without blood possessed himself of the Kingdom, the Spring following he returns joyfully into England. About four years after Roderick also sends his Chancellour to King Henry, to offer his submission, with a tribute to be paid of every ten beasts, one sufficient. After this, in the one and thirtieth year of his reign, he sent his Son John to be the Governour there.

He keeps Abbeyes vacant in his hands. He resumes Crown Lands. His Parsimony. He left behind him nine hundred thousand pounds in money.

Taxations in his time, were chiefly once; when he took Esuage of English men, towards his wars in France, which amounted to 12400 pounds: but confiscations were many, because many Rebellions, and every Rebellion was as good as a Mine. Also vacancies of Bishopricks and Abbeyes, kept in his hands sometimes many at once; no time without some. He resumed also all Lands which had either been sold or given from the Crown by his Predecessors: but a principal cause that made him plentiful in money, was his Parsimony; as when he was enjoined for a Penance, to build three Abbeyes, he performed it, by changing Secular Priests into Regular Canons, only to spare cost: And it was not the least cause of alienating his Sons from him, that he allowed them not maintenance answerable to their calling. And it could be nothing but Parsimony while he lived, which brought it to pass, that when he died, there were found in his Coffers, nine hundred thousand pounds, besides Plate and Jewels

Laws and Ordinances in his time.

IN the beginning of his reign, he refined and reformed the Laws of the Realm; making them more tolerable and more profitable to his people then they were before. In the one and twentieth year of his reign, he divided his whole Kingdom into six several Circuits; appointing in every Circuit three Judges, who twice every year should ride together, to hear and determine Causes between man and man: as at this day, though altered in the number of the Judges, and in the Shires of Circuits. In this Kings dayes the number of Jews all England over was great: yet, whereforever they dwelt, they might not bury any of their dead any where but in London; which being a great inconvenience to bring dead bodies oftentimes from far remove places, the King gave them liberty of burial in several places where they lived. It was in this Kings dayes also ordained, that Clergy men offending in hunting the Kings Deer, should be punishable by the Civil Magistrate, according to the Laws of the Land; which order was afterward taken with them for any offence whatsoever they committed: Though it be not a Law, yet it is an Ordinance which was first brought in by this King, that the Lions should be kept in the Tower of London. Also this King made a Statute; concerning Armour and Weapons; that every man that held a Knights-Fee, should be bound to have a pair of Curraffes, an Helmer, with Shield and Spear; and that every man of the Laity, having Goods and Revenues to the value of sixteen Marks, should have one pair of Curraffes, an Helmer, a Spear and a Shield; and every man worth ten Marks should have an Habergeon, a Steel Cap, and a Spear.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

This Kings reign is famous for the contention of a Subject with the Prince, and though it may be thought no equal match, yet in this example we shall find it hard to judge which of them had the victory. But before we come to speak of the Contention, it is fit to say something of the Man, and of the Quarrel; The man was Thomas Becket born in London, his Father, one Gilbert Becket, his Mother an outlandish woman, of the Countrey of Syria; His first rising was under Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, who taking a liking to him, (as one saith, no man knew for what) made him first Archdeacon of Canterbury, and then used means to have him be the Princes Tutor, after that to be Chancellour of England, and after the decease of the said Theobald, was himself made Archbishop of Canterbury in his place. One memorable thing he did at his coming to be Archbishop, he surrendered his place being Chancellour, as not thinking it fit to sit at the Helm of the Common-wealth, and of the Church, both at once. But now began the contention between the King and him: the difference was the King would have it ordained that Clergy who were malefactors, should be tried before the Secular Magistrate as Lay-men were: This Becket opposed, saying it was against the Liberty of the Church, and therefore against the honour of God. Many Bishops stood with the King, some few with Becket; the Contention grew long, and with the length still hotter, till at last Becket was content to assent to the Ordinance with this clause, Salvo Ordine suo: the King liked not the clause, as being a deluding of the Ordinance: He required an absolute assent, without any clause of Reservation: At last, after many debates and demurs, the Archbishop yields to this also, and subscribes the Ordinance, and set his hand unto it: But going homewards, it is said, his Cross-bearer, and some other about him, blamed him for that he had done; but whether moved with their words, or otherwise upon second thoughts, the next day when they met again, he openly repented his former deed, retracts his subscription, and sends to the Pope for abolition of his fault: which the Pope not only granted, but encouraged him to persist in the course he had begun. It may be thought a fable, yet it is related by divers good Authors, that one time during this contention, certain fellows cut off the Archbishops Horses tail; after which fact, all their children were born with tails like Horses; and that this continued long in their Posterity, though now long since ceased, and perhaps their families too. But King Henry finding there was no prevailing with Becket by fair means, begins to deal more roughly with him; and first makes use of Authority upon his Temporalities; and withal a censure was spoken of to be intended against his person; which Becket understanding, thought it his best course to flee the Realm, and thereupon passing under the name of Dereman, he passeth over Sea, and there, two years by the Pope, and five by the King of France, was maintained as G it were of Alms; in which misery, nothing vexed him so much, as that King Henry sent all his kindred, Men and Women, old and young, into banishment after him. And now King Henry finding that Becket stood much upon his Legatine Power, sent messengers to the Pope, desiring him to take that power from him, and to confer it upon his Archbishop of York; but the Pope answered he would not do so, but was content the King himself should be his Legate, and sent him Letters to that purpose, which King Henry took in such scorn, that he threw away the Letters, and sent them presently back to him again. This dignity of Legathship, for the diligent service of Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, was by a special Decree of Pope Innocent the second,

In this mean time, the King of France prevailed with King Henry to afford Becket a conference, hoping to bring them to some Agreement; where being together, King Henry alleadged before the King of France, that he required nothing of Becket, but his assent to an Ordinance, to which in his Grand-father King Henry the first's time, all the Bishops of the Realm; and the Archbishop of Canterbury that then was, did give their Assent; yet this moved not Becket at all; but he continued his former Tenet; it was against the honour of God; and therefore desired to be excused: See now (saith King Henry) the perverseness of this man, all that agrees not with his own humour, is presently against the honour of God. While these things were thus a working, Becket had gotten him more friends at Rome, and by their means prevailed with the Pope, to give him power to interdict some Bishops in England that had done him wrong, and the Pope spared not to threaten Excommunication to King Henry himself, if he restored not Becket to his dignity. But whether awed with his threatnings, or won by the King of France's importunity, or else perhaps relenting in himself, he was contented at last that Becket should return home and enjoy his Bishoprick; who being come to Canterbury, the Bishops whom he had interdicted for Crowning the young King Henry, (which he said was his right to have done) made humble suit unto him, to be released of the censure. Which, when the Archbishop would not grant, but with certain cautions and exceptions, the Bishops discontented went over to the King, complaining of the hard measure that was offered them by the Archbishop: whereat the King being much moved, Shall I never (saith he) be at quiet for this Priest? If I had any about me that loved me, they would find some way or other to rid me of this trouble: Whereupon four Knights standing by, that heard the King make this complaint, namely Reynold Fitzurse, or Bareson, Hugh Morvill, William Tracy, and Richard Britton, thinking they should do an acceptable service to the King, went shortly after into England, and going to Canterbury, found the Archbishop then at Church, when upon the steps there, they struck him upon the head with their Swords and slew him the thirtieth day of December, in the year 1172. Afterward with much ado, by King Henry's means they were pardoned by the Pope, only enjoyed Penance to go on Pilgrimage to Jerusalem, as some write, but others more probably, that the King abhorred them ever after; and that within three years after they all dyed miserably. You have heard his persecution, and (as some would have it called) his Martyrdom: now hear the honours that have been done him, and the visitations to his Tombe. And first King Henry himself coming to Canterbury, as soon as he came within sight of Becket's Church, lighting of his Horse, and putting off his hose and shoes, he went barefoot to his Tombe; and for a further penance suffered himself to be beaten with rods, by every Monk of the Cloister. A few years after, King Lewis of France comes into England of purpose to visit the Shrine of St. Thomas, where having paid his Vows, he makes Oblations with many rich Presents. The like many Princes since that time have done; and many Miracles are reported to have been done at his Tombe, which yet may be unbeliev'd without unbelief, and with Faith enough. It is worth observing, how some dayes are to some men more fortunate then other dayes: as Matthew Paris writes of this Becket; that Tuesday was observed to be a fortunate day to him: for upon Tuesday he was born: upon a Tuesday he was banished: upon a Tuesday he was recalled from Banishment: upon a Tuesday he suffered Martyrdom: upon a Tuesday fifty years after his death, his body with great solemnity was translated.

Another difference in this Kings dayes, was between the two Archbishops of England, about the jurisdiction of Canterbury over York, which being referred to the Pope, he gave judgement on Canterburys side. Also in this Kings dayes there was a Schism in the Church of Rome, two Popes up at once, of whom Alexander the third was one; which schism continued the space of almost 20. years. Also in this Kings dayes, one Nicholas Break-spear, born at St. Albans, or as other write, at Langely in Hertfordshire, being a bondman of that Abbey, and therefore not to be allowed to be a Monk there, went beyond Sea, where he profited in Learning, that the Pope made him first Bishop of Alba, and afterward Cardinal, and sent him Legate to the Norweges, where he reduced that Nation from Paganism to Christianity, and returning back to Rome, was chosen Pope by the name of Adrian the Fourth, and dyed, being choked with a Fly in his drink. In his dayes also Heraclius Patriarch of Jerusalem, came to King Henry, desiring aid for the Holy-Land, but not so much of money as of men; and not so much of men neither, as of a good General, as himself was; to whom King Henry answered, that though he were willing to undertake it, yet his unquiet State at home would not suffer him with which answer the Patriarch moved, said, Think not Great King, that Pretences will excuse you before God, but take this from me, that as you forsake Gods cause now, so he hereafter will forsake you in your greatest need. But (saith the King) if I should be absent out of my Kingdom; my own Sons would be ready to rise up against me in my absence; to which the Patriarch replied, No marvel, for from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they shall; and so departed. Also in this Kings dayes there came into England, thirty Germans, Men and Women, calling themselves Publicans, who denied Matrimony, and the Sacraments of Baptism, and of the Lords Supper, with other Articles, who being obstinate, and not to be reclaimed, the King commanded they should be marked with a hot Iron in the forehead, and be whipped, which punishment they took patiently, their Captain (called Gerard) going before them singing, Blessed are ye when men men hate you. After they were whipped, they were thrust out of doors in the Winter, where they died with cold and hunger, no man daring to relieve them. This King after his conquest of Ireland, imposed the tribute of Peter pence upon that Kingdom, namely, that every house in Ireland should yearly pay a penny to St. Peter. In this Kings time, was held by Pope Alexander the third, the General Council of Lateran consisting of 310 Bishops: where many Ordinances were made for the peace of the Church. Also in the 33 year of his Reign Jerusalem was taken by the Turks.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

This King founded the Church of Bristow, which King Henry the eighth afterward erected into a Cathedral: He also founded the Priors of Dover; of Stonely; and of Basingwerk; and the Cattle of Rudlan: and began the Stone-bridge over the Thames at London. He caused also the Cattle of Warwick to be builded. Maude the Emperets his Mother, founded the Abbey of Bordesly. In his time also Hugh Mortimer founded Wigmore Abbey: Richard Lincey the Kings Chief Justice laid the Foundation of the Conventual Church, in the honour of St. Thomas, in a place which is called Westwood, otherwise Lesnes, in the Territory of Rochester in the new Parish of Southfleet. He also builded the Cattle of Anger in Essex. Robert Harding a Burgess of Bristow, to whom King Henry gave the Barony of Barkley, builded the Monastery of St. Augustines in Bristow. In the tenth of his reign, London Bridge was new made of Timber, by Peter of Cole-church a Priest. Robert de Boscue Earl of Lyecester, founded the Monastery of Garendon, of Monks; and of Lyecester, called St. Mary de Pater, of Canons Regular; and his Wife Amicia, Daughter of Ralph Montford, founded Eaton, of Nuns. In the two and twentieth year of his reign, after the foundation of St. Mary Overies Church in Southwark, the Stone Bridge over the Thames at London, began to be founded, towards which a Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury gave a thousand Marks. Aldred Bishop of Worcester founded a Monastery at Gloucester of Benedictine Monks.

Casualties that happened in his time.

In the eleventh year of this Kings reign, on the six and twentieth day of January, was so great an Earth-quake in Ely, Norfolk, and Suffolk, that it overthrew them that stood upon their feet, and made the Bells to ring in the Steeples. In the seventeenth year of his reign, there was seen at St. Oystes in Essex, a Dragon of marvellous bigness, which by moving burned houses; and the whole City of Canterbury was the same year almost burnt. In the eighteenth year of his reign, the Church of Norwich with the houses thereto belonging was burnt, and the Monks dispersed. At Andover, a Priest praying before the Altar, was slain with Thunder. Likewise one Clerk and his brother was burnt to death with Lightning. In the three and twentieth year, a shoure of bloud rained in the Isle of Wight two hours together. In the four and twentieth year, the City of York was burnt; and on Christmas day, in the Territory of Derlington, in the Bishoprick of Durham, the Earth lifted up her self in manner of an high Tower, and so remained unmovable from morning till evening, and then fell with so horrible a noise that it frightened the Inhabitants thereabouts, and the Earth swallowing it up, made there a deep pit, which is seen at this day: for a Testimony whereof Leyland saith, he saw the Pits there, commonly called Hell-kettles. Also in the same year, on the tenth day of April, the Church of St. Andrews in Rochester was consumed with fire. In the eight and twentieth year of his reign, Barnwell with the Priory, near unto Cambridge, was burnt. In the thirtieth year, the Abbey of Glasfenbury was burnt, with the Church of St. Julian. In the year 1180. a great Earth-quake threw down many buildings, amongst which the Cathedral Church of Lincoln was rent in pieces the five and twentieth of April: and on the twentieth of October, the Cathedral Church of Chichester, and all the whole City was burnt. This year also, near unto Oxford in Suffolk, certain Fishers took in their Nets a Fish, having the shape of a man in all points, which Fish was kept by Bartholomew de Glanville in the Cattle of Oxford six moneths and more; he spake not a word; all manner of meats he did gladly eat, but most greedily raw Fish, when he had pressed out the juyce; oftentimes he was brought to the Church, but never shewed any sign of adoration: at length, being not well looked to, he stole to the Sea, and never was seen after. In the year 1188, on the twentieth of September, the Town of Beaurley with the Church of St. John there was burnt. And in this Kings time the bones of King Arthur, and his Wife Guinevere, were found in the Vale of Avolan, under an hollow Oak, fifteen foot under ground; the hair of the said Guinevere being then whole and of fresh colour; but as soon as it was touched, it fell to powder, as Faalun relateth.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Eleanor Daughter and heir of William Duke of Guien, late Wife of Lewis the seventh King of France, but then divorced, but for what cause divorced is diversly related; some say King Lewis carried her with him into the Holy Land, where she carried her self nor very holily, but led a licentious life, and which is the worst kind of licentiousness, in carnal familiarity with a Turk; which King Lewis though knowing, yet dissembled, till coming home, he then waved that cause, as which he could not bring without disgrace to himself, and made use of their nearness in blood, as being Cousins in the fourth degree, which was allowed by the Pope, as a cause sufficient to divorce them, though he had at that time two Daughters by her. Being thus divorced, Duke Henry marries her, with whom it was never known, but she led a modest and sober life, a sufficient proof, that the former report was but a slander. By this Queen Eleanor he had five Sons, William, Henry, Richard, Geoffry, and John; and three Daughters, Maud married to Henry Duke of Saxony; Eleanor married to Alphonso the Eighth of that name, King of Castile; and Jane or Jone married to William King of Sicily. Of his Sons, William died young. Henry born the second year of his reign, was Crowned King with his Father, in the eighteenth year, and died the nine and twentieth year, and was buried at Roan; married to Margaret, Daughter of Lewis King of France, but left no issue. Richard born at Oxford (in the Kings Palace there called Beau-mont) in the fourth year of his Fathers reign, and succeeded him in the Kingdom. Geoffry born the fifth year of his Fathers reign, married Constance Daughter and Heir of Conan, Earl of Little Britain, in the fourteenth year, and in the two and thirtieth year died; leaving by his Wife Constance, two Daughters, and a Posthumous Son named Arthur. John his youngest, called John without Land, because he had no Land assigned him in his Fathers time; born the twelfth year of his Fathers reign, and succeeded his brother Richard in the Kingdom. And this may be reckoned a peculiar honour to this King, that of his five Sons, three of them lived to be Kings; and of his three Daughters, two of them to be Queens. Concubines he had many, but two more famous than the rest; and one of these two more famous than the other; and this was Rosamund, Daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, whom he kept at Woodstock, in lodgings so cunningly contrived, that no stranger could find the way in, yet Queen Eleanor did, being guided by a thread: so much is the eye of jealousy quicker in finding out, than the eye of care is in hiding. What the Queen did to Rosamund when she came to her, is uncertain; but this is certain, that Rosamund lived but a short time after, and lies buried in the Nunnery of Godstow near to Oxford. By this Rosamund King Henry had two Sons, William called Longsword; who was Earl of Salisbury in right of his Wife Ela, Daughter and Heir of William Earl of that Countrey, and had by her much issue, whose posterity continued a long time: And a second Son named Geoffry, who was first Bishop of Lincoln, and afterward Archbishop of York, and after five years banishment in his Brother King John's time, died in the year 1213. The other famous Concubine of this King Henry, was the Wife of Ralph Blouet a Knight; by whom he had a Son named Morgan, who was Provost of Beverley, and being to be elected Bishop of Durham, went to Rome for a dispensation, because being a battard, he was else incapable: But the Pope refusing to grant it, unless he would pass as the Son of Blouet, he absolutely answered, he would for no cause in the world deny his Father; and chose rather to lose the Dignity of the Place, than of his Blood, as being the Son, though but the base Son of a King.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was somewhat red of face, and broad breasted; short of body, and therewithal fat, which made him use much Exercise and little meat. He was commonly called Henry Shortmantel, because he was the first that brought the use of short Cloaks out of Anjou into England. Concerning endowments of mind, he was of spirit in the highest degree Generous; which made him often say, that all the World sufficed not to a courageous heart. He had the Reputation of a wise Prince all the Christian World over; which made Alphonso King of Castile, and Garsias King of Navarre refer a difference that was between them, to his Arbitrament: who so judiciously determined the cause, that he gave contentment to both parties; a harder matter then to cut cloth even by a thread. His custom was to be always in action; for which cause, if he had no real Wars, he would have feigned: and would transport Forces either into Normandy or Britain, and go with them himself, whereby he was always prepared of an Army: and made it a Schooling to his Souldiers, and to himself an Exercise. To his children he was both indulgent and hard; for out of indulgence he caused his Son Henry to be Crowned King in his own time; and out of hardness he caused his younger Sons to rebel against him. He was rather Superstitious then not Religious; which he shewed more by his carriage toward Becket being dead then while he lived. His Incontinency was not so much that he used other women beside his Wife, but the affianced Wife of his own Son: And it was commonly thought, he had a meaning to be divorced from his Wife Queen Eleanor, and to take the said Adela to be his

A his Wife. Yet generally to speak of him: he was an excellent Prince; and if in some particulars he were defective, it must be considered he was a man.

Of his Death and Burial.

HE was not well at ease before, but when the King of France sent him a List of those that had conspired against him, and that he found the first man in the List to be his Son John, he then fell suddenly into a fit of fainting, which so encreased upon him, that within four daies after he ended his life: So strong a Corrofive is grief of mind, when it meets with a body weakened before with sickness. He died in Normandy, in the year 1189. when he had lived three score and one years; reigned near five and thirty: and was buried at Fountains in France; the manner of whose burial was thus: He was clothed in his Royal Robes, his Crown upon his head, white Gloves upon his hands, Boots of Gold upon his legs; Gilt Spurs at his heels, a great rich Ring upon his finger, his Scepter in his hand, his Sword by his side, and his face uncovered and all bare. As he was carried to be buried, his Son Richard in great haste ran to see him, who no sooner was come near the body, but suddenly at his Nostrils he fell a bleeding afresh; which though it were in Prince Richard no good sign of Innocency, yet his breaking presently into bitter tears upon the seeing it, was a good sign of Repentance. It may not be unreasonable to speak in this place of a thing which all Writers speak of, that in the Family of the Earls of Anjou, of whom this King Henry came, there was once a Princess a great Enchantress, who being on a time enforced to take the blessed Eucharist, she suddenly flew out at the Church window, and was never seen after: From this Woman these latter Earls of Anjou were descended, which perhaps made the Patriarch Heracimus say of this King Henry's children, that from the Devil they came, and to the Devil they would. But Writers perhaps had been more compleat, if they had left this story out of their Writings.

Men of Note in his time.

OF Clergy men, there was Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, Hugh Bishop of Lincoln; Richard Bishop of Winchester; Geoffry of Ely; Robert of Bathe; Aldred of Worcester; all learned men, and of great integrity of life. Of Military men, there was Robert Earl of Leicester; Reynold Earl of Cornwal; Hugh Bigot, Robert Ferrys, Richard Lucy, Roger Mowbray, Ralph Fulger, Ranulph Granula, William Vesci, and Raynard Baylioll; men of great achievements in War, and of no less abilities in Peace.

Crowned.

The manner of his Coronation.

tion.

IN Q. Richard the first of that name, after his Fathers Funeral, went to Roan, where he resided the state of that Province; and from thence came into England, where he was Crowned King at Westminster, by the hands of Baldwin Archbishop of Canterbury, the third day of September, in the year 1189. And herein this Prince is more beholding to Writers then any of his Predecessors: for in speaking of their Crowning, they content themselves with telling where, and by whom they were Crowned; but of this Prince, they deliver the manner of his Crowning, in the full amplitude of all circumstances; which perhaps is not unfit to do, for satisfaction of such as are never like to see a Coronation; and it was in this manner. First, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Roan, Trier, and Dublin, with all the other Bishops, Abbots, B and Clergy, apparelled in rich Copes, and having the Crofs, holy Water, and Centers carried before them; came to fetch him at the door of his Privy-Chamber; and there receiving him, they led him to the Church of Westminster, till they came before the high Altar, with a solemn Procession. In the middle of the Bishops and Clergy, went four Barons, bearing Candlesticks with Tapers; after whom came Goffrey de Lucy, bearing the Cap of Maintenance, and John Marshall next to him, bearing a massie pair of Spurs of Gold; then followed William Marshall Earl of Strigul, alias Pembroke, who bare the Royal Scepter, in the top whereof was set a Crofs of Gold; and William de Patrick, Earl of Salisbury going next him, bare the Warder or Rod, having on the top thereof a Dove. Then came three other Earls, David, Brother to the King of Scots, the Earl of Huntington, John the Kings Brother, Earl of Mortaigne, and Robert Earl of Leicester, each of them bearing a Sword upright in his hand with the scabberds richly adorned with Gold. The Earl of Mortaigne went in the midst betwixt the other two; after them followed six Earls and Barons, bearing a Checker Table, upon the which were set the Kings Scepters of Arms; and then followed William Mandevill Earl of Albemarle, bearing a Crown of Gold a great height before the King, who followed having the Bishop of Durham on the right hand, and Reynold Bishop of Ruthe on the left; over whom a Canopy was born: and in this order he came into the Church at Westminster, where before the high Altar, in the presence of the Clergy and the people, laying his hand upon the holy Evangelists, and the reliques of certain Saints, he took a solemn Oath that he should observe peace, honour and reverence to Almighty God, to his Church, and to his Ministers, all the daies of his life; also that he should exercise upright Justice to the people committed to his charge, and that he should abrogate and disannul all evil Laws and wrongful Customes, if any were to be found in the precinct of his Realm; and maintain those that were good and laudable. This done, he put off all his garments from his middle upwards, but only his shirt, which was open on the shoulders that he might be anointed. Then the Archbishop of Canterbury anointed him in three places; on the head, on the shoulder, and on the right arm; with Prayers in such case accustomed. After this, he covered his head with a linnen

A linnen cloth hallowed, and set his Cap thereon; and then after he had put on his Royal Garment, and his uppermost Robe, the Archbishop delivered him the Sword, with which he should beat down the Enemies of the Church: which done, two Earls put his Shoes upon his feet, and having his Mantle put on him, the Archbishop forbad him on the behalf of Almighty God, to presume to take upon him this Dignity, except he faithfully meant to perform those things which he had there sworn to perform; whereunto the King made answer, that by Gods grace he would perform them. Then the King took the Crown beside the Altar, and delivered it to the Archbishop, which he set upon the Kings head, delivering to him the Scepter to hold in his right hand, and the Rod Royal in his left hand: and thus being Crowned, he was brought back by the Bishops and Barons, with the Crofs and Candlesticks, and three Swords, passing forth before him unto his Seat: When the Bishop that sang the Mass, came to the Offertory, the two Bishops that brought him to the Church, led him to the Altar, and brought him back again. The Mass ended, he was brought with solemn Procession into his Chamber: and this was the manner of this Kings Coronation. But at this solemnity there fell out a very dysastrous accident: For this Prince not favouring the Jews, as his Father had done, had given a strict charge, that no Jew should be admitted to be a spectator of the solemnity: yet certain Jews, as though it had been the Crowning of King Herod, would needs be preling in; and being put back by Officers set of purpose, it grew to be a brabble, and from words to blows, so as many Jews were hurt, and some slain: and thereupon a rumour was suddenly spread abroad, that the King had commanded to have all the Jews destroyed. Whereupon it is incredible what rifling there was of Jews houses, and what cutting of their throats: and though the King signified by publick Declaration, that he was highly displeased with that which was done, yet there was no staying the multitude till the next day; so often it falls out, that great solemnities are waited on with great dysasters, or rather indeed, as being connatural, they can hardly be asunder.

Many Jews

Of his first Acts after he was Crowned.

HE began with his Mother Queen Eleanor, whom upon her Husbands displeasure, having been kept in Prison sixteen years, he not only set at liberty, but set in as great authority, as if he had been left the Regent of the Kingdom. The next he gratified was his Brother John; to whom he made appear, how much the bounty of a Brother was better then the hardness of a Father: For he conferred upon him, in England, the Earldoms of Cornwall, Dorset, Somerset, Nottingham, Darby, and Leicester; and by the marriage of Isabel, daughter and heir to the Earl of Gloucester, he had that Earldom also, as likewise the Castles of Marleborough, and Lutgarfal, the Honours of Wallingford, Titchil, and Eye, to the value of 4000. Marks a year: an estate so great, as was able to put a very moderate mind into the humour of aspiring, of which Princes should have a care. Concerning his affianced Lady Adela, it may be thought strange, that having desired her so infinitely when he could not have her, now that he might have her, he cared not for her: but the cause was known, and in every mans mouth; that she was now but his Fathers leavings: yet he would not send her home but very rich in Jewels, to make amends, if it might be, for the loss of her Virginity: though this was somewhat hard on his part, when the Father had taken all the pleasure, that the Son should afterward pay all the Charges. But by this at least he made a quiet way for his marriage now concluded, and shortly after to be consummated in Sicily with Berengaria the Daughter of Garfias King of Navarre. And now his minde is wholly set upon his long intended voyage to the Holy-Land, for which he thinks not the treasure left by his Father to be sufficient, which yet amounted to nine hundred thousand pounds: but fore-casting with himself the great charge it must needs be, to carry an Army so long a journey, he seeks to enlarge his provision of money by all the means he can devise. Not long before, Hugh Pudsey had been advanced to the Bishoprick of Durham; and now for a great sum of money he sold him the Earldom: and then laid merrily among his Lords, Do ye not think me a cunning man, that of an old Bishop can make a young Earl? From the Londoners he drained also great sums of money, and made them recompense in Franchises and Liberties, which they had not before. He made also great sales: to the King of Scots, he sold the Castles of Berwick and Roxborough, for ten thousand pounds: to Godfrey de Lucy, Bishop of Winchester, the Manors of Weregrove and Ments: to the Abbot of St. Edmundsbury, the Mannor of Midhall, for one thousand Marks of silver: to the Bishop of Durham, the Manors of Sadborough; and when it was marvelled that he would part with such things, he answered, that in this case he would sell his City of London, if he could find a Chapman. But the worst way of all was, that pretending to have lost his Signet, he made a new one; and made Proclamation, that whosoever would safely enjoy what under the former Signet was granted, should come to have it confirmed by the new; whereby he raised great sums of money to himself, but greater of discontentment in his Subjects. By these, and such like means, he quickly furnished himself with money: and now it remained only to consider, to whose care he should commit the government of the Kingdom in his absence; and after deliberation he made choice for the North-parts, of Hugh Bishop of Durham; joyning in Commission with him, Hugh Baldolph, and William Brumell Brnell: and for the South parts he appoints William Longshampe Bishop of Ely, and Chancellor of England, and for his greater strength, causeth the Pope to make him Legat of all England and Scotland: and for Normandy and Aquitaine, Robert Earl of Leicester, all men eminent for prudence and uprightness, and which is most of all, for loyalty: and indeed to make a man fit for such employment, all these virtues must concur. As for his Brother John, he knew very well his aspiring mind, and therefore would have tyed him to live in Normandy, and not to come into England till his return; but that their Mother Queen Eleanor interceded, and passed her word for him: and that nothing might be left unprovided for, he appointed his Nephew Arthur, the Son of his Brother Geoffrey Duke of Brittain to be his Successeur, if himself should fail. And now, Undique convenire vocat jam carbassus auris, every man is ready to take Shipping, and no stay now but for a Wind; only some say that King Richard before his departing, calling his Lords and Knights unto him, and swearing them to be true; gave to every of them a blew Riband to be known by; from whence the first occasion of the Order of the Garter is thought to begin.

Of his Journey into the Holy-Land.

KING Richard having prepared an Army of thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse, and having appointed to meet Philip King of France in Sicily, at the latter end of June, in the year 1190. sets forward himself by Land to Marfellis, and there stays till his Ships should come about; but his Navie being driven by tempest to other parts, and the King weary of long staying, after six weeks, he hireth shipping for himself and his company, and passeth forward to Messana in Sicily, where arrived also the King of France; and not long after, his own Navy. In this Island the King Williams now lately dead, had married Jane, King Richard's sister; from whom Tancred the present King with-held her Dower: and therefore though he shewed King Richard fair countenance, yet he dealt secretly with the Messanians to use all means to get him gone; whereupon the Messanians taking a small occasion, set suddenly upon the English, and thrust them out of their Town; with which King Richard justly offended, who had his Camp without the Town, prepares himself to revenge the affront; when Tancred sending to him to signify that the affront was offered without his knowledge, and much against his liking, so pacified him, that for the present he remained satisfied; but understanding afterward, that the Messanians did but wait their opportunity till the Spring, when King Richard should be going: he resenting their intention, stays not their leisure, but assailing the Town with fire and sword, in one dayes labour takes it, and had made great slaughter in it, if King Richard had not been moved to compassion with the Messanians tears, but chiefly with King Tancred's offers: both to pay his Sister Jane her Dower, and to marry his daughter to King Richard's Nephew, Arthur, Duke of Brittain, and to give a good part of the portion in hand. But King Philip was not well pleased with these conditions; yet he breaks not out to open dissension, till more felow was afterward cast upon the fire of his anger. In the Spring King Philip sails with his Army to Ptolemais (otherwise called Acon) which the Christians had long besieged, and with them he joyns: while King Richard taking his Sister Jane and Berengaria the young Daughter of the King of Navarre with him, in 190. E Ships, and 50. Gallies, puts to Sea for the Holy-Land, but is by tempest cast upon the Coast of Cyprus; where the Islanders seeking to hinder his landing, he sets upon them with his forces; and invading the Island, easily subdues, and brings it under his subjection; and the King of the Countrey being taken Prisoner, and intreating King Richard not to put him in bonds of Iron, King Richard gives him his word, and keeps it, but puts him in bonds of Silver. In this Island, he solemnized his marriage with Berengaria, and then leaving Richard de Canville, and Robert de Thurnham, his Lieutenants in Cyprus; he passeth on to Ptolemais, which City was defended by Saladine, and had been besieged now two years: when the Enemy seeing and fearing the increase of the Christian forces, propounds conditions, upon which accepted, they deliver it up in August, the year 1192.

At the taking of this Town there fell out an accident, seeming an honour to King Richard for the present, but proving a disgrace, at least a great trouble and charge to him afterward: For Leopold Duke of Austria had first set up his Colours upon the wall, which King Richard caused to be thrown down, and his own to be set up; but this was no place to stand a quarrelling, it came not to the reckoning till some time after. When Ptolemais was taken, Saladine fearing the Christians further proceeding, dismantles all the best Towns that were near it: as Porphyria, Casarea, Ascalon, Gaza; but of Joppa King Richard takes a care, and placeth in it a Colony of Christians: For Joppa is a City of Palestine, that was built before the Flood, and hath belonging to it a Haven of great convenience; And now the King of France, though valiant enough himself, yet thinking his own great acts to be obscured by greater of King Richards; he began, besides his old hating him, now to envy him: For indeed emulation when it is in Vertue, makes the stronger knot of love and affection: but when it is in Glory, it makes a separation, and turns into the passion of envie and malice; and so did it with King Philip, who pretending the air of the Countrey did not agree with his body; but was indeed because the air of Kings Richards Glory did not agree with his mind, obtained King Richard's consent to return home, swearing first solemnly not to molest his Territories in his absence. But this fell out for the present enterprise most unseasonably: For the departure of the King of France, though it diminished not much the

A the strength, (for he left Odo Duke of Burgundy in his place) yet it diminished much the shew of assistance: and indeed Saladine, who was at this time in terms of surrendering Jerusalem, when he saw the King of France departed, as knowing there must needs be a conclusion, where there was a beginning, doubted not but the rest would follow soon after, and thereupon stayed his hands, and grew more confident then he was before. At this time Guy of Lusignan was possessor of the City of Tyre, and with it, of the right of the Kingdom of Jerusalem: with him King Richard makes an exchange, that Guy should have the Island of Cyprus, which King Richard had won, and King Richard should have the Kingdom of Jerusalem, to which Guy had a right: and upon this title the Kings of England were styled Kings of Jerusalem a long time after: as likewise the posterity of the said Guy hath by this exchange held the Kingdom of Cyprus to this day.

B Now was King Richard more hot upon taking Jerusalem then ever before; and had certainly taken it, but that by ill counsel diverted, because the Winter drew on, and indeed by the drawing back of Odo Duke of Burgundy, who envied that King Richard should have the honour of taking it, he removed for that season to Ascalon, after which time, the Enemy growing stronger, and the Christians weaker, all opportunity of taking it is utterly lost, and they could never come to the like again. And shortly after King Richard was advertised of the King of France his invading Normandy, contrary to his oath at his departure; which forced King Richard, much to his grief, to conclude a peace with Saladine, and that upon conditions not very honourable for the Christians; and himself presently to return home: and so sending his wife Berengaria, and his sister Jane, with a great part of his Army into Sicily, and from thence into England: he passeth himself with some few in his company, by the way of Thrace, and was by tempest brought into Dalmatia; from whence being to pass through Germany, and particularly through Duke Leopolds Countrey of Austria: he remembering the old grudge, changed his apparel, and travelling sometimes afoot, and sometimes on horseback, he used all means possible to keep himself from being known; but destiny is not to be avoided, for as soon as he came to Vienna, partly by his tongue, and partly by his expences, it was presently found he was an English man, and withal some great man; and by and by a rumour was spread, that it was Richard King of England; who finding himself to be discovered, and no means possible to escape, he puts off his disguise, putting on his Princely apparel, and avowes himself: which Duke Leopold understanding, sent presently to have him apprehended; but King Richard refusing to yield himself to any, but to the Duke himself; the Duke himself came and led him to his own Palace honourably enough, but yet strongly guarded; whereof as soon as Henry the Emperour heard, he sent with great instance to Duke Leopold to send King Richard over to him, under pretence of safer custody, but with a purpose indeed to be a sharer in his Ransome: And the Duke though well knowing his meaning, yet knowing withal that it was not safe for him to deny the Emperour, he sent him over to him, who soon after, put him into a prison he had, called Trivallis, into which no man was ever known to be put that escaped with life, though done perhaps to him, but in terror, to draw the better Ransome from him. That with which King Richard was charged, belide the wrong done to Leopold, in throwing down his Colours at Ptolemais, was the death of Conrade Duke of Tyre, whom they pretended King Richard had murdered; wherein though King Richard made

E his innocency appear by the testimony of Limboldus, who confessed himself to have been the author of the Marqueses death; yet the pretence served to detain him in prison: and in prison indeed they kept him, till his Ransome was agreed upon and paid, which being a hundred thousand pounds, fourscore thousand was paid in hand; whereof two parts to the Emperour; a third part to Duke Leopold: and for the rest, hostages given to the number of fifty; of whom the Bishop of Roan was one: though the hostages afterward were delivered without paying the rest: for Henry the Emperour dying shortly after, his Successeur had the conscience not to take it, as knowing it had been unjustly exacted; and indeed the accidents that befell both the Emperour and the Duke Leopold, were evident demonstrations of the injustice they had done; for the Emperour shortly after died, and the Duke Leopold, in a Tilting for solemnity of his birthday, fell off his horse, and so broke his leg, that to save his life, he was fain to have his leg cut off; And now after fifteen moneths imprisonment, King Richard is released, and returns into England four years elder then he went out; and thus ended his journey to the Holy Land. Yet one memorable accident happening to him in the Holy Land, may not be omitted: that going one day a Hawking about Joppa, finding himself weary, he laid him down upon the ground to sleep; when suddenly certain Turks came upon him to take him; but he awakened with their noise, riseth up, gets a horseback, and drawing out his sword, assaults the Turks, who feigning to flee, drew the King into an Ambush where many Turks lay; who had certainly taken him if he had known his person; but one of the Kings servants, called William de Patrellis, crying A faithful out in the Saracen tongue, that he was the King, they presently lay hold upon him, and let the King escape.

The Duke John takes up on him as King.

KING Richard at his going out of England, had so well settled the Government of the Kingdom, that it might well have kept it in good order during all the time of his absence; but disorders are weeds which no foresight can hinder from growing, having so many hands to water them: where occasions of distaste are no sooner offered, then taken; and oftentimes taken before they be offered, as was here to be seen. For King Richard had left in chief place of authority, William Longshampe, Bishop of Ely; a man who for carried himself, that although the things he did, were justifiable; yet the pride with which he did them was unsufferable: seldom riding abroad without five hundred, some say a thousand in his train; not for safety, but for state: and though there were other left in authority besides himself, yet his power was so predominant, that he made of them but ciphers, and ruled all as he list himself. This insolvency of governing was soon distasteful by many, and especially by John the Kings brother, who counting the greatness of his birth an equal match at least with any substitute greatness, affronted the Bishop in the managing of affairs, in such sort, that while some adhered to the one, and some to the other; the Kingdom in the mean time was in danger to be rent asunder, till at last the Bishop finding himself too weak, or at least fearing that he was so; but rather indeed deposed from his authority by the Kings Letters, and the Archbishop of Roan put in his place, thought it best for him to flee the Realm: whereupon for his greater safety, disguising himself in womans apparel, and carrying a Webb of Cloth under his arm, he sought in this manner to take shipping and pass the Sea. But being discovered and known, the women in revenge of the abuse done to their clothes, in making them his instruments of fraud; fell upon him, and so beat him, that it might have beaten humility into him for ever after. This disgrace made him glad to get him into Normandy, his native Countrey, where to little purpose he wooed King Richard and Queen Eleanor for reparation. But this was but a sport in comparison of the mischiefs done in Normandy by Philip King of France: for first he invades Normandy, where he takes many Towns, and amongst others Gyssort, and draws the Kings brother John to combine with him, promising to assist him in winning the Kingdom of England, and to have his Sister Adela, whom King Richard had repudiated, to be his wife; with which promise Duke John had been ensnared, if his Mother Queen Eleanor had not dissuaded him. But in England Duke John took upon him as King, persuading the people that his brother King Richard was not living: and indeed it was easie to remove, they knowing him to be a prisoner, to the affirming him to be dead; but such was the faithfulness of the Archbishop of Roan, and other the Princes of the Realm to King Richard, that they opposed Duke John, and frustrated all his practices: and the Bishop of Ely had told him plainly, that though King Richard were dead, yet the succession in the Kingdom belonged not to him, but to Arthur Duke of Brittain, Son of Geoffry his elder brother. And in these terms King Richard found his State when he returned from the Holy Land.

His Acts and Troubles after his returning from the Holy Land.

Reconciled to his brother John.

AT his coming home from the Holy Land, the first thing he did, was to give his Lords and people thanks for their faithfulness to him in his absence, and then for their readiness in supplying him for his Ransome. But as for his brother John in whom Ungratefulness seemed to strive with Ambition, which should be the greater in him: he depriveth him of all those great possessions he had given him: some adoe he had to make found certain pieces which he had corrupted, as the Castles of Marleborough, Lancaster, and a Fortref at Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall; but chiefly the Castles of Nottingham and Tichill, which stood so firmly for Duke John, that they were not reduced to obedience without some blood, and much expense. But his greatest trouble was with Philip King of France, in whom was to ingrafted a spleen against King Richard, that he seemed to be never well but when he was working him some ill. Now therefore King Richard to make it appear he had not left the Holy War for nothing (having first obtained in Parliament a Subsidy towards his charges, and caused himself to be new Crowned at Winchester, (when the King of Scots bore one of the three swords before him) left the people through his long absence might have forgotten they had a King) he departs with a hundred ships into Normandy; but it was withall, upon this occasion: sitting one day at dinner in his little Hall (as it was called) news was brought him, that King Philip had besieged Vernouill, with which he was so moved, that he swore a great Oath he would not turn his face till he were revenged: whereupon he caused the wall right before him to be presently beaten down, that so he might pass forward without turning his face, and thus in haste he goes to Vernouill, whither he was no sooner come, but the King of France made as great haste to be gone, not without some loss, and more disgrace. Here his brother John submits himself to him, and with great shew of penitence intreats his pardon, which he readily granted; saying only, I wish you may as well remember your fault, as I shall forget it. The King of France having left Vernouill, enters Turronia, and near to Venducinum pitcheth his Tents; thither King Richard follows him, and with his coming so affrighted him, that leaving bag and baggage, Munition, Tents and Treasure to a marvellous

A marvellous value, he get him gone, and glad he was so rid of King Richard. After this a Truce was agreed upon for a year, which each of them longed till it was expired; as having no pleasure but in troubling one another. In this time there was a trouble at home, though not to the King, yet to the Kingdom: for Robin Hood accompanied with one little John, and a hundred stout fellows more, molested all passengers upon the High-way; of whom it is said, that he was of noble blood, at least made Noble, no less then an Earl, for some deferving services: but having waited his estate in riotous courses, very penury forced him to take this course; in which yet it may be said he was honestly dishonest, for he seldom hurt any man, never any woman, spared the poor, and only made prey of the rich: till the King setting forth a Proclamation to have him apprehended, it happened he fell sick at a certain Nunnery in Yorkshire called Birkleys; and desiring there to be let blood, was betrayed, and made bleed to death. Such another trouble, though not to the King, yet to the Kingdom, fell out by reason of the Jews: and first at the Town of Linne in Norfolk, upon this occasion: A Jew being turned Christian, was persecuted by those of his Nation, and assaulted in the street; who thereupon flying to a Church hard by was thither also followed, and the Church assaulted; which the people of the Town seeing, in succour of the new Christian, they fell upon the Jews, of whom they slew a great number, and after pillaged their houses. By this example the like assaults were made upon the Jews at Stamford; and after that at Lincoln; and lastly at York, where infinite number of Jews were massacred; and some of them blocked up in the Castle, cut the throats of their wives and children, and cast them over the walls upon the Christians heads, and then burnt both the Castle and themselves: neither could this sedition be stayed, till the King sent his Chancellour the Bishop of Ely, with force of Arms, to punish the offenders. His last trouble was a punishment of covetousness, for one Gnydower having found a great treasure in the Kings Dominions, and for fear of King Richard, flying to a Town of the King of France for his safeguard; was pursued by the King, but the Town denying him entrance, and he thereupon going about the walls to find the fittest place for assaulting it, one Bertram de Gerdon, or as others call him Peter Basile, shot at him with a Cross-bow, and hit him on the arm, of which wound he dyed within four dayes after, and so ended all his troubles.

Of his Taxations and wayes for raising of Money.

OF Taxations properly so called, there were never fewer in any Kings reign: but of ways to draw money from the Subject, never more. It is true, the first money raised for his journey, was all out of his own estate, by selling or pawning of Lands; but then at his coming back, he resumed the Lands into his hands again, without paying back the money he had received; this if it may not have the name, yet certainly it had the venome of a bitter Taxation. Likewise the feigning to have lost his Seal, and then injoyning them to have their Grants confirmed by a new; though it went not in the number, yet it had the weight of a heavy Taxation where it lighted. Afterward, the money raised for his Ransom, was not so properly a Taxation, as a Contribution: or if a Taxation for him, yet not by him; which was done in his absence, by the Subjects themselves: and indeed no Taxations are commonly so pinching, as those which are imposed upon the Subject by the Subject, and such was this; for to raise money for his Ransome, there was imposed upon every Knights Fee, 20 s. of all Lay-mens Revenues the fourth part; and the fourth part of all the Revenues of the Clergy; with a tenth of their Goods. Also the Chalmes and Treasure of all Churches were taken to make up the sum. Afterward, this only was a plain Taxation, and granted in Parliament; that of every Plough-land through England, he should have two shillings, and of the Monks Cisteaux, all their Wool of that year: And one more greater then this; and was this year imposed towards his Wars in Normandy; that every Hide of Land, as much as to say; every hundred Acres of Land, should pay five shillings, which computed without deductions, will rise to a sum that will seem incredible.

Laws and Ordinances in his time.

HIS Ordinances were chiefly for the Meridian of London: for where before his time the City was governed by Portgraves, this King granted them to be governed by two Sheriffs and a Maior, as now it is; and to give the first of these Magistrates, the honour to be remembered, the names of the Sheriffs were Henry Cornhill, and Richard Reynier; and the name of the first Lord Maior, was Henry Fitz-Alwyn, who continued Maior during his life, which was four and twenty years. But Fabian who was himself a Sheriffe of London, and by that means most likely to know the truth, affirmeth, that the Officers ordained now by King Richard, were but only two Bailiffs: and that there was no Maior nor Sheriffe of London, till the tenth year of King John: and therefore at that year, I will begin their Catalogue: But howsoever, now began the City first to receive the form and state of a Common-wealth, and to be divided into Fellowships and Corporations, as at this day they are: and this Franchise was granted in the year 1189. the first year of King Richard the first. He made also divers Ordinances concerning the measures of Corn, and Sheriffs and Maior of London first ordained.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

New Orders of Friars.

THe Church within his own Dominions was quiet all his time, no conteftation with the Pope, no alterations amongst the Bishops, no difference between the Clergy and the Laity or the Clergy amongst themselves; they also seemed to lie asleep, till they were afterwards awakened, in the time of the succeeding King. But abroad, in his time, there was an addition of three Orders of Devotion; the Order of the Augustine Friars, called Friars Mendicants, begun by William of Paris; then the Orders of Friars Minors begun by St. Francis; and lastly the Orders of Friars Preachers begun by St. Dominick, though not confirmed till the first year of Pope Honorius.

Works of Piety in his time.

Works of Piety are for the most part works of plenty; penury may inwardly have good wishes; but outwardly it can express but little: and indeed all parts of the Kingdom, all sorts of people were drawn so dry, by the two great occasions of his Journey and his Ransome, and afterward by other Taxations, that the richest men had enough to do to maintain themselves, without being at the charge to make provision for others. All works of Piety were now for the service of the Holy-Land, and therefore it may well pass, if not for a work of Devotion, at least worthy to be remembered; that William Bishop of Ely builded the outer wall of the Tower of London, and caused a deep ditch to be made about it, with an intention the River of Thames should have surrounded it, though it could not be effected. Only Hubert Walter who at one time was Archbishop of Canterbury, the Popes Legat, Lord Chancellour, Lord Chief Justice, and the immediate Governour under the King, both in Wales and England, Founded a Monastery at West Derham in Norfolk, where he was born: begun another at Wolverhampton, and finished a Collegiate Church at Lambeth.

Of his Wife and Children.

Uncertain what became of Berengaria King Richard's wife.

King Richard's metaphorical daughters: how disposed.

IN his Infancy he was contracted to a Daughter of Raymond Earl of Barcelona, after that affianced to Adela, or Alice, Daughter of Lewis King of France, yet married to neither of them; but he married Berengaria Daughter of Garcias King of Navarr, whom his Mother Queen Eleanor brought unto him into Sicily, from whence passing into Cyprus, their marriage was there solemnized, afterward going forward to the Holy-Land, he carried her and his Sister Jane Queen of Sicily, along with him, where they remained till his return home; and then sent them to pass to Sicily, and from thence into England: but that ever she came into England, no mention is made, neither what became of her after she parted from King Richard at the Holy-Land. But children certainly he had none, either by his Wife, or by any Concubine, unless we reckon, as a Priest in Normandy did; who told King Richard, he had three Daughters: and the King marvelled who they should be, seeing he knew of none he had; yes (saith the Priest) you have three Daughters, Pride, Covetousness, and Lechery; which the King taking merrily, called to the company about him, and said; I am told by a Priest here, that I have three Daughters, and I desire you to be witnesses how I would have them bestowed: my daughter Pride upon the Templars and Hospitalers; my daughter Covetousness, upon the Monks of the Cistercian Order: and my daughter Lechery, upon the Clergy.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

King Arthur's Sepulchre found.

A great dearth.

IN his time the Town of Mawling in Kent, with the Nunnery, was consumed with fire; and in his time the bones of Arthur the famous King of Britain were found at Glastenbury in an old Sepulchre, about which stood two Pillars, in which Letters were written but could not be read; Upon the Sepulchre was a cross of Lead, whereon was written, Here lyeth the Noble King of Britain Arthur. Also in this Kings dayes for three or four years together, there reigned so great a dearth, that a Quarter of Wheat was sold for 18. shillings 8. pence, and then followed so great a mortality of men, that scarce the living sufficed to bury the dead.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of stature, and well proportioned, fair, and comely of face, of hair bright aboutne, of long arms, and nimble in all his joynts, his thighs and legs of due proportion; and answerable to the other parts of his body. To speak of his moral parts, his Vices for the most part; were but only upon suspicion: Incontinency in him much spoken of, nothing proved: but his Virtues were apparent, for in all his actions he shewed himself Valiant, (from whence he had the appellation or surname of Cœur de Lyon) wife, liberal, merciful, just, and which is most of all, Religious; a Prince born for the good of Chritendom, if a Bar in his Natiuity had not hindred it. The remorse for his undutifulness towards his Father, was living in him till he dyed, for at his death he remembered it with bewailing, and desired to be buried as near him as might be, perhaps as thinking they should meet the sooner, that he might ask him forgiveness in another world.

King Richard why called Cœur de Lyon.

Of his Death and Burial.

HE dyed of a wound with an Arrow in his Arm, shot at him by one Bertrad, or Peter Basile, which neglected at first, and suffered to rankle, or as others say, ill handled by an unskilful Chirurgion, in four dayes brought him to his end. But his Charity deserves to have it remembered, that finding himself past hope of Recovery, he caused the party that had wounded him to be brought before him, who being asked what moved him to do this Fact? answered; that King Richard had killed his Father and two of his Brothers with his own hand, and therefore he would do it, if it were to do again. Upon this insolent answer, every one looked the King should have censured him to some terrible punishment, when contrary to all their expectations, in a high degree of Charity, he not only freely forgave him, but gave a special charge he should be set at liberty, and that no man should dare to do him the least hurt: commanding besides to give him a hundred shillings for his pains. An act that well shewed he had been at the Holy-Land, or rather indeed that he was going to it. But Polychronicon saith, that after King Richard was dead, the Duke of Brabant who was then present, caused the said Bertrad to be flayed quick, and then to be hanged. He dyed the sixth day of April in 1199. when he had lived 44. years, Reigned nine, and about nine months, and had his body buried at Founteverard, by his Father; his heart at Roan, in the remembrance of the hearty love that City had always borne him; and his bowels at Chalons, for a disgrace of their unfaithfulness; others say, at Carlisle in England.

Men of Note in his time.

IN his time were famous Baldwyn Archbishop of Canterbury, who followed King Richard into the Holy-Land, and dyed there; Hubert that succeeded him: Hugh Bishop of Lincoln; William Bishop of Ely, a man equally famous and infamous; also Baldwyn Archbishop of Canterbury, a learned Writer in Divinity; Daniel Morley a great Mathematician, John de Herham, and Richard de Herham, two notable Historians; Guilielmus Stephanides a Monk of Canterbury, who wrote much in the praise of Archbishop Becket; also one Richard Divisensis, Nicholas Walsington, and Robert de Bello Foco, an excellent Philosopher. Of Martial men, Robert Earl of Leicester; Ranulph de Fulgers; two of the Bardolphs, Hugh and Henry; three Williams, Marshall, Brantell and Mandevill, with two, Roberts, Roffe and Seuville.

THE REIGN OF KING JOHN.

IN King Richard being dead, the right of Succession remained in Arthur, Son of Geoffry Plantagenet elder Brother to Earl John; but John as thinking the title of Arthur but a Criticism in State, and not for every ones capacity, at least in common sense not so plain as his own, who was the Son of a King, and Brother to a King, ascends into the Throne as confidently as if he had no competitor: Only Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury went before, and made an Oration in his behalf, wherein seeking to do him a courtesie, he did him indeed a wrong; for waving his right of Succession, he insisted wholly upon their Right of Election; whereof would follow, that as they brought him in, so they might cast him out, of which error when he was told, he said, he did it of purpose to make King John the more careful of his Government, by making him sensible upon what an unsure ground his Regality stood: King John resented it, but seeing it to serve his turn for the present, he took it not ill, as knowing that his turn once served, he could afterward be his own carver of what title he pleased; and so upon Ascension day in the year 1199. he was Crowned King at Westminster, with more solemnity then joy; many prefacing by their countenances and more in their minds, that all would not long be well. It cannot be denied, but that in moral circumstances Earl John had the advantage of his Nephew Arthur, for he was a man of years fit to govern, Arthur but a child, not thirteen years old; he a Native, at least always bred up in the Kingdom, Arthur a Foreiner, and had never been here; He well known both to the Nobility and the People, Arthur a stranger to both, as one they had never seen; and besides these moral advantages, he had now added one from the politicks, that he had gotten possession; (of more force in the practical part then all the former) and withal a greater then all these, if it be true which some write, that his Brother King Richard had assigned him his Succession after his decease. But yet knowing the Title at last would come to be tried in a Court, where the Sword must be Judge; he employeth all his endeavours to get this Judge to be his friend, and by all means possible to strengthen himself with Arms, and thereupon going to Chillon and Roan, he seizes upon the Treasure which his Brother had left in those parts, and with it gets Friends and Souldiers, the Armour of Arms. And indeed all he could have done himself would have done him no good, if he had not had the help of able Assitants, who yet assisted him no less for their own ends then for his; and these were chiefly his Mother Queen Eleanor, who knew if her Grand-son Arthur should be King, that then his Mother Constantia would rule all, at least during his Minority; and thereby her self be put from the stage of all Authority; and the Archbishop Hubert, who also knew that if Arthur should come to reign, that then the Anjouyn and French should have all the best Offices, and the English wholly be neglected, as it was in the time of King William the Conquerour. And yet a greater friend then both these, for coming to Roan, he used means, that Walter the Archbishop in the Cathedral Church with great pomp girt him with the

Of his Troubles in Contestation with his Nephew Arthur.

THOUGH King John had entred upon Normandy, and made that Province sure unto him, yet the Province of Anjou stood firm for Arthur, in observance of their love to his Father their former Prince: which also King John soon after invading, reduced by force of Arms to his Obedience. And now Constantia the Mother of Prince Arthur, finding King John too powerful an adversary, and no likelihood for her party, to be able long to stand out against him without further assistance, conceives it her best way to have recourse to the King of France, and thereupon commits her Son Arthur to his Tuition: who seemed to receive him with the tenderness of a Father, and promised to assist him with his uttermost Forces, in the recovery of his Right both in France and England. Here we may observe upon what hinge the affections of the Kings of France were used to turn. For in King Henry the Second's time, King Lewis of France was so great a Friend to his Son Richard, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Father; afterward when Richard was King, then Philip King of France, was so great a Friend to John, that by all means he would help him to get the Kingdom from his Brother, and now that John is come to be King, he is presently grown to great a Friend of Arthur's, that by all means he will help him to get the Kingdom from his Uncle; and no doubt, if Arthur should ever have come to be King, he would have been as ready to help any other to get the Kingdom from him: by which it appears, that it was not the Persons of Men they either hated or loved, but that they were always jealous of their growing too great; and indeed this balancing of States keeps Princes affections always in suspense, and never suffers the Glass of their Love or Hate, to make a true Reflexion. About this time William King of Scots came to London to visit King John, and there did homage to him for his Kingdom of Scotland, though some say, but only for the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, but being required aid against the French, he excused himself, saying, he could not do it without consent of his Kingdom, and so returned home.

The King of Scots doth homage to King John.

D And now Philip King of France having undertaken the protection of the young Prince Arthur, with a mighty Army enters Normandy, takes many of the best Towns, and pursuing his Victories, enters the Province of Anjou also, and recovers it from King John, which he the year before had gotten from Prince Arthur. Upon this King John makes a journey into Normandy, accusing King Philip for breaking the Truce, which he had formerly made with King Richard for five years; but when he should come to make his Accusation good by Arms, he falleth to Treaties, and obtaineth a new Truce for fifty daies: with which new Truce, Baldwin Earl of Flanders, who had professed himself of that side, was not well pleased; and thereupon cometh to King John to Roan, and entering a new league with him, they there consult how to proceed, when the fifty daies should be expired. This consultation the King of France understood; and thereupon both sides prepare for war, but at the end of the Truce, both sides seemed to relent, and divers meetings were had for Treaties of Peace, and in conclusion, King John more desirous of Peace then he was for his Honour, agreed to these conditions, that his Niece Blanch, Daughter of Alphonse King of Castile by his sister Eleanor, should marry with Lewis King Philips Son, who should have with her in Dower, besides thirty thousand Marks in Money, all those Cities, except only Angiers, which the French before that time had taken, which were many and very great: and this Peace thus made, he returns into England, with great joy, but was not with the like joy received of the English Lords, who counted themselves dishonoured, in the dishonourable conditions he had made; and Baldwin Earl of Flanders also, when he saw the poor spirit of King John, to descend to such base conditions; left his party, and entering league with the King of France, disposed himself for the Holy War.

The two Kings of England and France agree upon a peace.

The English Lords are discontented with the conditions of peace.

G But King John having now gotten a Vacation, and a time of ease, which agreed much better with his nature then War, sets his minde wholly upon pleasures; and for maintaining his pleasures, upon seeking after profit, which he pursues by all manner of injustice, under the name of Prerogative; and with such violence, that when his Brother Geoffry Archbishop of York, in the dutifullness of a Counsellor, advised him not to take such unlawful courses, he most unworthily took from him all he had, and it was a years work for all the Archbishops friends to pacifie his anger. In the neck of this injustice, he commits another, he procures a divorce from his Wife Avis, the Daughter of Robert Earl of Gloucester, only for being of kin to him in the third degree, and by advice of the King of France, marries Isabel Daughter and Heir of the Earl of Angoulesme, affianced before to Hugh le Brun Earl of March; and shortly after brings her with him into England, where he and she together, are both Crowned at Canterbury. And here the Earls and Barons of the Realm, being all summoned to attend the King of France at Whitsuntide following, they all by a general consent fend him word, that unless he would restore them their Rights and Liberties, they would do him no service out of the Kingdom. But what it was that made the Lords more violent in pressing their demands at this time then before, no Writers of these times do sufficiently deliver: only some of them speak scattering of certain oppressions (besides the general grievance for Exactions) lately offered to some of the Lords, one to the Earl of Chester, whom he would have banished, only for advising him to leave his cruelty and incontinency; Another, a pursuit in Love to a Daughter of Robert Fitz-Walter, called Maude the Fair, who not consenting to the Kings lust, a messenger was sent to give her poyson in a potted Egge, whereof she died: And a third, offered to William de Brause and his Lady, for a rash word spoken; for when the King sent to have de Brause's Son delivered him for a pledge; the Lady answered, We shall do well indeed to commit our Son to his keeping, who kept so well his own Nephew Prince Arthur. This rash word cost de Brause his Countrey, and his Lady and their Son their lives, both of them being fastidied to death in Prison. For, though these directly were but particular grievances, yet reflecting they were general, what one suffered all might; but whether any of these, or all of these together, were Ingredients to make a Compound of violence in the Lords at this time, or whatsoever was the true cause, this was plainly the effect, that unless the King would restore their Liberties, they would not follow him out of the Kingdom. But notwithstanding this refusal of his Lords, he passed over with his Queen into Normandy, and from thence to Paris, where the King of France receives them with all complements of Love and Amity. But now Hugh Earl of March, resenting the injury done him by King John, in taking away his affianced Wife, joyns with Prince Arthur; and the King of France also, for all his fair shew of amity lately made, joyns with them, as having sometime before married his youngest Daughter to Prince Arthur, and these with their Forces joyned, invade first the Tuornes, and then the Anjouins: of which Province, Queen Eleanor, the Kings Mother was left Regent, who thereupon betakes her self to Mirabel the strongest Town of those parts, and sends to her Son King John, acquainting him with the danger she was in, and requiring his speedy succour. When in the mean time Prince Arthur takes the City, and in it his Grandmother Queen Eleanor, whom he used with greater reverence and respect than she expected. But King John at the hearing hereof, was so moved, calling the French King ungrateful and perfidious for succouring Prince Arthur, contrary to his League, that studying presently the art of revenge, he fell upon a stratagem, of all other the most prudent against an Enemy: For a Surprise in War is like an Apoplexy in the body, which strikes without giving warning for defence: And this Stratagem at this time King John put in practise, for travelling night and day with indefatigable labour, he came upon his enemies before they were aware, and setting upon them unprovided, it was rather an execution than a battel; and they who remained unslain were taken prisoners, amongst whom Prince Arthur himself, who committed presently to the custody of Robert de Vespont in Roan, lived not long after: whether it were that attempting to make escape, he fell down from the walls of his Prison, and was drowned in the River Seyne, as some say; or whether it were that through anguish of mind he fell sick and dyed, as others say; or whether indeed he were made away by King John, as the common fame went; Certain it is, that he survived his imprisonment but a very few daies. But though he were gone, yet his Sister Eleanor, a preceding Competitor to King John was still remaining: Her therefore, at this time also King John seized upon, and commits her in safe custody to Brissow Castle, where after she had lived long, she died.

Of his Troubles after the death of his Nephew Arthur.

King John being now freed from his Competitor, one would think he should have ended all his troubles, but like a Hidraes head, they rather multiplied upon him: For they who had been so ready to assist Prince Arthur in his life, were now as ready to revenge his death. And first, Constance his Mother comes to King Philip, with open exclamations against King John, accusing him with the murder of her Son, and with all the instance of Tears and Intreaties, solicits him to revenge it. Hereupon King Philip summons King John to appear at a day, And because he appeared not according to the tenure of his Homage, it was decreed against him, that he had forfeited all the property of his Estate in France, and thereupon King Philip with mighty Forces invades his Territories, takes many Towns of principal consequence, while King John lived idle at Roan, no more regarding it, then if it had not at all concerned him; and when some of his Lords seemed to marvel what he meant, to suffer the French to rob him of such good Cities: You say true indeed (saith he) for it is but Robbery, and within a few daies you shall see, I will make him restore them back with usury. In this slighting humour he returns into England, where he looks not after the levying of Souldiers, or the raising of an Army, as this case required, but continues his old course for railing of money, accusing sometimes one of his Lords, sometimes another, as if it were their fault that he had lost these Towns in France; and upon these accusations made many of them pay great sums of money, which brought him not only into hatred at home, but into contempt abroad; for the King of France understanding his unworthy courses, proceeds more violently in his Invasions then before getting Falaise, Damfront, and all the good Towns of Normandy, but only Roan, and at last though Roan was a Town strongly fortified with Walls, and more strongly with the faithful hearts of the Inhabitants, yet finding no hope of succour from King John, it was forced for want of Victuals to submit

it

A it self to the King of France, whose example all the other Cities followed; and so all Normandy returned to the subjection of the French, after three hundred and sixteen years that Rollo the Dane had first possit it.

It was now the year 1205. and the sixth of King John's reign, about which time, the two props of his Estate, or rather indeed, the two bridles of his intemperancy died, his Mother Queen Eleanor, whose virtues had oftentimes qualified the vices of her Son; and Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, who repented him at his death of nothing more, then that he had been an Instrument of bringing him to the Crown.

And now King John being a substantive of himself, hath a devise in his head to make his Subjects as willing to give him money, as he was to have it: for knowing the great discontentment they all had for his losses in France; he gives it out, that he would presently raise an Army, for recovery of those losses, if he might have money to go about it: whereupon, never was money given with more alacrity; and as soon as he had it, he instantly went to Portsmouth, and there took Shipping before it was possible for his Lords and others to be in readiness to accompany him; and sailing forward some certain leagues into the Sea, upon a sudden he returns back again, and then laies the fault upon his Lords, that had not followed him; and for this backwardness of theirs, imposed afterwards great Fines upon them; by which means he got money no less by pretence of his not going, then he had done before by pretence of his going. About this time died Geoffrey Fitz-Peter Justiciar of England, who while he lived kept the King in some awe, in so much, as hearing he was dead, he swore by the feet of God, that now at length he was King of England, and with great rejoicing said to some Lords about him: Now when this man comes into Hell, let him salute the Archbishop Hubert, whom certainly he shall find there. But Philip King of France, intending to leave the English nothing on that side the Sea, invaded Chinon, and takes it; and in it the valiant Captain Roger Lacy, which had given a period to King Philip's victories, had not Guido, the husband of Constantia Prince Arthur's Mother, revolted to King John; who with his assistance once again levies an Army, besiegeth Mount Aubain, a Castle thought impregnable, and within fifteen daies takes it, which Charles the Great could not get with his seven years siege: where so great a number of French Lords were taken prisoners, that King John sent a Catalogue of their names into England, for a memorial of so great a victory. After this, he taketh the strong Town of Angiers, and utterly defaceth it; for which afterward he was sorry, as being the Town where he was born. But now when the two Kings were ready to meet, and to give battel, intercession was made by friends of both sides, and thereupon a Peace concluded for two years, and King John returned into England.

King John being returned, performs no less worthy Acts at home, then he had done in France: for first he invades the Borders of Scotland, and brings Alexander King of Scots to do him homage; and then understanding many of the Irish to be revolted, he passeth over to Dublin, and reduceth them to his obedience; and then placing John Bishop of Norwich Governor there, he returns into England; where passing through Wales, he subdueth certain Rebels there, and takes eight and twenty children of the best Families for pledges of their future loyalty; but not long after, hearing they grew mutinous and rebelled again, he was so incensed, that he would not go to dinner, till he had seen those twenty eight children to be all hanged before his face: so inconsiderate a thing is the desire of revenge, that it makes no difference between innocency and guiltiness, though indeed a thing oftentimes must be done for example, which considered in it self, would be forborne.

It was now the year 1214. and the fourteenth of King John's reign, when he going to Angiers, strongly repairs it; and the province of Poitou revolted to him; which Lewis King Philip's Son understanding, comes upon them with a mighty Army, and uses much severity upon the Authors of the revolt, takes prisoners, Reynolt Earl of Boleigne, and William Earl of Salisbury, with many other of King John's Captains, and defeated his whole Army: whereof when King John was certified he grew in a manner deperate, and as a man dejected, makes a new Truce upon any conditions with the King of France, and returns into England; where he finds a worse business ready to entertain him: for the Lords of the Realm having often required their ancient Rights and Liberties; and finding nothing but delusions, endure no longer to be abused; but meeting at St. Edmundsbury, they there confer how they may find a remedy to redress this evil; and at last concluded to go to the King themselves in person, and make their demands; whereof a Charter was produced, that had been formerly granted in King Henry the firsts time: whereupon coming to the King after Christmas, lying then in the New Temple, and acquainting him with their Demands; he gives them this fair Answer, that within a few daies he would give them satisfaction; and causeth the Bishops of Canterbury and Ely, with William Marshal, Earl of Gloucester to pass their words for him that it should be performed. But the King meaning nothing less then to do as he said, fals presently a levying of Souldiers, which the Lords understanding, they all did the like; and going to the Bishop of Canterbury, deliver him a Copy of their Demands, and requiring the Kings Answer: But the Bishop shewing it to the King, and humbly intreating him to give the Lords a satisfactory Answer: he swore a great Oath, they might as well demand the Kingdom, and that he would die before he would yield to any such demands. Whereupon the Lords (knowing now what they were to trust to) fall to besiege Northampton, and after that, Bedford, which is yielded to them; and withall they are sent to by the Londoners to signify their readines to joyn with them. At this time the King was at Windsor providing an Army, but hearing the Londoners were joyned with the Lords, he thought it no good way to proceed by force, but rather by fraud; and thereupon sends to the Lords; that if they would come to him to Windsor, he would grant their demands. The Lords coming thither, but in a Military manner, (for they durst not trust his word) the King saluted them all kindly, and promised to give them satisfaction in all they demanded; and so in a Meadow between Windsor and Stanes, called Running-mead, he freely consented to confirm their former Liberties; and was content some grave personages should be chosen to see it performed. But the next day, when it should be done, he gets him gone to Southampton, and from thence to the Isle of Wight; where advising with his Council, what in this case was fittest to be done: It was concluded he should send to the Pope, to acquaint him with this mutiny of the Lords, and to require his help: while the King in the mean time lived skulking up and down in corners, that no man might know where to find him; or which is worse (as some write) roving about and practising Piracy. And now the Lords begin to suspect fraud, when shortly after the Kings Messengers, who were Walter and John, Bishops of Worcester and Norwich, return with the Popes Decree; which was, that the Kings grant to the Lords should be void: with this Decree, the King after three moneths that he had stayed in the Isle of Wight, coming back to Windsor, acquaints the Lords; but they accusing the Messengers for false informing the Pope, and the Pope also for making a Decree without hearing both sides, betake them to Arms, and swear by the holy Altar to be revenged for this lufidication and injurious dealing. The King finding the Lords nothing moved with the Popes Decree, sends again unto him, to acquaint him with it; who mightily incensed to have his Decree so slighted, adjudgeth them all to be held as enemies of Religion; and gives power to Peter Bishop of Winchester, and to the Abbot of Reading to Excommunicate them. In the meantime the King had sent the Bishop of Worcester, Chancelour of England, and others with his Seal, to hire Souldiers, from the parts beyond the Seas; who returning shortly after, bringeth along with him out of Poitin and Gascony, Savery de Malcon, Geoffrey and Oliver Botewille, Brothers; and under their conduct so great a rabble, that with these Forces, within half a year the King had gotten all the Castles of the Barons, to the borders of Scotland. And now he divides his Army, committing part of it to his Brother William, Earl of Salisbury, and others to set upon London; and with the other part he goes himself into Yorkshire, where most of the Lords had possession, which in most cruel manner he destroyed with fire and sword. The Lords being thus on all sides distressed, resolve upon a course, neither honourable nor safe; yet such as necessity made seem both: they send to Philip King of France, requiring him to send over his Son Lewis to their aid, and promising they would submit themselves to be governed by him, and take him for their Sovereign. To this motion of the Lords, King Philip was as forward as themselves; which King John understanding, sends again to the Pope, requiring him to use his authority to stay the King of France from coming. But King Philip, though much regarding the request of the Pope, yet nothing so much as the acquiescence of England; with all speed provides an Army, and with a fleet of six hundred sail, sends over his Son Lewis; who passing into England, landeth at Sandwich, whither many of the Lords and others resort unto him; and giving Oathes of Allegiance, joyn themselves with him. King John at that time was at Dover, but not daring to stay there for fear of the enemy, he commits the Castle to Hubert Burgh; and goeth himself to Canterbury, and from thence to Winchester in the manner of a flight; which Prince Lewis understanding, went straight to London, and by a plausible Oration makes that City sure unto him: and thither came to him the King of Scots with an Army of choice Souldiers, as also the Earls, Warren, Arundel, Salisbury, with many others. And now Prince Lewis passeth all the Countrey over without resistance, but not without infinite outrages committed by his Souldiers, which was not in him to hinder: and then coming to Norwich, he takes that City easily, but Dover cost him a longer siege, as being defended by the valiant and loyal Captain Hubert Burgh. In this mean while King John finding his enemies employed in these difficult sieges; sends about and gathers a rabble of all raskal people to him, and with them runneth over all the Countrey, spoyling and killing in most barbarous manner; and now was the Kingdom made the Stage of all the miseries of rapine and cruelty: two Armies in it on foot at once, each of them seeking to prey upon the other, and both of them upon the Countrey. But the King coming to Woolpoole in Norfolk, where the Washes were to be passed over, he sendeth one to search where the Foord was passable, and there himself with some few passed over, but the multitude, with all the carriages, passing without order, they cared not where, were all drowned; with which disaster, the King through anguish of mind fell into a Fever, whereof within a few daies he died. And here was an end of all the troubles of this King: In whom it is observable, that loving his ease so well as he did, he should run voluntarily into such troubles, especially at home, upon so small occasions as he did; but it should seem there is no greater hinderance to men for accomplishing their will, then their own wilfulness.

Of his Taxations.

TO speak of his Taxations, it may not improperly be said that it was but one continued Taxation all his Reign through; yet to divide it into two parts: his first was the Taxation of three shillings upon every Plough-land through the Kingdom, to pay the thirty thousand Marks, for his Niece Blanches Portion; and to mend this Taxation, he seised upon all the Temporalities of his Brother Geoffrey Archbishop of York, for oppoling it; and for a continuation, he makes a progress shortly after, into all the North-parts, where he exacts great Fines of offenders in his B Forfeits. Very shortly after, solicited by the Popes Legare, he grants a Subsidy of the fortieth part of all his Subjects Revenues for one year, to succour the Holy Land. Shortly after this, he chargeth his Earls and Barons with the losses he sustained in France; and thereupon Fines them to pay the seventh part of all their Goods: neither spared he the Church, or the Commons in this Impolition. Before this year is ended, another Leavy is made at a Parliament in Oxford, wherein is granted two Marks and a half of every Knights Fee, for Military aid; neither are the Clergy exempted from paying their part; and before another year is out, another Impolition is laid of the thirteenth part of all moveables and other Goods, both of the Clergy and Laity. It may be reckoned among his Taxations, that when the Monks of Canterbury had displeased him about the election of their Archbishop, he seised upon all their Goods, and converted them to his own use: and presently after this: upon the like displeasure he deposes many Bishopricks, Abbeyes and Priories into the hands of Lay-men, and confiscates all their Revenues. To these may be added, that he took eleven thousand Marks of Silver, of the King of Scots, for granting him peace. Add to these also great sums of money exacted and gathered from the Jews, among whom there was one that would not be ransomed, till the King caused every day one of his great teeth to be pulled out by the space of seven dayes, and then he was content to give the King ten thousand Marks of silver that no more might be pulled out, for he had but one left. Add to these, that at his return out of Ireland, he summoned all the Prelates of the Kingdom to appear before him; of whom he extorted for their redemption, the sum of an hundred thousand pounds sterling. Add lastly to these, that at his return out of Wales, he exacted of every Knight that attended him not in that expedition, two Marks.

HE was the first that appointed the Forms of Civil Government in London, and other Cities, endowing them also with their greatest Franchises. The first that caused sterling money to be here coined; The first that ordained the honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Earls; The first that settled the rates and measures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and such other necessities of Commerce; The first that planted English Laws and Officers in Ireland; The first that enlarged the Royal style with the Lord of Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdom, and fattened Wales to the Crown of England.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

AFTER the death of Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, the Monks of that Covent secretly in the night, elected one Reginald their Sub-prior to succeed him; and caused him to go to Rome for confirmation: but afterward doubting how the King would take it, being done without his knowledge, they crave leave of the King to chuse a fit man; the King is content to allow them the election, but requires himself to have the Nomination, and thereupon commends unto them John Grey Bishop of Norwich, whom he specially favoured, and accordingly the Monks elect him. But the matter being afterward referred to the Pope, which of these two elections should stand good, after many allegations of both sides, the Pope to shew himself indifferent to both, disallows them both, and nominates a third man, one Stephen Langthorn, Cardinal of S. Chrysogone, an English man born, and a man of great learning. The Monks admit him, but the King opposeth it: and now as it were, a Prize began to be played between the two Swords, the Spiritual and the Temporal: but he that used the Spiritual Sword, proved so much the better Fencer, that he disarmed the other, and took away his Temporal Sword from him. It is true, in the first Venue, the King gave the Pope as good as he brought; for as the Pope threatened the King to excommunicate him, and to interdict the Kingdom: so the King threatened the Pope to nullifie his authority, and to banish Clergy men out of the Realm. In the second Venue, as the Pope acted as much as he had threatened, (for he interdicted the Kingdom:) So the King performed as much as he had spoken; (for he drove the Monks out of their Cloisters) yet at last when Pandulphus the Popes Legate came into England, and made appear to the King in what great danger he stood; First, of the King of France, by Invasion; and then of his own Subjects, by Rebellion; for both which, there was no other help but reconciliation with the Pope; he so touched him to the quick, that he made him leave his great words, and fall to asking forgiveness.

ness. So as taking off the Crown from his head, he laid it down at Pandulphus feet, to be disposed of, as the Pope should please. And Pandulphus stuck not to take up his Crown, and to keep it three or four days in his hands before he restored it; and did not then neither, but upon condition that he and his Successors should hold the Kingdom of the See of Rome, at the annual tribute of a thousand Mark. And all those three or four dayes, in which Pandulphus kept the Crown, it might be truly said the Kingdom was without a King. And upon this, no doubt it was that Peter an Hermit in a Prophetical Rapture had given out some time before, that by Ascension day, there should be no King of England. Which though in some sort it was true, yet because in some sort it was not true, and it was in the Prerogative of the King to make his own interpretation: it cost the poor Hermit and his Son their lives, and they remain as a pillar of Salt, to make men take heed of Ludere cum Sanctis, and of playing the Criticks in matters of State.

But by this means the Kingdom was released of the Interdiction, which had continued six years, three months, and fourteen days: During all which time, there was no publique exercise of Religion; no Churches open, no Ecclesiastical Sacraments administered, but only to them that are in danger of death, and baptism to children; all that dyed were buried like Dogs in Ditches and corners, but only such as had purchased or procured license from the Pope.

In this Kings reign, Saint Dominick continued his preaching ten years together against the Alligence; so called because they began first in the City of Alba. Also in his time Saint Francis renounced the World; and when a Priest to whom he offered it, would not take his money, he cast it away, and entered into a vow of perpetual poverty. Also in this Kings time, was held the Lateran Council, under Pope Innocent the third, in which was established the Popes power over Princes, and in matters of Faith, Auricular Confession, and Transubstantiation.

Of his Irreligion.

I Need not relate a Speech of his, though very unchristian, that having been a little before reconciled to the Pope, and then taking an overthrow in France, in great anger he cried out, that nothing had prospered with him since the time he was reconciled to God and the Pope. Nor another speech of his, which though spoken merrily, was in good earnest very irreligious, that being on a time a hunting, at the opening of a fat Buck, he said: See how this Deer hath prospered, and how fat he is, and yet I dare swear he never heard Mass. It is sufficient to relate one act of his, (if it be true which some write) that being in some distress, he sent Thomas Hardington and Ralph Fitz Nichols Knights, in Embassy to Miramumolim King of Africk and Morocco, with offer of his Kingdom to him, upon condition he would come and aid him, and that if he prevailed, he would himself become a Mahometan, and renounce the Christian Faith. Though some there be that say, All these were but false criminations charged upon him by Monks that did not love him. But though we believe not these things of him: yet to suffer his Kingdom to stand interdicted so many years together, upon so small occasion as he did, was certainly no good sign of Religion in him. Yet one act he did, wherein he shewed a respect to Religion, by the honour he did to a Religious man: For Hugh Bishop of Lincoln, lying very sick, he not only went to visit him, but being dead was one of the three Kings, (the other two were William King of Scotland and the King of Southwales), that carried his Herse upon their shoulders, till they delivered it to the Peers, and the Peers afterward to the Archbishops and Bishops to carry it into the Quire.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

Yet did this King leave more works of Piety behind him, then all his Subjects that were in his time: For he Founded the Abbey of Bowley in the New Forest in Hampshire: also an Abbey of black Monks in the City of Winchester, and the Monastery of Farendon, and the Monastery of Hales Owen in Shropshire: he re-edified Godstow and Wroxel, and enlarged the Chapel of Knaresborough. Now for his Subjects, only Richard Prior of Bermondsey builded an House against the wall of the said house of Bermondsey, called the Almay or Hospital of Converts and Children, in honour of St. Thomas. In this Kings time S. Mary Overies in Southwark was begun to be builded, and the Stone Bridge over the Thames, was by the Merchants of London finished. Also Hulbert Archbishop of Canterbury, Founded a Monastery at West Derham in Norfolk, which upon the dissolution came to the family of the Derhams, who hold it to this day.

The Stone bridge of London finished.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN this Kings time, five and thirty of the most substantial Citizens of London, were chosen out, and called the Council of the City, and the King gave the City liberty to alter their Maior and Sheriffs every year, which before continued during life. He caused the Laws of England to be executed in Ireland, and money to be coined there according to the weight of English money.

The Common Council of London, when first ordained.

Of his Wives and Children.

King John lived to have three Wives: His first was Alice daughter of Habert Earl of Morton, who left him a Widower without issue. His second was Alice Daughter and Heir of Robert Earl of Glocester, by whom no issue neither, divorced from her by reason of Consanguinity in the third degree. His third Wife was Isabel Daughter and Heir of Amyer Earl of Angoulesme, affianced before to Hugh le Brun, Earl of March: By this Wife he had two Sons, Henry and Richard, and three Daughters, Jone, Eleanor, and Isabel: Henry succeeded him in the Kingdom; Richard was Earl of Cornwall, and Crowned King of the Romans, and had issue Henry and John, that dyed without issue: also Edward Earl of Cornwall, and others. Jone his eldest Daughter married to Simon Earl of Leycester had issue: Henry, Simon, Almarick, Guy, Richard, and Eleanor. Henry slain without issue. Simon Earl of Bigorre, and ancestour to a Family of the Mountfords in France. Almarick, first a Priest, after a Knight. Guy Earl of Angleria in Italy, and Progenitour of the Mountfords in Tuscany, and of the Earls of the Campo Bacchi in the Kingdom of Naples. Richard, remaining privy in England, and changing his name from Mountford to Wellsbourn, was ancestour of the Wellesbourn in England. Eleanor, born in England, brought up in France, married in Wales, to Prince Lewis ap Griffith. Isabel, his youngest Daughter, married to the Emperour Frederick, the second, had issue, Henry, appointed to be King of Sicily, and Margaret Wife of Albert Lantgrave of Thurine. She dyed in Childbed, after she had been Emperers six years. He had also two natural Sons, Geoffry Fitz Roy, and Richard, that married the Daughter and Heir of Fulbert de Dover, (who built Childham Castle) and had issue by her, of whom some Families of good account are descended. Also one base Daughter named Jone, married to Lewin Prince of Wales.

The Family of the Wellesbourns, from whence descended.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of stature indifferent tall, and something fat, of a fowre and angry countenance, and concerning his conditions, it may be said, that his Nature and his Fortune did not well agree: For naturally he loved his ease, yet his Fortune was to be ever in action. He won more of his enemies by surprizes then by battels, which shews that he had more of Lightning in him then of Thunder. He was never so true of his word as when he threatned, because he meant always as cruelly as he spake, not always as graciously; and he that would have known what it was he never meant to perform, must have looked upon his promises. He was neither fit for Prosperity nor Adversity: For prosperity made him insolent, and adversity dejected; a mean fortune would have suited best with him. He was all that he was by Fits; Sometimes doing nothing without deliberation, and sometimes doing all upon a suddain. Sometimes very Religious, and sometimes scarce a Christian. His unsatiableness of money was not so much, as that no man knew what he did with it; gotten with much noise, but spent in silence. He was but intemperate in his best temper, but when dis tempered with sickness most of all, as appeared at his last, when being in a Fever he would needs be eating of raw Peaches, and drinking of sweet Ale. If we look upon his works, we must needs think him a worthy Prince, but if upon his actions, nothing less: For his works of Piety were very many, as hath been shewed before; but as for his actions, he neither came to the Crown by Justice, nor held it with honour, nor left it in Peace. Yet having had many good parts in him, and especially having his Royal Posterity continued to this day, we can do no less but honour his memory.

Casualties that happened in his time.

ONE Casualty we might count dysastrous, if it had not had relation to our selves: for Hugh de Boves coming to aid King John with threecore thousand out of Britain and Flanders, by misfortune at Sea were all drowned, to whom the King had granted Norfolk and Suffolk for the people he brought with him to inhabit. In this Kings time were great thunders and lightnings, and showers with hail-stones as big as Goose-eggs. Fishes of strange shape were taken in England, armed with helmets and shields, and were like unto armed Knights, saving that they were far greater in proportion. About Maidstone in Kent a certain Monster was found stricken with the lightning, which Monster had a head like an Ass, a belly like a man, and all other parts parts far differing from any other creature. Also in Suffolk was taken a fish in form like to a man and was kept six months upon land with raw flesh and fish; and then, for that they could have no speech of it, they cast it into the Sea again.

Of his Death and Burial.

When Prince Lewis of France was come into England, and was received by the Lords and by the Londoners, King John with an Army went into the North-parts, and coming to Walpool, where he was to pass over the Washes, he sent one to search where the water was passable, and there himself with some few passed over, but the multitude with all his Carriages and Treasure passing without order, they cared not where, were all drowned. With the grief of which dyspaster, and perhaps distempered in his body before, he fell into a Fever, and was let blood; but keeping an ill dyet, (as indeed he never kept good) eating green Peaches, and drinking sweet Ale, he fell into a looseness, and grew presently so weak, that there was much ado to get him to Newark, where soon after he died. Though indeed it be diversely related; Caxton saith, he was poisoned at Swineshead Abbey by a Monk of that Convent; the manner and cause this: The King being there, and hearing it spoken how cheap corn was, should say, he would ere long make it dearer, and make a penny loaf be sold for a shilling. At this speech the Monk took such indignation, that he went and put the poison of a Toad into a cup of Wine, and brought it to the King, telling him there was such a cup of Wine as he had never drunk in all his life, and there-withal took the assay of it himself, which made the King to drink the more boldly of it; but finding himself presently very ill upon it, he asked for the Monk, and when it was told him, that he was fallen down dead; then (saith the King) God have mercy upon me, I doubted as much. Others say the poison was given him in a dish of Pears. But the Physician that dis-bowelled his body found no sign of poison in it, and therefore not likely to be true; but howsoever the manner of his death be uncertain, yet this is certain, that at this time and place he died, on the 19 day of October, in the year 1216. when he had reigned seventeen years and six moneths; lived one and fifty: He was buried, his bowels at Croxton Abbey, his body at Worcester, under the High Altar, wrapped in a Monks Cawl, which the superstition of that time accounted sacred, and a defensive against all evil spirits.

King John thought by some to be poisoned.

Of the prices of things in his time.

Neither is this unfit to be recorded in Chronicles, to the end comparison may be made between the time past and the present: as in the time of King Henry the second, a Quarter of Wheat was sold for twelve pence, a Quarter of Beans or Oats for a groat. Neither is the price of silver itself much less altered, for an ounce of silver was then valued at twenty pence; which is now valued at least at five shillings. Whereof Philosophers must tell the reason, for seeing scarcity makes things dear? why should not plenty make them cheap?

Of Men of special Note in his time.

In Military matters there were many famous men in his time, as Robert Fitz-Roger, and Richard Mount-Fitcher, with many others; but chiefly two, whose acts make them specially memorable: the one was Hubert Burgh, whom King John had left Governour of Dover-Castle; of whom it is related, that when Prince Lewis of France came to take the Town, and found it difficult to be taken by force; he sent to Hubert, whose Brother Thomas he had taken Prisoner a little before; that unless he would surrender the Castle, he should presently see his Brother Thomas be put to death with exquisite torments before his eyes: but this threatening moved not Hubert at all, who more regarded his own loyalty, then his Brothers life: then Prince Lewis sent again; offering him a great sum of money; but neither did this move, but he kept his loyalty as inexpugnable as his Castle. The other was Robert Fitz-Water, of whom it is related, that King John being with an Army in France, one of his Knights in a great bravery, would needs make a challenge to any of the French Camp, that durst encounter him in a Combat, when presently comes forth this Robert Fitz-Water, and in the encounter threw Horse and Man down to the ground: whereof when King John heard, By Gods tooth (saith he) he were a King indeed that had such a Champion; whereupon some that stood by, saying to him, He is Sir, a servant of your own, it is Robert Fitz-Water, whom you have banished. Whereupon his sentence of banishment was presently reversed, and the King received him, as he well deserved, into special favour. In matter of Literature also there lived many famous men in this Kings reign; as Gosfray Vincesse, Simon Fraxinus, alias Asht, Adam Dorensis, John de Oxford, Colman surnamed The Wise, Richard Canonius, William Peregrine, Alane Tewsbury, Gervasius Dorobernensis, John Hanwill, Nigel Workar, Gilbert Holland, Benet de Peterborough, William Parvus a Monk of Newburgh, Roger Hoveden, Hubert Walter Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Theologus, Gervasius Tilberienensis, Gyraldus Cambrensis, Johannes Devoniensis, Walter Mapis, Radulphus de Diceto, Gilbert Legley, Mauricium Morganius, John de Fordeham, William Leycester, Joceline Brakeland, Roger of Crowland, Hugh White, alias Candidus, who wrote an History, intituled, Historia Petroburgensis; John de Saint Omer, Adam Barking, John Gray, an Historiographer, and Bishop of Normich, Walter of Coventry, Radulphus Niger, and lastly Simon Thurway, who for his pride in Learning, but more for his blasphemies against Moses and Christ, became at last so utterly ignorant, that hardly he could read a letter of the Book. One yet remains that must not be forgotten, Hugo Carthusianus Bishop of Lincoln, whose Miracles, as Matthew Paris writes, made him famous in those dayes: and the Works he hath left behind him, famous in these.

Hubert Burgh, a most loyal servant to King John.

To this time the City of London had been governed by two Bailiffs, but the King in his tenth year taking displeasure against them for denying his Purveyers wheat, caused them to be imprisoned, till 35 of the chief Citizens repaired to him, and acquainting him what small store the City had, how the Commons were ready to make insurrection about it, he was then satisfied; and moreover at their suit, granted them to have a Maior and two Sheriffs to be yearly chosen nine dayes before Michaelmas; which Order hath continued, though with some alteration in the time of their Election, to this day. And so,

Simon Thurway of a great Scholar becomes an idiot.

In his Thirteenth year, Henry Fitz-Alwin was Maior. John Fitz-Peter, John Garland, Sheriffs.

In his Sixteenth year, Roger Fitz-Alwyn was Maior. Solomon Basing, Hugh Basing Sheriffs.

In his Seventeenth year, William Hardel was Maior. John Travers, Andrew Newland, Sheriffs.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF KING HENRY THE THIRD.

Of his coming to the Crown, and of Acts done in his Minority.

1216.

King Henry is Crowned.

KING John being dead, his eldest Son Henry was next to succeed: who being but nine years old, though he were capable of having his Right, yet he was scarce capable of understanding his Right: especially there being another at that time, to whom a great part of the Kingdom had sworn Allegiance. But those Lords who had been constant to the Father, notwithstanding his faults, were more tender of the Son, who was altogether innocent, and whose gracious aspect gave no small hope of a better disposition. Amongst all which Lords, there was none so eminent in worthiness, none so near him in Alliance, as William Marshal Earl of Pembroke, who had married his Aunt; and he drawing the rest of the Lords together, with a solemn Oration in behalf of the young Prince, so confirmed them, and so ordered the matter, that on the twenty eighth day of October, in the year 1216. he was crowned at Glocester by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Joceline Bishop of Bath, in the presence of Guallo the Popes Legat, and many Lords and Bishops; where besides the Oath usually taken by all Kings at their Coronation, to bear Reverence and honour to God, and to his holy Church, and to do Right and Justice to all his people: he did homage besides to the Church of Rome, and to Pope Innocent, for his Kingdom of England and Ireland: and took his Oath for the true payment of the thousand Marks which his father had granted to the Church of Rome. This done, William Earl of Pembroke, by a general consent was assigned Protector of the Realm during the Kings minority. In which place, the first thing he did, was to give notice of the new Kings Coronation to all the Countries round about; and proclaim pardon to all offenders, that within a time limited should come and submit themselves to him. In the mean time Prince Lewis of France, who at his hearing of King John's death, thought himself then sure of enjoying the Kingdom quietly, and that he should need to fear no more opposition; now that he hears of the new Kings Crowning, and that so solemnly, and with so unanimous a consent, he begins to think himself in worse case then before; and to grow jealous of the English Lords that had adhered to him, what they would do in this new world. And indeed a conflict was already grown in their minds, which of the two obligations should be the greater; either that of their Oath to Prince Lewis, or that of their Allegiance to King Henry. They could not but think it extreme ungratefulness to forsake Prince Lewis, whom they had themselves invited to come: and they could not but think it extreme undutifulness to stand out in opposition against King Henry their natural Sovereign: and that which added no small weight to this scale, was a discovery lately made by the Viscount Malton a French Lord at the time of his death, who confessed, as a matter of conscience, that Prince Lewis had vowed if once he got the Kingdom, utterly to extirpate all the English Nobility, and to admit none but French to any place of dignity. Neither was it perhaps, the least cause that moved many to leave the party of Prince Lewis, that Guallo the Popes Legat had threatened to excommunicate him, and as many as should adhere unto him. But whether any of these reasons, or any other were their motives; certain it is, that many of them, of whom were principal

they should adhere.

Many Lords shrink from Prince Lewis.

A principal, the Earls of Arundell, Warren, Salisbury, and William the eldest Son of the Protector, shrunk from Prince Lewis, and went to King Henry, as thinking no obligation so great as Allegiance: and many again continued constant to Prince Lewis, as thinking no obligation so great as an Oath. And now Prince Lewis, to cast the dice of fortune, before his enemies, though they had gotten them a Head, should gather to a head, and draw more forces together; staying himself at London, sent his Lieutenants with an Army of twenty thousand, to take in as many Towns as they could; and many they took with small opposition: but coming to Lincoln, where though they had the Town itself, yet the Castle stood out, and had been defended by a Noble Lady a whole year before; they found such resistance, that their proceeding was there arrested; for thither came presently William the Protector, with his Son William, the Bishops of Winchester, Salisbury, and Chester; the Earls of Salisbury, Ferrers, and Albemarle; William de Albini, William de Cantilupe, Falcaius, Thomas Basset, Robert Vipont, Brent de Lisle, Geoffrey Lacy, and many other Barons, with all the power of the young King: who with wonderful violence assailed the City; at which time it was propounded by the French, to fall forth and give them battle, but conceiving their Army to be greater then indeed it was (for the English had set double Engins to every Company, which made a shew of twice as many as they were) they forbore that course, and kept themselves within the Town; by which means being cooped up and straitened in place, so as they could not make use of their Forces, as otherwise they might; they were in conclusion all defeated, and all the principal men of the English that had adhered to Prince Lewis, were taken prisoners: as namely, Saer, Earl of Winchester, Henry de Bohun Earl of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt, lately made Earl of Lincoln, by Prince Lewis; Robert Fitz-Water, Richard Mount Fitcher, William Adwray, William Beauchamp, William Maudet, Oliver Harcourt, Roger de Cressy, William Colville, William de Ros, Robert de Rosseley, Ralph Chenduit, Barons; besides four hundred Knights or men at Arms. Only the Earl of Perch their General, being compassed about, and willing to render himself, swore he would never become prisoner to any English: and thereupon was run through the sight of his Helmet into the brains, and instantly died. This was a main blow to Prince Lewis; and the last of his battels in England; and because the City was very rich in Merchandise, the English in derision called it Lewis Fair. But Prince Lewis was not yet discouraged, For he had sent to King Philip his Father to send him new supplies out of France; and new supplies were indeed sent: but Hubert de Burgh, Governour of Dover, being as vigilant as he was valiant, watched their coming, and in a Sea-fight defeated them all, of whom but few escaped: and now this blow at Sea was so much greater then that at Land, that where that made him only doubt, this made him despair, at least made him malleable, and fit to be wrought upon by compulsion; whereupon it was at last concluded, that Prince Lewis should have fifteen thousand Marks for the charges he had been at, and abjure his claim to any interest in the Kingdom; and withal to work his father for restitution of such Provinces in France as appertained to this Crown: and that when himself should be King, he should resign them in a peaceable manner. On the other part, King Henry takes his Oath; and for him the Legat Guallo and the Protector, to restore unto the Barons of the Realm, and other his Subjects of all their Rights and Privileges, for which the discord began between the late King and his People. After this, Prince Lewis is honourably attended to Dover, and departs out of England about Michaelmas, above two years after his first arrival.

And now the Kingdom is come to unity within it self, one King and one people; and for a year or two there was little to be done, only some few there were, whom the corruption of the times had engendred, and who being born in a storm, could not live in a calm: of whom the principal were the Earl of Albemarle, Robert de Vipont, Fowke de Brent, Brian de Lisle, and Hugh de Baliol; who bustling about, got possession of Castles: with what intention all men knew; but with what hope of effecting their intention, no man could imagine: for being but a handful of men to the Body of the Realm, they were easily suppressed: and either brought to acknowledge their faults, or else punished for not acknowledging them. It was now the fourth year of King Henry's Reign, at which time William Earl of Pembroke, Protector of the Realm died, and was buried in the new Temple at London: in whose place came the Bishop of Winchester; and now was the King the second time Crowned, and had granted him by Parliament, for Henage, two Marks of Silver, for the affairs of the Kingdom, and recovery of his Transmarine Dominions, which is now designed: and Mallem de Saveroy, the Poitovin, with William Long-Sword, Earl of Salisbury, sent over to try the affections of that people, whom they find for the most part inclinable to the obedience of this Crown: but the King of France being required peaceably to deliver them; made answer, that having gotten them by the sword, by the sword he would hold them. But now the King being come to some years of understanding, was in a Parliament holden at London, put in mind by the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the Oath he had taken for confirmation of the Liberties of the Kingdom, which though oppugned by some (and especially by William Brewer, and Hubert de Burgh, whom the King had now made his chief Justiciar) as having been an Act of constraint: yet the King then again ratified, and twelve Knights of every Legat men of every Shire, by Writs, were charged to examine what the Laws and Liberties were, which the Kingdom enjoyed under his Grandfathers; and that they should return them by a certain day: and here the King by Parliament resumeth into his hands such Alienations as had been made by his Ancestors of any Crown Land. The next year after, another Parliament is held at Westminster, minster, wherein is required the fiftieth part of all the Moveables, both of the Clergy and Laity, for the recovery of those parts in France, with-held from the Crown by Lewis now King, contrary to his oath and promise made here in England at his departure; which, though it concerned the honour and dignity of the Kingdom, and the estates of most of the Nobility; yet would it be yielded to, but upon confirmation of their Liberties, which in the end was obtained, in the same words and form as King John had granted them in the two Charters before: and twelve Knights are chosen in every Shire, to dispart the old Forrefts from the new, and the new to be laid open and ploughed, and improved, to the great comfort and benefit of the Subject; and two years they were accordingly enjoyed.

Of his A&ts after he came to be of age.

IT was now the tenth year of King Henry's reign, and being about nineteen years of age, he claimed to take the government of the Kingdom into his own hands, and no longer to be under a Protector; and now will presently appear the difference between a Prince that is ruled by good Counsel, and a Prince that will do all of himself, and take no advice. For thirteen years he was ruled by a Protector, all passed, as it were in a calm, without noise or clamour; but as soon as he took upon him the government himself, there grew presently storms and tumults; no quietness either to the subject or to himself: nothing but grievances all the long time of his reign. For at the Parliament now holden at Oxford, as soon as he was Crowned again, he presently cancels and annuls the Charter of the Forests, as granted in his Nonage; and therefore he not bound to observe it: and then not using any longer the Seal which the Protector had used, he makes a new; and causeth Proclamation to be made, that whosoever would enjoy any benefit of Grants under his Seal, should come and have them signed by his new Seal; by which course he drew much money from many: and this was the first grievance.

Shortly after, he commits the keeping of Barkhamsted Castle, to one Walleran a Dutchman, which Cattle belonged to his brother Richard of Cornwall: but when Earl Richard required to have the possession, as of right he ought, it was then plotted by Hubert Burgh Chief Justice, and the Kings chief Counsellour, to commit him to prison; which the Earl understanding, or at least suspecting, flies presently to Marlborough, where he finds William Earl Marshal his vowed friend, with whom he halts to Stamford, and there meets with the Earls of Chester, Gloucester, Warren, Hereford, Ferrers, Warwick, and divers other Barons; who all confederate together, and send to the King, that unless he restore the Cattle to his brother, and to them the Liberties of Forests, which he had lately cancelled at Oxford, they would seek to recover them by the sword. Hereupon King Henry to pacifie his brother, not only renders the Cattle to him, but gives him besides all that his mother had in Dower; and also great possessions which the Earl of Britain, and the Earl of Boleyn lately deceased, had in England; but to the Petition of the Lords he makes a satisfactory answer: and this was another grievance.

Not long after King Henry is periwaded by Hugh le Brun Earl of March, who had married his mother, to make a journey into France, for recovery of his right there: but the Earl persuaded it for ends of his own; which to have discovered, had been no way to compals them: he must therefore lay some colours upon his work; and it was colour enough that the action would be of great benefit to the King, if it might succeed; and the likelihood of succeeding was most apparent, by reason of the great inclination of the people to King Henry, and their great averfeness from King Lewis. Upon these colours King Henry undertaking the action, raiseth great sums of money from the Clergy, and from the Londoners, for redemption of their Liberties; and takes the third part of all the goods of the Jews: but when he returned home a year after, without having done any thing but spent his treasure and his time; and that which was more worth then both these, the lives of many Noble men and others; this was another grievance.

And now King Henry bringing many Poitevins over with him, who had served him in his wars, he was to reward them here; which he could not do, but by displacing and spoil of his Officers. First therefore he calleth Ralph Brette Treasurer of his Chamber to account, and grievously fines him for defrauding him in his Office: Then likewise is Hubert de Burgh chief Justiciar, and his chief Counsellour, called to account for such treasure as passed his Office, who being further charged with crimes of Treason, flies to the Church of Merton for sanctuary; from whence, when the King commanded him to be drawn out by violence, the Bishop of London hearing of it, commanded him to be returned back to sanctuary, upon pain of Excommunication: but the King commanding him to be kept from sustenance, hunger at last enforced him to render himself to the Kings mercy: all his goods, which were very great, confiscated. Also Walter Bishop of Carlisle is thrust out of his Office of Treasurer, and William Rodon Knight, from his place of Marshal of the Kings house, and all the chief Counsellours, Bishops, Earls, and Barons of the Kingdom are removed, as distrustful; and only strangers preferred to their rooms: of which course, Peter de Rupibus, a Poitevin, Bishop of Winchester, and one Peter de Rivalis, the Kings special Favourite, were said to be the Authors: and this was another grievance.

Nine years had thus passed, with divers grievances in his government; and being now about eight or nine and twenty years old; a Consultation was had for a fit wife for him. There was propounded a Sister of Alexander King of Scots, but it was not thought fit the King should marry

A marry the younger sister, when Hubert de Burgh had married the elder: he therefore takes one of his own choosing, and marries Eleanor, daughter to Raymond Earl of Provence; by which match he neither had portion by his wife, nor strength of Alliance by friends; or if any were, it was all made vain by distance: only he had by her a number of poor kindred, who to his great cost lay hanging upon him; yet was the marriage solemnized with as great charges as if he had been to have Mountains with her: and this was another grievance.

And now is the score of these grievances called upon to be paid: for the Lords could no longer endure so many indignities, to see themselves sleighted, and only strangers advanced; as Forik de Brent, who held the Earldoms of Nottingham, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, and others the like: and to see their persons exposed to danger, and their estates to ruine; for which no remedy could be, but only the Kings confirming their Charter of Liberties: wherein it is strange to observe upon what different grounds the King and the Lords went: It seems the King thought, that to confirm that Charter, were to make himself to be less then a King, and the Lords thought, that as long as it was denied, they were no better then slaves: and as the King could endure no diminution, so the Lords could endure no slavery; but the King might keep his own with sitting still, the Lords could not recover their own but by motion: and seeing their strength must be in their number, by commotion; hereupon they confederate together, and of this confederacie, Richard now Earl Marshal, upon the death of his Brother William, is chief: who repair to the King, and boldly shew him his error, and require satisfaction. Hereupon the King sends presently over for whole Legions of Poitevins, and withal summons a Parliament at Oxford, whither the Lords refuse to come: after this a Parliament is called at Westminster, whither likewise they refuse to come, unless the King would remove the Bishop of Winchester, and the Poitevins from the Court; and more then this, they send him word, that unless he did this, they would expel both himself and his evil Counsellours out of the Land, and create a new King. Upon this threatening, Pledges are required of the Nobility for securing their Allegiance, and Writs are sent out to all who held by Knights-service to repair to the King at Glocester by a certain day; which the Earl Marshal and his associates refusing, the King without the judgment of his Court and their Peers, causeth them to be proclaimed Out-laws, seisth upon all their Lands, which he gives to his Poitevins; and directs out Writs to attach their bodies wheresoever in the Kingdom. But now of these confederate Lords, the Bishop of Winchester won the Earls of Chester and Lincoln with a thousand Marks; and the King had so pleased his Brother the Earl of Cornwall, that he likewise left them: whereupon they withdrew into Wales, and confederate with Lewelin Prince of Wales; whither also came Hubert de Burgh, escaped out of Prison, and joyns with them; taking intermutual Oaths that no one without other should make their accord. Hereupon the King goeth himself in Person into Wales, where not prevailing, he returns to Glocester, implores new forces of strangers, but all without success. At last a Fryer is employed to perwade the Earl Marshal to submit himself to the King, but all in vain: till at length a train is laid to draw him over into Ireland, to defend his state there, being seisth upon by the King; where by treachery circumvented he lost his life: Militia slos temporum modernorum, saith Matthew Paris. Yet the King disavows the sending of any such Commission into Ireland, protesting he never knew thereof; and layes the fault upon his Officers: an ealie way for Princes, never to be found in any fault.

After two years affliction, a Parliament is assembled at Westminster, wherein the Bishops admonish the King by his Fathers example, to be at unity with his people, and to remove from him strangers, and to govern the Kingdom by Natives of the Realm, and by the Laws: otherwise they would proceed by Ecclesiastical censure, both against his Counsellours and himself. The King seeing no way to subliit but by temporizing, consents to call home those Lords out of Wales; restores them to their places and possessions; removes all strangers from about him, and calls his new Officers to account. Hereupon the Bishop of Winchester, Peter de Rivalis, and Stephen Seagrave take Sanctuary; but afterward by mediation they obtained with great Fines their Liberty, dearly paying for their two years greatness. After this a Parliament is again called, which the King would have to be kept in the Tower, whither the Lords refusing to come, another place of more freedom is appointed; in which Parliament, order is taken for removing all Sheriffs from their places, upon complaint of corruption: and here the King displaceth his Steward, and offers to take from the Bishop of Chichester, then Chancellour, the great Seal, which he refused to deliver, as having received it by the Common-Council of the Kingdom; and now Peter de Rivalis, and Stephen Seagrave, are received again into grace: by which may appear the vicifitude of fortune in Princes favours. After this, in the one and twentieth year of his Reign, another Parliament is held at London, where the King requires the thirteenth part of all the moveables as well of the Clergy as Laity; which being directly opposed, the King promifeth by oath, never more to injure the Nobility, so they would but relieve him at that present: After four dayes consultation, the King promising to use only the Counsel of his natural Subjects, and protesting against the Revocation lately propounded, and freely granting the inviolable observation of their Liberties, under pain of Excommunication, a Subsidy is granted him; but so, that four Knights be appointed in every Shire to receive and deliver the same, either to some Abbey or Castle, where it may be safely kept; that if the King fail in performance of his Grants, it may be restored to the Countrey from whence it was collected: and now the King to make a shew of true reconciliation for his part, suddenly causes the Earls Warren and Ferrers, with

He returns out of France without success.

The King again in person demands a Subsidie, but is denied, without granting the Lords demands.

John Fitz-Geoffrey to be sworn his Counsellours: yet was neither of the points either for removing of strangers, or for disposing the money observed afterward by the King: for the money he made bold to take at his pleasure; and for strangers, they were so far from removing, that they were drawn nearer to him: for now William Valentine, Uncle to the Queen, is grown the most inward man with him, and nothing done but by his counsel; also the Earl of Provence, the young Queens Father, a poor Prince, hath a good share of the money that was collected: and Simon de Mountford, a French man born, is entertained by the King, and preferred secretly in marriage to Eleanor the Kings Sister, Widow of William Earl of Pembroke, the great Marshal, and is made Earl of Leicester, by right of his Mother Avice, daughter of Blanchman, Earl of Leicester: which courses to incense the Nobility, that it put them out into a new commotion; and Richard the Kings Brother becomes one of the party, whom the other Lords make their spokesman to the King, to aggravate his breach of promise, and to acquaint him with all the disorders of the Kingdom; with whose remonstrance the King is so moved, that after he had tried the Londoners, and found them also to partake with the Lords, he calls a Parliament at London, whither the Lords come armed for their own safety: where after long debating, the King taking his Oath to refer the matter to certain grave men of the Kingdom; Articles are drawn, sealed, and publicly set up to the view of all, with the seals of the Legate, and divers great men: but before it came to be effected, the Earl of Cornwall, by the working of Simon Mountford, hath his edge rebated, and is brought to be unwilling to meddle in the matter any more; which the other Lords seeing, they also grew cold, and so for that time it rested, and no more was done in it. About this time, a certain fanatic fellow, had got into the Kings chamber in the night, having a naked knife in his hand, with a resolved purpose to kill him: but finding him not there, (for the King lay that night with the Queen) he then went looking about to find him out: but being taken and confelling, who were his complices, he was afterward drawn in peices with wild Horses. So provident a care hath God to protect his Anointed.

And now is the Kings turn to play his part in using his authority, which he fails not to do to the uttermost: for upon a small occasion he causeth the gates of Gilberts now Earl of Pembroke (the third son of William the great Marshal) to be shut against him at Winchester, whereupon the Earl retires into the North. Also Simon Norman, Master of the Kings Seal, and his greatest Favorite, is thrown out with disgrace, and his brother Geoffrey a Knight Templar, is put out of the Council; both of them for not yielding to pass a Grant from the King made unto Thomas Earl of Flanders, the Queens Uncle, of four pence upon every sack of Wool. And now that load enough is laid upon those of the Laity, comes a new load to be laid upon the Clergy; for the Pope nothing dainty to make use of the power he had in the King, sends over three hundred Romans, requiring to have the first Benefices that should be vacant, bestowed upon them: which seemed so unreasonable a request, and to the Clergy of England so damnable, that it made Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury to give over all, and betake himself to a voluntary exile in the Abbey of Pontinnac in France; yet to shew his respect to the Pope, gave him eight hundred Marks before his departure. And to lay more weight upon the Clergy, great sums are also required of them for maintenance of the Popes warre against the Emperour: which though the Clergy opposed, and shewed many good reasons of their opposition both to the King and the Legat, yet by promises or threatenings, they were won or forced to yield unto it. And now comes the Earl of March, and once again solicits the King to make another journey into France, which being yielded to by the King, and assented to in Parliament, an aid presently was demanded towards it: but this demand was not only opposed, but all the Kings Taxations and aids before granted, were now repeated; and thereupon an absolute denial to grant any more. Upon this, the King comes to the Parliament himself in person; earnestly, and indeed, humbly craving their aid for this once: but all prevailed not, they had made a vow to the contrary: and the King is driven to get what he could of particular men; of whom partly by gift, and partly by loan, he gets so much, that he carries over with him thirty barrels of Sterling money. This expedition had no better success than the former, for after a whole years stay, the King was driven to make a dishonourable Truce with the King of France, and return home. At his return he put the Jews to another redemption, and the Londoners to another exaction; and to help on his charge, his wives mother, the Countess of Provence comes now to visit him, who bringing her daughter Zanchia with her, a marriage is solemnized between her and Richard Earl of Cornwall, whose wife was lately dead, and he returned from the Holy wars. The old Countess at her return, is presented with many rich gifts, having besides received an annual pension of four thousand Marks out of England, for five years past, in consideration of a pact made, that King Henry after her decease should have the Earldom of Provence: but shortly after her return, she disappoints him of that, and bestows it upon her youngest Daughter Beatrix, married to Charles the French Kings brother; who was after King of Naples and Sicilie: so as this Countess lived to see all her four daughters Queens: Richard Earl of Cornwall, coming after to be elected King of the Romans. Upon these profusions, a consultation is had for new supplies, and no way thought so fit as by Parliament; hereupon a Parliament is again assembled at Westminster, whither the King comes again himself in Person, urging his necessities, yet nothing would be granted without the assurance of reformation and due execution of the Laws. And here they desire to have it ordained, that four of the most grave and discreet Peers should be chosen as Conservators of the Kingdom, and sworn of the Kings Counsel, both to see Justice administered, and the treasure issued, and

A and these or two of them at least, should ever attend about the King. Also that the Lord Chief Justiciar, and the Lord Chancellor should be chosen by the general voyces of the States assembled, or else be one of the number of those four. Besides they propound, that there might be two Justices of the Benches, two Barons of the Exchequer, and one Justice for the Jews; and those likewise to be chosen by Parliament. But while these things were in debating, comes one Martin, a new Legat from the Pope, with a larger Commission then ever any before, to exhort upon the State; but at the same time, Letters coming from the Emperour Frederick, to entreat that the Pope might have no more supplies out of England; the Popes Mandate is rejected, and his Agent Martin disgracefully sent home. This business took up so much time, that nothing else was done in this Parliament; but only an aid granted to the King for the marriage of his Daughter to Alexander King of Scots; twenty shillings of every Knights Fee; and that with much ado, and repetition of his former aids.

The Winter following he assembles another Parliament, wherein he moves for an aid upon a design he had upon Wales, and to pay his debts, which were urged to be so great that he could not appear out of his chamber for the infinite clamour of such, to whom he owed for his Wine, Wax, and other necessities of house; but they all to his face, refused to grant him anything: whereupon other violent courses are taken, an ancient quarrel is found out against the City of London, for which they are commanded to pay fifteen thousand Marks, and Passlewe the Clerk is employed, with others, in a most peremptory Commission, to enquire of all such Lands as had been inforested, and either to fine the occupiers thereof at their pleasure, or else to take it from them and sell the same to others; wherein such rigour was used, that multitudes of people were undone. But now to shew the King the estate of his Kingdom, and the oppression of Popes, inquiry was made of the Revenues which the Romans and Italians had in England: which were found to be annually fixty thousand Marks; being more then the yearly Revenues of the Crown: which so moved the King, that he caused the same to be notified, with all other Exactions, to the General Council now assembled at Lyons: and this (with the ill usage of his Agent Martin) vexed the Pope, that he is said to have uttered these words: It is time to make an end with the Emperour, that we may crush these petty Kings, for the Dragon once appeased, or destroyed, these lesser Snakes will soon be trodden down. But upon the Popes rejecting the consideration of these grievances of England, and despising the Kings message (who he said began to Frederize) it was absolutely here Ordained, under great penalty, that no contribution of money should be given to the Pope by any Subject of England: and the King for a time assents unto it, but being of an irresolute and wavering nature, and afraid of threats, he soon gave over what he undertook, so as the Pope continued his former rapine; and though he had promised never to send any more Legates into England, yet sent he other Ministers under the title of Clerks, that had as great power as Legates, and effected as much.

And now, for the other part of the State, new occasions also of complaint were offered: Peter of Savoy Earl of Richmond, comes into England, bringing with him certain maids to be married to young Noble men of this Countrey, the Kings Wards, of whom Edmund Earl of Lincoln hath one, and Richard de Burgh another: and the same year three of the Kings Brothers by his mother, Guy de Lusignan, William de Valence, and Avelin a Clerk, are sent over to be provided of Estates in England: also Thomas of Savoy (sometimes Earl of Flanders by right of his Wife) comes with his sister Beatrix, Countess of Provence the Queens mother; who are again Feasted and Gifted; for which the King is taxed the next Parliament in Candlemas term, and besides sharply reprehended for his breach of promise, having Vowed & Declared by his Charter never more to injure the State in that kind; also for his violent taking up of provision of Wax, Silk, Robes, and especially of Wine, contrary to the will of the sellers, and many other grievances they complain of; all which the King patiently hears, in hope to obtain his desire, but yet nothing is effected, and the Parliament being prorogued till Midsummer following, and the King growing more obdurate then before, it afterward brake up in discontent. But the Parliament not supplying him, he is advised to furnish his wants with sale of his Place, and Jewels of the Crown, being told, that though they were sold, yet they would revert again unto him; and having with great loss received money for them, he asks who had bought them: Answer is made, the City of London. That City (said he) is an inexhaustible Gulph, If Orlivins Treasure were to be sold, they surely would buy it. In his two and fortieth year, a Parliament was held, which by some was called Infamum Parliamentum, the mad Parliament; for that, at this Parliament (to which the Lords came with great retinues of armed men) many things were Enacted contrary to the Kings pleasure, and his Royal Prerogative.

And now to vex them, he appoints a Fair to be kept at Westminster, forbidding under great penalty, all exercise of Merchandize within London, for fifteen days, and all other Fairs in England, and namely that of Ely; but this Novelty came to nothing; the inconvenience of the place, as it was then, and the foulness of the weather, brought more affliction then benefit to the Traders. That Christmas also he requires New-years Gifts of the Londoners, and shortly after writes unto them his Letters imperiously deprecatory to aid him with money, and thereby gets of them twenty thousand pounds, for which the next year after he craves pardon of them. And notwithstanding his continual taking up all Provisions for his house, yet he lessens his house-keeping in no honourable manner. And then seeing he could get nothing of the States together, he calls unto him, or writes unto every Nobleman apart, declaring his poverty; and how he was bound by Charter in a debt of thirty thousand pounds to those of Burdeaux, and his Gascyons (who otherwise would not have suffered him to depart home) at his last being in France: but failing herein of Temporal Lords, he addresseth his Letters to the Prelates, of whom he finds as little relief; by much importunity and his own presence, he got of the Abbot of Ramsay a hundred pound, but the Abbot of Burrough had the face to deny him, though the King told him, it was more Alms to give money to him, then to a Beggar that went from door to door. The Abbot of Saint Albans yet was more kind, and gave him threescore Marks. To such lowliness did the necessity of this indigent King (through his profusion) bring him. The Jews ever exposed to his will, feel the weight of these his wants: One Abraham, found a Delinquent, redeems himself for seven hundred Marks, and Aaron another Jew protests, the King had since his last being in France taken from him at times, thirty thousand Marks of silver, besides two hundred Marks of gold given to the Queen.

But now the Lords assemble again at London, and press him with his promise made unto them, that the Chief Justiciar, Chancellor and Treasurer should be appointed by the General Council of the Kingdom, but by the absence of Richard Earl of Cornwall, (which was thought to be done of purpose) they return frustrate of their desire. And now the Bishoprick of Winchester falling void, the King sends presently to the Monks of the Cathedral Church, to elect his Brother Athelmar: and because he would not be denied, he goes thither himself in person, and there enters the Chapter house as a Bishop or Prior, gets up into the Presidents Chair, begins a Sermon, and takes his Text, Justice and Peace have kissed each other; and thereupon useth these words: To me and other Kings who are to govern the People, belongs the rigour of Judgment and Justice; to you who are men of quiet and Religion, peace and tranquility; and this day I hear you have (for your own good) been favourable to my request, with many such like words: whereby the Monks finding the earnestness of his desire, held it in vain to deny him, and Athelmar is elected: but with this reservation, if the Pope allow it. Shortly after follows the memorable Case of Sir Henry de Batho, a Justiciar of the Kingdom, and a special Counsellour to the King, who by corruption had attained to a mighty Estate, and is said, in one Circuit to, have gotten two hundred pound land per annum; He is accused by Sir Philip Darcie of falsehood in the Kings Courts; and the King is so incensed against him, that in the Parliament at this time holden in London, Proclamation is made, that whosoever had any Action or Complaint against Henry de Batho should come and be heard. One of his fellow Justiciars accused him of acquiring a malefactor for a bribe. The King seeing Henry de Batho's friends to be many and strong, breaks out into rage, protesting, that whosoever would kill Henry de Batho should be acquitted for the deed. But afterward by intercession of the Earl of Cornwall, and the Bishop of London, the King becomes pacified, and Sir Henry is released, paying two thousand Marks; and after is restored to his former place and favour. The King keeping his Christmas at York, the marriage is solemnized between Alexander King of Scots, and Margaret his Daughter; to the Feast of which solemnity it is said the Archbishop gave six hundred fat Oxen, which were all spent at one meal: and besides, the Feast cost him four thousand Marks.

About this time the Pope solicits King Henry to undertake the Cross, and so doth Alphonso King of Castile, offering to accompany him in Person, to rescue the King of France, who was now held Prisoner by the Souldan, and because a ranfome collected for him in France was by tempest cast away at Sea, the Captive King offers to restore Normandy to the King of England, if he would come to his rescue. Upon this solicitation of the Pope, and the grant of a tenth of the Clergy and Laity for three years to come; the King undertakes the Cross, rather, it seems, to get the money, then with any purpose to perform the Journey: which had it been collected (saith Paris) would have amounted to six hundred thousand pounds, to the utter impoverishing of the Kingdom. And now the King by Proclamation calls the Londoners to Westminster, and there causeth the Bishops of Worcester and Chichester to declare his intentions, and to exhort the people to undertake the Cross and attend him: but few are moved by their persuasions, only three Knights of small note, whom thereupon the King in open view, imbraceth, kisseth, and calls his Brethren, checking the Londoners, as ignoble Mercenaries, and there himself takes his Oath for performing it, and to set forth upon Midsummer day next. In taking his Oath, he lays his right hand on his Breast, according to the manner of a Priest; and after on the Book, and kist it as a Layman. About this Tenth (granted by the Pope, but not by the People) a Parliament is called at London, where the Bishops are first dealt withal, (as being a work of piety) and they absolutely refuse it; then the Temporal Lords are set upon, and they answer as the Bishops, which put the King into so great a rage, that he drove out all that were in his Chamber as if he had been mad. Then he falls to persuade them a part, sending first for the Bishop of Ely, and deals with him in all kind manner, recounting the many favours he had done him. The Bishop replies, disuading him from the Journey by Example of the King of France; and to that purpose useth many good reasons; which the King hearing, in great passion commanded his servants to thrust him out of door, perceiving by this what was to be expected of the rest, and thereupon falls upon his former violent courses; and first the City of London is compelled to the Contribution of a thousand Marks: and the Gascyons being upon revolt, unless speedy succour be sent them, general Musters are made, and commandement given, that whosoever could dispend thirteen pounds per annum, should furnish out a Horseman. This occasions another Parliament, wherein it seems, the State began wisely to consider that all their oppositions

A did no good, the Kings turn must be served one way or other; therefore they agreed to relieve him rather by the usual way, then force him to those extravagant courses which he took; but yet so, as the Reformation of the Government, and the ratification of their Laws and Liberties, might once again be solemnly confirmed. And after fifteen daies consultation, to satisfy the Kings desire for his holy Expedition, a Tenth is granted by the Clergy, and Scutage, three Marks of every Knights Fee by the Laity; and thereupon those often confirmed Charters are again ratified, and that in the most solemn and Ceremonial manner, that State and Religion could possibly devise. The King with all the great Nobility of England, all the Bishops in their reverent Ornaments with burning Candles in their hands, assemble to hear the terrible sentence of Excommunication against the infringers of the same. And at the lightning of those Candles the King having received one in his hand, gives it to the Prelate that stood by, saying; It becomes not me, being no Priest, to hold this Candle, my heart shall be a greater Testimony; and withall laid his hand spread upon his Breast all the time the Sentence was read; which was thus pronounced, Autoritate Dei Omnipotentis, &c. Which done, he causeth the Charter of King John his Father, granted by his free consent, to be openly read. In the end, having thrown away their Candles, which lay smoking on the ground, they cried out, So let them who incur this sentence, be extinct, and have no better favour then these snuffs; and the King with a loud voyce said, As God help me, I will, as I am a Man, a Christian, a Knight, a King Crowned and anointed, inviolably observe all these things: and therewithall the Bells rung out, and the people shouted for joy.

C Yet was not all so quieted by this Grant, but that there were grievances still, whereof the first falls upon his Brother Richard Earl of Cornwall: for the King having seven and twenty years before given him the Province of Gascogne, now that he had a Son of his own, he would take it from his Brother, and give it to his Son; and the Earl refusing to deliver his Charter, it is plotted to imprison him, but he escaping out of Burdeaux, comes over into England. The King, to win the Nobility of Gascogne to turn him, promiseth them thirty thousand Marks, which they accept so as he bindeth himself by his Oath and Charter to perform it. This distress of theirs the King takes in ill part, and thereupon sends Simon Mountford Earl of Leicester, a stern man, to be their Governour, who with his insolent Government, so discontents them, that after three years suffering, they send the Archbishop of Burdeaux, with other great men, to complain of his Infolencies; whereupon Mountford is sent for, and because the Lords took part with him, the King takes part with the Gascyons; which Mountford took so ill, that he upbraids the King with breaking his promise: to whom the King in great rage replied, that no promise was to be kept with an unworthy Traytor: at which word Mountford riseth up, protesting that he lied; and were he not protected by his Royal Dignity, he would make him repent those words. The King commands his Servants to lay hold on him, but the Lords would not permit it. Yet after this great affront to the King, is Mountford sent over again into Gascogne though with a more limited Authority, and shortly after the King with a Fleet of three hundred Ships goes thither himself, and soon compoeth all differences in the Countrey.

But now the King of Spain pretends a title to Aquitane, and to take him off, King Henry sends to treat of a marriage between Prince Edward and his Sister Eleanor, which being accepted by the King of Spain, the Marriage is solemnized at Burgos, where the King of Spain Knights the Prince, and quits his claim to Aquitane for him and his Successors for ever: and King Henry invests the Prince and wife in it, and gives unto him besides Ireland, Wales, Bristol, Stamford, and Grantham: and from hence it came that ever after this, the Kings eldest Son was immediately upon his birth Prince of Wales, and Earl of Cheser. After this King Henry prepares to return home, and well he might, having spent in this and his former Journeys into those parts, the sum of seven and twenty hundred thousand pounds; More then all the Lands if they had been sold, were worth: which when the King was told, he is desired there might be no words made of it for his credit. And now being to return, he is desirous, with the King of France leave to pass thorow France; and coming to Paris with a thousand Horse, where he stayed eight daies, is there most Royally feasted by the King of France; and he as royally feasts the King of France again. But it is the Lords and the Jews that are like to pay for all. For coming home about Christmas, when the Londoners presented him with a hundred pounds in money, and afterwards with two hundred pounds in plate; it was so slighted, and so ill taken, that a hole was presently found in their coat, for an escape of a Prisoner, which cost them three thousand Marks: Yet was not this enough, but he takes good Fleeces from the Jews, and then lets them out to Farm, to his Brother Richard, for a great sum of money, and he to make what more of them he could.

Yet after all this he complains of his Debts, which he saith are at least three hundred thousand Marks, which must needs be the heavier to him, because he had diminished his own means, by the allowance of fifteen thousand Marks per annum to his son the Prince. The only hope is in the Parliament, but a Parliament being called, they fall presently upon their old grievances, complaining upon the King for breach of Charters, and renewing their claim, to have the chief Justiciar, the Chancellor, and Treasurer, to be chosen by themselves: so nothing was done for the King at this time, and the Parliament being prorogued till Michaelmas after, as little then, by reason many of the Peers came not, as not being summoned according to the tenor of Magna Charta. And now while the King was using means to wind himself out of debt, there

But upon condition to confirm their Charters. Which are confirmed with the greatest solemnity that could be devised.

Mountford giveth K. Henry the lie to his face. Yet soon reconciled.

The Parliament requires to have the choosing of the chief Justice, Chancellor, and Treasurer.

there happened occasions to put him further in; for now Thomas Earl of Savoy, the Queens Brother being at war with the City of Thurny, must be supplied with Money towards it, by the King of England. Now the Elect, Bishop of Toledo, the King of Spain's Brother, comes into England, and must be sumptuously Feasted, and have great gifts presented him: Now Eleanor the Princes wife, arrives with a multitude of Spaniards, and must all be entertained at the Kings charge, and have no small presents given them at their departure: Now comes Rufandus from the Pope, with power to collect the Tenth of the Clergy, for the Popes use and the Kings, and to absolve him from his oath of the holy War, so he would come to destroy Manfred, son to the Emperour Frederick, now in possession of the Kingdom of Sicilie, and Apulia. And this man likewise hath great gifts bestowed upon him, besides a rich Prebend in Tork: but the Pope by too much seeking his profit, loseth credit and all; for the Clergie slight him, and will give him nothing: and when he would have borrowed of the Earl of Cornwall five hundred Marks, the Earl answered, He liked not to lend his money to one, upon whom he could not disreign. But King Henry's greatest charge was his purchasing a Kingdom for his Son Edmund; for now comes the Bishop of Bononia from the Pope, with a ring of Investiture to Prince Edmund, in the Kingdom of Sicilie, which he pretends to be at his disposing; and King Henry takes it in so good earnest, that after this he calls his son Edmund by no other name then King of Sicilie. But all this was done by the Pope, but to angle away King Henry's money, as indeed upon this hope he had drawn the King into the engagement of an hundred and fifty thousand Marks; for to draw the King on, it was given out that the Pope had defeated all Manfred's Forces, and was thereby in possession of the Kingdom, when the truth was, that Manfred had defeated the Popes Forces, and was thereby himself established in the Kingdom.

The year 1257, the King keeps his Christmas at Winchester, where new grievances arise. The Merchants of Gascogne, having their Wines taken from them by the Kings Officers without satisfaction; complain to their Lord the Prince, he to his father, and his father having been informed before-hand by his Officers, that their clamour was unjust, as relying upon the Princes favour; he falls into a great rage with the Prince, and breaks out into these words: See! now my Blood, and my own Bowels impugn me: but afterwards pacified, he gives order the injuries should be redressed. And now the Princes followers themselves come to be a grievance, who relying upon their Master, commit many outrages, and spoil and wrong men at their pleasure; and the Prince himself is not altogether free; of whom it is said, that meeting a young man travelling by the way, he caused one of his ears to be cut off, and one of his eyes to be put out: and many such pranks plaid by him and his followers in Wales, made the Welsh break out into open Rebellion, which the Prince would fain have suppressed, but there was no money to be had towards the doing it. And now the King falls to shifts, he comes into the Chequer himself, and there laies penalties upon Sheriffs, that return not their moneys in due time; then he falls upon measures of Wine and Ale, upon Bushels and Weights, and something he gets; but London is his best Chequer, and every year commonly, he hath one quarrel or other to the Londoners, and they are sure to pay. And now falls out an accident, seeming of great honour, but certainly of no profit to the Kingdom. Richard Earl of Cornwall the Kings brother is elected King of the Romans; for although Alphonso King of Spain, the great Mathematician was his Competitor, yet Earl Richards money wrought more then his learning, and the Arch-bishop of Colen comes over to fetch him, and Crowned he is at Aquisgrame. This Earl of Cornwall is reported able to dispend a hundred Marks a day, for ten years, besides his Revenues in England. But now as a man that paises dear for an Office, looks that his Office should pay him again: so Earl Richard having given infinitely to compass his advancement, looked to help himself again by the place; and this, and the desire he had to revenge himself upon those that had opposed his Election, made him take such violent courses that he came soon to be dispossessed, forsaken, and forced to return into England, a poorer King then he went out an Earl.

Acts done in the contention between the King and his Barons.

Now King Henry very proud to have his younger son a King as well as his brother, calls a Parliament, wherein he brings his son Edmund clad in Sicilie habit, and tells the Parliament, that for advancing this son of his to the Kingdom of Sicilie, he had bound himself under covenant of losing his Kingdom, in the sum of an hundred and forty thousand Marks, and hoped they would not think much to aid him with money for to great an advancement: but the Parliament stood firm to their usual condition of Magna Charta; so as that might be confirmed, they were content to give two and fifty thousand Marks: but this gave the King no satisfaction. The year after, another Parliament is holden at London, wherein upon the Kings pressing them again for means to pay his debts to the Pope; the Lords tell him plainly, they will not yield to give him any thing for any such purpose; and give their reasons, and withall repeat their own grievances, his breach of promise, the insolency of his brothers, and specially William de Valence, who had given the lye to the Earl of Leicester, and no right done him in it; and many such things: which the King hearing, and not able to deny, humbles himself, and tells them how he had often by ill counsell been seduced; but promitteth by his Oath which he took King Henry can get no money of the Parliament to make his son Edmund a King.

A on the Tomb of S. Edward, to reform all those errors. But the Lords not well knowing how to deal in this business, as being divided between a desire to satisfy the King, and a desire to be satisfied themselves; and knowing withal the variableness of the Kings nature, they get the Parliament to be adjourned to S. Barnabys day, and then to assemble at Oxford. In which meantime the Earls, Glocester, Leicester Hereford, the Earl Marshal, Bigod, Spencer, and other great men confederate, and provide by arms to effect their desire; and here is the foundation laid of those bloody wars that ensued between King Henry, and his Barons.

And now the King being put to his shifts for money, gets the Abbot of Westminster to put his Seal, and that of his Covent to a Deed Obligatory, as a Surety for two hundred Marks, making account, that by his example, others would be drawn to do the like; but his trusty servant Simon Passeleve, being employed to other Monasteries, and telling them amongst other reasons, to persuade them, that the King was Lord of all they had; they only answered, they acknowledged indeed the King to be Lord of all they had, but yet so, as to defend, not to destroy the same, and this was all he could get of them. The Prince also in no less want then his father, is driven to mortgage his Town of Stamford, Braban, and many other things, to William de Valence, a Poitouin, whereby appeared the disorder of the time, when the Prince was in want, and strangers had such plenty. And now is the Parliament assembled at Oxford, which the Lords come attended with large trains, and here they begin with the expostulation of the former Liberties, requiring that the chief Justiciar, the Chancellor, and Treasurer may be ordained by public choice, and that the twenty four Conservators of the Kingdom may be confirmed, twelve by the election of the Lords, and twelve by the King: some write there were but twelve in all, and were called, The Douze Peers, the twelve Peers, who ruled all things at their pleasure without controulment. The King, seeing their strength, and in what manner they required these things, swears solemnly again to the confirmation of them, and cauteh the Prince to take the same Oath. But the Lords left not here, the Kings Brethren, the Poitouins, and other strangers must presently be removed: and this also, though with some little opposition, was at last concluded: and thereupon the Kings brethren and their followers are despoiled of all their fortunes, and exiled by prescription under the Kings own hand, directed to the Earls of Hereford, and Surrey. But now sickness and mortality happening to many great ones; it is imputed to poysons, supposed to have been prepared by those strangers prescribed; the Earl of Glocester in a sickness suddenly lost his hair, his teeth, his nails; and his Brother hardly escaped death: which made many to suspect their nearest servants, and their Cooks: Walter Secoyne the Earls Steward, is strictly examined, committed to Prison, and afterward without confession, is upon presumptions, only executed at Winchester: Elias a converted Jew, is said to have confessed, that in his house the poysen was concocted; but it was when he was a Jew, and not a Christian. Every man that had received any wrong by those strangers, now put up their complaints, and are heard. Guido de Rochfort, a Poitouin, to whom the King had given the Castle of Rochester, is banished, and all his Goods confiscate. William Bussy, Steward to William de Valence, is committed to the Tower of London, and most reproachfully used. Richard Grey, whom the Lords had made Captain of Dover Castle, is sent to intercept whatsoever the Poitouins conveyed that way out of England: and much treasure of theirs, and of the Elect of Winchester is by him taken, besides great sums committed to the new Temple are found out, and seized for the King.

And now the chief Justiciar Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earl Marshal (chosen this last Parliament by public voice) procures that four Knights in every Shire should enquire of the oppressions of the poor, done by great men; and certifye the same, that redress might be made. Also order was taken against corrupting of Justice; when yet notwithstanding this pretended care of the publick, it is noted by the Writers and Records of that time, how the Lords were themselves but as totidem tyranni, enforcing the services of the Kings Tenants that dwelt near them. But to make their cause the more popular, it was rumoured that the King stood upon it, that his necessity might be supplied out of the Estates of his people, whether they would or no: which the King hearing, sends forth Proclamation, declaring how certain malicious persons had falsely and seditiously reported, that he meant unlawfully to charge his Subjects, and subvert the Laws, and Liberties of the Kingdom; and by these false suggestions averted the hearts of his people from him: and therefore desires them not to give credit to such perturburs: for that he was ready to defend all Right, and Customs due unto them: and that they might rest of this secured, he caused his Letters to be made Patents. But now Montford, Glocester, and Spencer, inforce the King to call a Parliament at London, where they get the authority of the twenty four to be estate wholly upon themselves, and they alone to dispose of the custody of the Castles, and other businesses of the Kingdom: and here they bind the King to owe to them their Legal obedience whensoever he infringed this Charter.

At this time intelligence was given to the Lords, that Richard King of the Romans had a purpose to come into England, and the Lords suspecting he would come with power to aid the King his Brother, take order for guarding the Ports, with intent to hinder his landing: but finding his train to be but small, accompanied only with his Queen, two German Earls and eight Knights, upon his promise to take their propounded Oath, they admit him to Land, but would neither permit the King (who came thither to meet him) nor himself to enter into Dover Castle. At Canterbury they bring him into the Chapter house, where the Earl of Glocester standing forth in the the midit, calls out the Earl, not by the name of King, but Richard Earl of Cornwall; who in reverent manner coming forth, taketh his Oath in these words. Hear all men, that I Richard, Earl of Cornwall, do here swear upon the holy Evangelists, that I shall be faithful and diligent to reform with you the Kingdoms of England, and be an effectual Coadjutor to expell all Rebels and disturbers of the same, and this Oath will inviolably observe, under pain of losing all the Land I have in England: So help me God. But though this Earl came home both weak and poor, yet upon his return the King takes heart, and seeks all means to vindicate his power, and first sends messengers secretly to Rome, to be absolved from his enforced Oath; and to have the more assurance from the King of France, he makes an absolute resignation of all his Right to the Dutchie of Normandy, and the Earldoms of Anjou, Poitou, Touraine and Maine; in regard whereof the King of France gives him three hundred thousand pounds (some say Crowns) of Anjou money; and grants him to enjoy all Guyen, beyond the River Garonne, all the Countrey of Xaintonge to the River of Charente, the Countrey of Limousin and Quercie, for him and his successors, doing their homage to the Crown of France, as Duke of Aquitain.

And now was the King of France made arbitrator of the difference between King Henry and his Barons, who gives sentence against the Barons concerning the Provisions at Oxford; but of their side concerning King John's Charter: by which nice distinction, though he did but leave the matter as he found it: (for those Provisions, as the Lords pretended, were grounded upon that Charter) yet did his sentence draw many away from the party of the Barons, amongst whom was Henry son to the Earl of Cornwall, Roger Clifford, Roger de Leisbourn, Haimo, L'estranger, and many others. But the Earl of Leicester, notwithstanding this revolt, recovers the Town and Castle of Gloucester, constrains the Citizens to pay a thousand pounds for their redemption, goes with an Army to Worcester, possesseth him of the Castle, thence to Shrewsbury, and comes about to the Isle of Ely, subdues the same, and grows exceeding powerful. The King doubting his approach to London, falls to treat of a Peace, and a Peace is concluded upon these conditions: that all the Castles of the King should be delivered to the keeping of the Barons; the Provisions of Oxford should inviolably be kept; all strangers by a certain time should avoid the Kingdom, except only such as were licensed to stay. The Prince had fortified Windsor Castle; but Leicester coming to besiege it, he treats with him for Peace, which is refused, and the Castle is rendered to him.

The King at this time, to win time convokes another Parliament at London, wherein he won many Lords to take his part; as namely the Prince Richard his Brother, Henry his son, William Valence, with the rest of his Brothers lately returned, and with them the King marcheth to Oxford, whither divers Lords of Scotland repair to him, as John Commin, John Baliol, Lords of Galloway, Robert Bruce, and others: also many Barons of the North; Clifford, Piercy, Basset, and others. From Oxford he goes to Northampton, where he took Prisoners, Simon Montfort the younger, with fourteen other principal men; thence to Nottingham, making spoils of such possessions as pertained to the Barons in those parts. And now the Kings side grows strong, which the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester seeing they write to the King, protesting their Loyalty, and how they opposed only such as were enemies to him and the Kingdom, and had belyed them. The King returns answer that themselves were the perturbors of him and his State, and sought his and the Kingdoms destruction; and therefore defies them. The Prince likewise, and the Earl of Cornwall send Letters of defiance to them. Yet the Barons continue to mediate a Peace, and send the Bishops of London and Worcester, with offer of thirty thousand Marks to the King, for the damages done in these wars, so as the Statutes of Oxford may be observed; but this offer is not accepted. The Earl seeing no remedy, but it must be put to a day, takes his time to be early ready then was expected, and supplies his want of strength with policy, placing on the one side of a hill near Lewes, where the battle was fought, certain Ensigns without men, in such sort, as they might seem afar off to be squadrons of succours to second those he brought to the encounter, whom he caused all to wear white Crosses, both for their own notice, and the signification of his cause, which he would have to be thought for Justice. Here the fortune of the day was his, the King, the Prince, the Earl of Cornwall, and his son Henry, the Earls of Arundell and Hereford, with all the Scottish Lords, are taken prisoners, and of the English, five and twenty Barons and Bannerets: only the Earl Warren, William de Valence, Guy de Lusignan, the Kings brother, with Hugh Bigod Earl Marshal, save themselves by flight: five thousand (some say twenty thousand) are slain in the battle. A year and half is Simon Montfort in possession of his prisoner, carrying the King about with him to countenance his actions, till he had gotten all the strongest Castles in the Kingdom.

And now comes Erinyes and sets debate between the two great Earls of Leicester and Gloucester, about their Dividend: Leicester is taxed to do more for his own particular than the common good; his sons also presuming upon his greatness, grew insolent, whereupon Gloucester discontented forsakes that side, and betakes him to the Prince, who lately escaping out of the Castle of Hereford, had gotten a power about him to try the fortune of another battle. The revolt of this Earl being great in itself, was greater by its example: for now many others revolted likewise; and the Earl of Leicester, seeing the improvement of the Princes Forces, who was now with his Army about Worcester, though he saw his own disadvantage, yet imbatells in a Plain near Evesham to encounter him; and noting the manner of the approach of the Princes Army, said to those about him; These men come bravely on, they learn it not of themselves, but of me, and seeing himself likely to be beset, and overlaid with multitude, he advised his friends Hugh Spencer, Ralph Basset, and others to shift for themselves; which when they refused to do, then (saith he) let us commend our souls to God, for our bodies are theirs: and so undertaking the main weight of the battle, perished under it, and with him are slain his son Henry, eleven Barons, with many thousands of common Soldiers. And thus ended Montfort the great Earl of Leicester, highly honoured in his life, and more highly should have been after his death, if the people might have had their will, who talk of miracles enough to make him a Saint.

And now is King Henry by this victory of his son, at liberty; who together repair to Winchester, where a Parliament is convoked, and all who adhered to the Earl of Montfort, are disinherited, and their estates conferred on others, at the Kings pleasure; the Londoners also have their Liberties taken from them. But though the death of Montfort gave a great wound to the party of the Barons, yet it was not mortal, at least not mortal presently, for there remained reliques that kept it alive a good while after. Simon and Guy de Montfort sons of the Earl of Leicester, and other of the Barons, take and defend the Isle of Ely: the Castle of Killingworth held out half a year, till their victuals failed; and then yielded upon conditions to have their lives and goods saved, and many others there were, resolute and desperate persons, strongly knit and fastned together, though now shortly upon dissolving. For after the Parliament at Westminster, the King with an Army going against them, and being at Northampton, Simon and Guy de Montfort submit themselves to him: but when the Earl of Gloucester opposed the restoring them to their estates, they were fain to flee the Kingdom, and make their fortunes in other Countreys, as indeed they did: the younger in Italy, the elder in France, where they were propagators of two great Families. Their Mother was banished shortly after the battle of Evesham, a Lady of eminent note, as being the Daughter and Sister of a King, and yet of more note for her patient bearing of adversity, or rather for her making a benefit of adversity; for by this means she betook her self to the veil of Piety, and died a Nun at Montargis in France. About this time a great slaughter was made of Jews in London: and the quarrel was, because a Jew would have forced a Christian to give him more than two pence a week for the use of twenty shillings; two pence only being then allowed by the Law.

Three years after this, the disinherited Barons held out, till at length, conditions of render are propounded; but here the Council are divided in opinion: Mortimer and others stated in the possessions of the disinherited, are against restoration, alledging it were injustice to take from them the rewards of their service. Gloucester and twelve ordained to deal for the peace of the State, are earnest for restoration; alledging, it were hard measure to grant them their lives, and not their livelihoods: but not prevailing, in great discontentment Gloucester retires from Court, sends Messengers to warn the King to remove strangers from his counsell, and observes the Provisions at Oxford, as he promised at Evesham: otherwise that he should not marvel if himself did what he thought fit. Hereupon John de Warren, Earl of Surrey, and William de Valencia, are sent to the Earl of Gloucester: who though they could not persuade him to submit to the King; yet thus much they got of him under his hand and Seal, that he would never bear arms against the King, or his son Edward, but only defend himself and pursue Roger Mortimer, and his other enemies. And now a Parliament is convoked at Bury, wherein many demands are made by the King and the Legat, and all for money from the Clergy; but all denied, that nothing but denials are done in this Parliament. After this, the Legat employs Solicitors to persuade the disinherited Lords which held the Isle of Ely, to return to the faith and unity of the Church, and to the Peace of the King, according to the form propounded at Coventry: to which the Lords make answer, that they never opposed the unity of the Church, but the avarice of Church-men that were put in authority; and that they never opposed the King, but for the good of the Kingdom: and then required, that the Provisions at Oxford might be observed, and pledges be given them for their security. Hereupon the year after, the King prepares a mighty Army, and Prince Edward with Bridges entering the Isle of Ely, shuts them up so, that he constrains them at last to yield; also the Earl of Gloucester coming to London with an Army, is by the Legat once again persuaded to render himself to the King, and upon forfeiture of twelve thousand Marks, if ever he should raise any commotion again, is reconciled. Now remains Lewellin and the Welsh to be chastened for aiding of Simon Montfort; but the King going against them with an Army, they give him two and thirty pounds sterling, and so make their peace, and here was an end of the first wars between the Kings of England, and their Barons.

The next year after the Popes Legat Ottobon signs with the Croysado both the Kings sons, Edward, and Edmund, the Earl of Gloucester, and divers Noble men induced to undertake the Holy war by the sollicitation of him and the King of France; who notwithstanding his former calamities endured in that action, would once again adventure it; and because Prince Edward wanted means to furnish himself out, the King of France lends him thirty thousand Marks upon a mortgage of Gascon. And now whilst this preparation is in hand, King Henry labours to establish the Peace of the Kingdom, and to reform the excesses which the war had bred; and the same year assembles his last Parliament at Marleborough, where the Statutes of that Title were enacted. Near two years it seems to have been after the underraking the Crois before Prince Edward set forth, but then taking his wife Eleanor with him, though young with child, he set forward, and in the voyage, when many of his people seemed desirous to leave him, and return home, he is said to have stricken his breast, and sworn; that if all his followers forsook him, him, he would yet enter Acon, or Ptolemais; though but only with his horse-keeper Fovin. Shortly after Richard King of the Romans died, and the year following King Henry.

Of his Taxations and waies for raising of money.

NEver son was more like a Father in any thing, then King Henry was like his father King John, in this point, for raising of Money; for he trod directly in all his steps, if he added not something of his own. King John had great Subsidies granted him by Parliament, for any great action he undertook, so had King Henry. King John resumed the Lands aliened from the Crown, so did King Henry. King John made benefit of the vacancy of Bishopricks, and Abbeyes, so did King Henry. King John took great Fines of many for crimes not proved, but only supposed, so did King Henry. And John made benefit of a new Seal, so did King Henry. King John extorted great sums from the Jews, so did King Henry. And one way more he had to get money, which perhaps his father had not, and that was by begging, as he told the Abbot of Borough. It was more Aims to give money to him, then to the Begger that went from door to door. Indeed Taxations in this Kings Reign may be reckoned amongst his annual Revenues, for scarce any year passed without a Parliament, and seldom any Parliament without a Tax: or if any former was without, it was then cause of the greater Taxation some other way; as when he took of the Londoners for having aided the Barons twenty thousand Marks.

K. Henry gets money by begging.

Of his Lawes and Ordinances.

IN this Kings Reign were ratified and confirmed the two great Charters of Magna Charta and Charta de Foresta: also in his time were enacted the Statutes called of Merton, of Oxford, and of Marleborough. Also stealing of cattel, which before was but pecuniary, he made capital: and the first that suffered for the same, was one of Dunstable, who having stoln twelve Oxen from thiee Inhabitants of Colne, and being pursued to Redburn, was by a Bayliff of Saint Albons, according to the Kings Proclamation, condemned and beheaded. And it may seem strange, that in these times so much blood should be shed in the field, and none upon the Scaffold; for till the twenty sixth year of this King, that one William Maraisse, the son of Geoffrey Maraisse, a Noble man of Ireland, being condemned for Piracy and Treason, was hanged, beheaded, and quartered; there is no example of that kind of punishment to be found in our Histories. Particularly in this Kings Reign was made that Statute, by which the Ward and marriage of the Heirs of Barons within age is given to the King. Also in this Kings Reign the Pleas of the Crown were pleaded in the Tower of London. All Wears in the Thames are in this Kings time ordained to be plucked up and destroyed. Also the Citizens of London are allowed by Charter, to pass Toll-free through all England, and to have free Warren about London: also to have and use a common Seal. Also it is ordained that no Sheriff of London should continue in his Office longer then one year, which they did before for many. In the five and twentieth year of this King, were Aldermen first chosen within the City of London, which then had the rule of the City, and of the Wards of the same, and were then yearly changed, as now the Sheriffs are. It was in this Kings time allowed to the City of London to present their Mayor to the Barons of the Exchequer to be sworn: which before was to be presented to the King, wheresoever he were. In his time the clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken up by the King in his grants and writings. Also in this Kings time, William Bishop of Salisbury, first caused that custom to be received for a Law, whereby the Tenants of every Lordship are bound to owe their suit to the Lords Court, of whom they hold their Tenements. Also in the 32 year of this Kings Reign, the Wharf of London called Queen Hithes, was let to farm to the Citizens for fifty pounds the year, which is since grown scarce worth fifteen. In this Kings time a Proclamation was set forth, that all such as might dispend fifteen pound in Land, should receive the Order of Knight-hood; and those that would not, or could not, should pay their Fines.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

Affairs of the Church for matter of Doctrine, were never more quiet then in this Kings Reign; for now all Heresies accounted of the time, especially the Albigenses were in a manner suppressed by the Arms of the King of France, not without the vote of the King of England, who forbore to make war upon him in tenderness to this service; but for matter of manners they were never more turbulent: for now Abbeyes were fleeced, Sanctuaries violated, Clergy-men outraged, Bishops themselves not spared; and all for greediness of money, or for revenge.

Ottobone, the Popes Legat here in England, lying at the Abbey at Ostney, there happened a difference between his servants and the Scholars at Oxford; in which contention a brother of his was slain, and the Legat himself fain to flee into the Steeple for the safeguard of his life: whereupon Ottobone the Popes Legat in fear at Oxford.

A whereupon afterward being gotten from thence by the Kings safe conduct, he thundered out curses against the Scholars, and interdicted the University, so as the Colledges grew desolate, and the Students were dispersed abroad into other places, for the space of half a year: till the Monk of Ostney, and the Regent Masters of Oxford were fain to go bare-foot and bare-head through London, as far as Durham house, where the Legate lay, and there upon their humble submission, and great mens intercession, they were absolved, and the University restored to its former estate. But of this Ottobone, it may not be impertinent to relate a little further; that going afterward out of England, he came by degrees, after the death of Innocent the fifth, to be Pope of Rome himself, by the name of Adrian the fifth, and dyed within fifty days after his election. Amongst the affairs of the Church, may be reckoned the Ulcers of any member of the Church: such an one as in this Kings time broke out most loathsome; for one procuring five wounds to be made in his body, in resemblance to five wounds in Christs body, took upon him to be Christ, and had gotten a Woman, that took upon her to be the Virgin Mary; who continuing obstinate in their madness, were adjudged to be immured and shut up between two walls, to the end (no doubt) the contagion of their filthiness should spread no further. In this Kings time a little novelty was brought in by Pope Innocent the fourth, who ordained that Cardinals should wear red Hats: something perhaps for mystery, and something for distinction. Also in this Kings time, the Grecians forsook their obedience to the Church of Rome, and the Archbishop of Antioch claims to have precedence and authority above the Bishop of Rome, because the Apostle Peter had first governed the Church of Antioch seven years together. Also in the fifth year of this King, the Friars Minors (as some write) came first into England, but it is not like they came so soon, for they were Gray Friars of the order of St. Francis: and St. Francis had no grace till Pope Honorius the third, which was some years after. And it is miraculous which is related here of St. Francis, that fifteen days before his death appeared wounds in his hands and feet, like to those which Christ received there upon the Crofs, and that as soon as he was dead, there remained not so much as any marks of the said wounds upon him.

He interdicted the University and how pacified.

One takes upon him to be Christ.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

This King caused a chest of Gold to be made for laying up the Reliques of King Edward the Confessor, in the Church of Westminster. He builded a Church for converted Jews in London: also an Hospital at Oxford, for Passengers, and diseased persons: also the new Conventual Church and the Chappel of our Lady at Westminster, whereof he laid himself the first stone: also the house of Black Friars in Canterbury. In his time, Elo Countess of Salisbury founded the Abbey of Lacock in Wiltshire: Richard Earl of Cornwall, founded Hails, a Monastery of Cistercian Monks near to Winchcomb in Gloucestershire: Reginald de Moun, Earl of Somerset, and Lord of Dunster, founded the Abbey of Newham in Devonshire: Ranulph the third Earl of Chester, and Lord of little Britain, builded the Castles of Charley, Bestones, and the Abbey of De la Crofs: Sir John Mansel the Kings Chaplain, founded a house of Regular Canons near to Rumney in Kent: William de Albino Earl of Arundel, founded the Priory of Wimoucheam: William Brunc, a Citizen of London, and Rosa his wife, founded the Hospital of our Lady without Bishopsgate in London: And Isabel Countess of Arundel founded the Nunnery of Marram, near to Linne, Friars Minors first arrived at Dover, nine in number, whereof five remained at Canterbury, and there builded the first Convent of Friars Minors, that ever was in England: the other four came to London, who encreasing in number, had a place assigned them in Saint Nicholas Shambles; which John Iwyn, Mercer of London, appropriated to the use of the said Friars, and became himself a Lay brother. Also in this Kings time the new work of Saint Pauls Church in London was begun. If it were piety in the Jews, who falling into a Privy upon a Saturday, would not be taken out that day, because it was the Jews Sabbath: it was as much piety in the Earl of Gloucester, that would not suffer him to be taken out the next day, because it was the Christian Sabbath; and when the third day was come, he was taken out dead; whose piety was the greater? A strange accident upon an act of piety, is related in this Kings time; which if true, is a Miracle; if not true, is yet a Legend, and not unworthy to be read: that in a time of dearth, one man in a certain Parish, who allowed poor people to relieve themselves with taking corn upon his ground, had at Harvest a plentiful crop; where others that denied them had their corn all blasted, and nothing worth. In this Kings time also, Hugh Balsamus Bishop of Ely founded Saint Peters Colledge in Cambridge. Hubert de Burgh Earl of Kent, was buried in the Church of the Friars Preachers in London, to which Church he gave his Palace at Westminster, which afterward the Archbishop of York bought, and made it his Inne; since commonly called York-place, now White-Hall.

Casualties happening in his time.

AT one time there fell no Rain in England, from the first of March to the Assumption of our Lady; and at another time there fell so much Rain, that Holland and and Holdernes in Lincolnshire were overflowed and drowned. In the 17. year of his reign, were seen, A 5 Suns at one time together; after which followed so great a dearth, that people were constrained to eat Horle-flesh, and barks of Trees: and in London twenty thousand were starved for want of food. Also in his time the Church of Saint Mildred in Canterbury, and a great part of the City was burnt. Also the Town of Newcastle upon Tyne was burnt, Bridge and all. And though it may seem no fit place to tell it, yet here or no where it must be told; that in this Kings time there was sent by the King of France, the first Elephant that ever was seen in England. In this Kings time, Matthew Paris relates of a maid in Leicestershire, that being exactly watched, was found in seven years together, neither to eat nor drink, but only that on Sundays she received the Communion, and yet continued fat and in good liking: which if it be true, we may well believe that in the Resurrection, our life may be maintained without meat or drink. Also in this Kings time, there B was found a plentiful Mine of Tinne in Germany, which before this time was never known to be any where found but only in Cornwall; which much abated the price of Tinne in England. In his time also the Sea by the space of four or five days, flowed not up to her usual height, which was never known to happen at any time before. Also in his time a child was born in Kent, that at two years old cured all diseases. Also in his 56. year a Lamb was yeared at Greenwich beside London, that had two perfect bodies and but one head. Also in his time a child was born in the Isle of Wight, who at 18 years old, was scarce grown to be three foot high; and therefore brought to the Queen, she carried him about with her as a Monster of Nature.

Of his Wife and Children.

Edmund Chyouchback the first ancestor of the house of Lancaster.

HE married Eleanor, the second of the five daughters of Raymond Earl of Provence, who lived his wife thirty seven years, his widow nineteen, dyed a Nun at Ambury, and was buried in her Monastery. By her he had six sons and three daughters; of his sons, the four youngest dyed young, and were buried, three of them at Westminster, and the fourth in the New Temple by Fleetstreet. His eldest son Edward, surnamed Longshanks, of his tall and slender body, succeeded him in the Kingdom. His second son Edmund, surnamed Crouchback, of bowing in his back, (as some say) but more likely of wearing the sign of the Crofs, (anciently called a Crouch) upon his back, which was usually worn of such as had vowed voyages to Hierusalem, as he had done. He was invested titular King of Sicilie and Apulia, and created Earl of Lancaster; on whose person originally the great contention of Lancaster and York was founded. He had two wives, the first was Avelin daughter and heir of William Earl of Albemarle, by whom he left no issue. The second was Queen Blanch, daughter of Robert Earl of Artois, (brother of St. Louis King of France) widow of Henry of Champagne King of Nauarre: by her he had issue three sons and one daughter. His eldest son Thomas, who after his father was Earl of Lancaster, and having married Alice daughter and heir of Henry Lacie Earl of Lincoln, was beheaded at Pomfret without issue. His second son Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his brothers death was Earl of Lancaster and father of Henry the first Duke of Lancaster; his third son John, who dyed unmarried. His daughter Mary married to Henry Lord Piercie, mother of Henry the first Earl of Northumberland. This Edmund dyed at Bayn in Gascoin, in the year 1296. when he had lived fifty years, whose body half a year after his death, was brought over into England, and entombed at Westminster. Of King Henries three daughters, the eldest Margaret was married to Alexander the 3. King of Scotland, by whom she had issue, two sons, Alexander and David, who dyed both before their father, without issue; and one daughter Margaret Queen of Norway, wife of King Erick, and mother of Margaret the heir of Scotland and Norway, that died unmarried; The second daughter of King Henry was Beatrice, born at Burdeaux, married to John the first Duke of Britain, and had issue by him, Arthur Duke of Britain, John Earl of Richmont, Peter, and Blanch married to Philip son of Robert Earl of Artois; Eleanor a Nun at Ambury, and Mary married to Guy, Earl of S. Paul, she deceased in Britain, and was buried at London, in the Quire of the Gray-Friers within Newgate. The third daughter of King Henry, named Katherine, dyed young, and lies buried at Westminster, in the space between the Chappels of King Edward and Saint Bonet.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of stature but mean, yet of a well compacted body, and very strong: one of his eyelids hanging down, and almost covering the black of his eye: For his inward indowments, it may be said, he was wiser for a man, then for a Prince: for he knew better how to govern his life then his Subjects. He was rather Pious then Devout, as taking more pleasure in hearing Masses then Sermons, as he said to the King of France, He had rather see his friend once, then hear from him often. His mind seem'd not to stand firm upon its Basis, for every sudden accident put him into passion. He was neither constant in his love, nor in his hate; for he never had so great a favourite

A a Favourite whom he cast not into disgrace, nor so great an Enemy whom he received not into favour. An example of both which qualities was seen in his carriage towards Hubert de Burgh, who was for a time the greatest Favourite, yet cast out afterward in miserable disgrace, and then no man held in greater hatred, yet received afterward into grace again. And it is memorable to hear with what crimes this Hubert was charged at his arraignment, and specially one: That to disswade a great Lady from marriage with the King; he had said, the King was a squint-eyed Fool, and a kind of Leper, deceitful, perjured, more faint-hearted then a Woman, and utterly unfit for any Ladies company. For which, and other crimes laid to his charge in the Kings Bench, where the King himself was present; he was adjudged to have his Lands confiscate, and to be deprived of his Title of Earl; yet after all this was reitord to his estate again, and suffered to live in quiet. He was more delirous of money then of honour, for else he would never have sold his Right to the two great Dukedoms of Normandy and Anjou to the King of France for a sum of money. Yet he was more desirous of honour, then of quietness, for else he would never have contended so long with his Barons about their Charter of Liberty, which was upon the matter but a point of honour. His most eminent vertue, and that which made him the more eminent, as being rare in Princes, was his continency; for there is nothing read, either of any base children he had, or of any Concubine he kept.

A strange affront to a King.

Of his Death and Burial.

THOUGH he had lived a troublesome life, yet he died a quiet death; for he had settled Peace in his Kingdom, and in his conscience, for being at Saint Edmundsbury, and finding himself not well at ease, he made the more hast to London; where calling before him his Lords, and specially Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester; he exhorted them to be true and faithful to his son Prince Edward, who was at that time far from home, and therefore had the more need of their care, which consisted chiefly in their agreement one with another. And then his sickness increasing, he yielded up his soul to God, on the sixteenth day of November, in the year 1272. D when he had lived threecore and five years, reigned six and fifty; and was buried at Westminster, which he had newly builded.

Of men of Note in his time.

OF Martial men famous in his time there were many, but three specially who obscured the rest: the first was William Marshall, Earl of Pembroke, memorable for the great care he had of King Henry in his minority, and more memorable for the little care that Destinie had of his posterity; for leaving his five Sons behind him, they all lived to be Earls successively, yet all died without issue: So as the great Name and numerous Family of the Marshalls came wholly to be extinct in that Generation: and this happened (if we may believe Matthew Paris) by reason of a curse of an Irish Bishop, from whom he had taken two Mannors belonging to his Bishoprick, and neither he, nor all his sons, upon any intreaties would be gotten to restore them. The second was Richard de Clare Earl of Gloucester, who in a Battel against Baldwyn de Giffnes, a valiant Fleming, employed by King Henry, himself alone encountered twelve of his enemies, and having his horse slain under him, he pitcht one of them by the leg out of the saddle, and leapt into it himself, and continued the fight without giving ground, till his Army came to rescue him. An Act, that may seem fitter to be placed among the Fictions of Knights Errant, then in a true Narration. The third was Simon Montford, a man of so audacious a Spirit, that he gave King Henry the lie to his face, and that in presence of all his Lords, and of whom it seems, the King stood in no small fear: for passing one time upon the Thames, and suddenly taken with a terrible storm of Thunder and Lightning, he commanded to be set on shore at the next stairs, which happened to be at Durham House, where Montford then lay, who coming down to meet the King, and perceiving him somewhat frightened with the Thunder, said unto him, Your Majesty need not fear the Thunder, the danger is now past: No Montford (said the King) I fear not the Thunder so much as I do thee. Of men famous for sanctity of life, there were likewise many in his time, but three more eminent then the rest, Edmund Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Bishop of Chichester, and Thomas Arch-Deacon of Hereford, all three either Canonized, or at least thought worthy to be Canonized for Saints. To these may be added Robert Grosbead Bishop of Lincoln, who translated the Testaments of the twelve Patriarchs, out of Greek into Latine; which through envie of the Jews, never came to the knowledge of Saint Hierome, wherein are many Prophecies of our Saviour Christ. Of men famous for Learning, there were likewise many in his time; of whom some left Works behind them for Testimonies of their knowledge in divers kinds, as Alexander Hales, a Frier minor, who wrote many Treatises in Divinity; Ralph Coggeshall, who wrote the Appendix to the Chronicle of Ralph Nigir, Randolph

THE LIFE and REIGN OF KING EDWARD THE FIRST, Surnamed of WINCHESTER.

Of his coming to the Crown.

As soon as King Henry was dead and buried, the great Lords of the Land caused his eldest Son Prince Edward to be proclaimed King: and assembling at the New Temple in London, they there took order for the quiet governing of the Kingdom till he should come home. For at this time he was absent in the Holy Land; and had been there above a year when his Father died. But we cannot bring him home without telling what he did, and what he suffered in all that time, and in his return; for at his first coming thither he rescued the Great City of Acon from being surrendered to the Souldan; after which out of Envy to his Valour, one Anzazim, a desperate Saracen, who had often been employed to him from their General, being one time, upon pretence of some secret message admitted alone into the chamber, with a poisoned knife gave him three wounds in the body, two in the arm, and one near the armpit, which were thought to be mortal, and had perhaps been mortal, if out of unspeakable love the Lady Eleanor his wife had not sucked out the poison of his wounds with her mouth, and thereby effecting a cure, which otherwise had been incurable: It is no wonder, that love should do wonders, which is itself a wonder. And now being disappointed of aids that were promised to be sent him, and leaving garrisons in fit places for defence of the Countrey, he with his wife Eleanor takes his journey homewards, and first passing by Sicilie, was there most kindly received by Charles, King of that Island, where he first heard of his father's death; which he took more heavily far, then he had taken the death of his young son Henry, whereof he had heard a little before; at which when King Charles marvelled, he answered that other sons might be had, but another father could never be had. From hence he passeth through Italie, where much honour is done him both by the Pope, and other Princes, and then descends into Burgogne, where by the Earl of Chalonn, a stout man at arms, he is challenged at a Turnement, with a pretence to solemnize his presence, but with a purpose indeed to disgrace his person; and though Prince Edward in many respects might justly have refused it, yet the nobleness of his mind would not suffer him to pass by any occasion of shewing his valour; and in this encounter he so foiled the Earl, as he made it appear, that Fame had been no liar in the Report it had made of him. And here a great part of his English Nobility met him, from whence he passed into France, where the King Philip his near Cousin (as being sisters sons) entertains him with great solemnity, and graceth his solemnity with so much courtesie, that it won Prince Edward voluntarily to do him homage for the Territories he held in France; and this voluntariness in Prince Edward won the King of France again to grant quietly unto him all the Lands in France that belonged to him, and so these two great Kings by reciprocal courtesie, effected that, which their Predecessours by force could

He takes the death of his father more heavily then of his son. Prince Edward his valour.

Reciprocal courtesies between K. Edward and the K. of France.

A could never effect. From hence he passeth through Aquitain, and having there taken homage of his Subjects, and set all things in order, he set sail and arrived in England, above a year after the death of his father: a long time for plotting of mischief, and a strong temptation to plotters of mischief, if all causes of quietness had not concurred: but such was the worthiness of Prince Edward's person, and such the undoubtedness of his Title, that as there could be no Competitor, so there would be no oppugner. And indeed the divine Providence had shewed a special care over him from his Childhood: whereof one or two Examples will not be unfit to be related. One was this, that being yet but young, and playing one time at Chess with a friend, in the midst of his game, without any apparent occasion, he removed himself from the place where he sat, when suddenly there fell from the roof of the house a great stone, which if he had stayed in the place but never so little had beaten out his brains. Another example of the divine Providence over him, (though it happened afterwards) was this: Having prepared a great Fleet of ships for a journey into Flanders, and being at Winchelsea, where the ships were to meet; it happened, that riding about the Harbour, his Horse frightened with the noise of a Wind-mill, which the wind drove violently about, s-rambled up and leapt over the Mud-wall of the Town, so as neither the King nor the Horse was to be seen, but every one judged the King could not choose but be thrown and killed: yet such was the divine Providence over him, that the Horse lighted upon his feet, and the King keeping the saddle returned safe. And under the wing of this divine Providence, he had now passed all the dangers of his tedious journey; and being safely come to London, was on the fifteenth day of August in the year 1274. Crowned at Westminster, together with his wife Queen Eleanor, by Robert Kilwarby Archbishop of Canterbury; where five hundred great Horses were let loose, for any that could take them; and yet the outward solemnity was not more great then the inward joy was universal, every man rejoicing, not only at a change, which of it self is pleasing, but at a change so much for the better, as this was like to be.

K. Edward protected by the Divine hand from his childhood.

He is Crowned.

Of his Acts done after he was Crowned.

THE Acts of this King after he was Crowned, may not unfitly be divided into five parts: His Acts with his Temporal Lords; His Acts with his Clergy, Then with Wales; Then his Acts with Scotland; And lastly with France. And first, concerning his Lords, he gave them good contentment in the beginning of his reign by enlarging their liberties, and granting them easier Laws, for which purpose he called a Parliament, wherein were made the Statutes called of Westminster the first; so as he had no difference with them, till toward the end of his reign, as shall be shewed hereafter. In the next place, concerning his Acts with his Clergy, he began with them betimes; for having lived to be of good age, three or four and thirty years old, in his father's reign, he observed in that time, that their power was too predominant, and therefore thought fit to clip their wings, at least to keep them farther from growing; which he did by these means: First, in the 6. year of his reign, he deprived many chief Monasteries of their Liberties, and took from the Abbot and Convent of Westminster, the Return of Writs granted them by the Charter of his father, King Henry the third. The next year after he got to be enacted the Statute of Mortmain, to hinder the increase of their Temporal possessions. In the second Statute of Westminster, he defaulted the Jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Judges; and growing more upon them, he required the moiety of all their goods, as well Temporal as Spiritual, for one year. Then calls he a Parliament of his Nobles at Salisbury, without admission of any Church-men in it: And it is worth the noting, that Marchion his Treasurer, acquainting him that in Churches and Religious houses there was much treasure to be had, if it might be taken; he made no scruple of it, but caused it to be taken and brought into his Exchequer. But finding his Prelates not well contented with it, to please them again, he bids them ask something of him, wherein they should see how much he favoured them. And they asking of him to repeal the Statute of Mortmain, that had been made so much to their hindrance; He answered, that this was a statute made by the whole body of the Realm, and therefore was not in his power, who was but one Member of that Body, to undo that which all the Members together had done; and perhaps whatsoever they should have asked else, he would have had an answer to redeem his offer. And thus much concerning his Clergy.

He gives contentment to his Lords.

He abates the power of the Clergy.

The Statute of Mortmain enacted.

A Parliament without any Clergy men admitted.

The King cannot undo a Statute.

Prince Leolin delays to do his homage.

In the next place are the Welsh, who had themselves begun with the King: For their Prince Leolin being summoned to attend at his Coronation, refused to come; and afterwards at more leisure, being required to come and do his homage, he stood upon terms of safe conduct, pretending doubt to be used, as his father Gryffin had been, who upon hard usage in the Tower, seeking to make escape, fell from the walls and brake his neck. But indeed it was always a custom with this Nation, at every change of Princes in England, to try conclusions, hoping at one time or other to have a day of it, and to change their yoke of bondage into liberty; for which they were never better provided then now; (especially which is the greatest matter in war) having a valiant Prince to their Leader. But there happened an accident which took off their edge at this time: For the Lady Eleanor, a Daughter of the late Earl Simon Montfort, whom Prince Leolin extremely loved, passing out of France into Wales, was by the way upon the Sea taken by English Ships, and brought to King Edward, and for the love of her, Prince Leolin was content to submit himself to any conditions; which besides subjection of his State, was to pay fifty thousand pounds sterling, & a thousand pounds per annum during his life; and upon these condi-

land, whereat the King and Queen were themselves present. Three years Leolin continued loyal, and within the bounds of obedience, in which time David, one of his brothers, staying here in England, and found by the King to be of a stirring spirit, was much honoured by him; Knighted and matched to a rich widow, daughter of the Earl of Derby, and had given him by the King besides, the Castle of Denligh, with a thousand pounds per annum: though, (as it was afterward found) he lived here but in the nature of a spie: For when Prince Leolin's Lady was afterward dead, and that he (contrary to his Conditions formerly made) brake out into rebellion, then goes his brother David to him, notwithstanding all these favours of the King: and they together enter the English Borders, surprize the Castles of Flint and Rutland, with the person of the Lord Clifford, sent Jutliciar into those parts: and in a great Battell overthrew the Earls of Northumberland and Surrey, with the slaughter of Sir William Lindsey, Sir Richard Tanny, and many others. King Edward advertised of this Revolt and overthrow, being then at the Wyche in Wiltshire, prepares an Army to repress it; but before his setting forth, goes privately to his mother Queen Eleanor, lying at the Nunnery of Ainsbury, with whom whilst he conferred, there was one brought into the chamber, who laigned himself (being blind) to have received his sight at the Tomb of K. Henry the third: As soon as the King saw the man, he remembered he had seen him before, & knew him to be a most notorious lying Villain, and wished his mother in no case to believe him: but his mother, who much rejoiced to hear of this Miracle, for the glory of her husband, finding her son unwilling that his father should be a Saint, grew suddenly into such a rage against him, that he commanded him to avoid her chamber: which the King obeys; and going forth, meets with a Clergy-man, to whom he tells the story of this Impostor, and merrily said: He knew the justice of his Father to be such, that he would rather pull out the eyes (being whole) of such a wicked wretch, then restore them to their sight. In this mean time the Archbishop of Canterbury had gone of himself to Prince Leolin, and had laboured to bring him and his brother David to a re-submission, but could effect nothing; for besides other reasons that swayed Prince Leolin, the conceit of a Prophecie of Merlin, that he should shortly be Crowned with the Diadem of Bruce, so overweighed him, that he had no ear for peace, and shortly after no head: for after the Earl of Pembroke had taken Bere Castle, which was the seat of Prince Leolin, he was himself slain in battell; and his head cut off by a common souldier, was sent to King Edward, who caused the same to be crowned with Ivie, and to be set upon the Tower of London; And this was the end of Leolin, the last of the Welsh Princes, betrayed (as some write) by the men of Bnelth. Not long after his Brother David also is taken in Wales, and judged in England to an ignominious death: first drawn at a Horse rail about the City of Shrewsbury, then beheaded, the trunk of his body divided, his heart and bowels burnt, his head sent to accompany his Brothers on the Tower of London, his four quarters to four Cities, Bristol, Northampton, York, and Winchester.
A manifold execution, and the first shewed in that kind to this Kingdom, in the person of the son of a Prince, or any other Noble-man that we read of in our History. It is perhaps something which some here observe, that at the sealing of this conquest, King Edward lost his eldest Son Alphonso, of the age of 12 years, (a Prince of great hope) and had only left to succeed him; his son Edm. rd lately born at Carnarvon, and the first of the English, intituled Prince of Wales, but no Prince worthy of either Wales or England. And thus came Wales to be united to the Crown of England, in the eleventh year of this King Edward's reign; who thereupon established the government thereof, according to the Laws of England, as may be seen by the Statute of Rutland, in the twelfth year of his Reign.

The work of Wales being settled, King Edward passeth over into France, upon notice of the death of Philip the Hardie, to renew and confirm such conditions as his state in those parts required, with the new King Philip the fourth, intituled the Fair; to whom he doth homage for Aquitain, having before quitted his claim to Normandie for ever. After three years and a half, being away in France, he returns into England, and now in the next place comes the business with Scotland, and will hold him work at times as long as he lives, and his son after him. Alexander the third, King of Scots, as he was running his Horse, fell Horse and Man to the ground, and brake his neck, and dyed immediately; by reason whereof (he leaving no issue, but only a daughter of his daughter Margaret, who died also soon after, there fell out presently great contention about succession. Ten Competitors pretend title, namely, Erick King of Norway, Florence Earl of Holland, Robert Bruce Earl of Anandale, John de Baliol Lord of Galloway, John de Hastings Lord of Abergavenny, John Commin Lord of Badenaw, Patrick de Dunbarre Earl of March, John de Vesele, Nicholas de Suies, VVilliam de Ruf; all or most of them descending from David Earl of Huntingdon, younger Brother to VVilliam King of Scots, and great Uncle to the late King Alexander. This title King Edward takes upon him to decide, pretending a Right of Superiority from his Ancestors, over that Kingdom: and proving it by authority of old Chronicles, as Marianns Scottus, VVilliam of Malmisbury, Roger de Hoveden, Henry of Huntingdon, Ralph de Diceto, and others; which though the Scottish Lords who swayed the Inter-regnum opposed, yet are they constrained for avoiding of further inconveniences, to make him Arbitrator thereof, and the ten Competitors bound to stand to his award. Two are especially found, between whom the right lay, John de Baliol Lord of Galloway, and Robert Bruce, the one descended from an elder daughter, the other from a son of a younger daughter of Alan, who had married the eldest daughter of this David brother to King VVilliam: The controversie held long; twelve of either Kingdom learned in the Laws, are elected to debate the same at Bernick; all the best Civilians in the Universities of France are solicited to give their opinions; all which brought forth rather doubts then resolutions: whereupon King Edward the better to sway this business by his presence, takes a journey Northward; where being come as far as Lincolnshire, he lost his beloved wife Queen Eleanor, and thereupon going back to see her Funeral performed at Westminster: that done he returns presently to his Scottish business. And now six years were passed since the death of King Alexander, and yet nothing concluded in this controversie; whereupon King Edward deals privately with Bruce, (who had the weaker title, but the more friends) and promifeth him if he would swear fealty and homage to the Crown of England, he would invest him in that of Scotland. But Bruce answers, he was not so desirous to rule, as thereby to infringe the liberties of his Countrey. Whereupon with the like offer he sets upon Baliol, who having better right, but less love of the people, and more greedy of a Kingdom then honour, accepts the condition; and thereupon is Crowned King at Scone, hath fealty done him by all the chief Nobility, except Bruce: comes to New-Castle upon Tyne, where King Edward then lay; and there with many of his Nobles, swears fealty, and doth homage to him as his Sovereign Lord, which act done to secure him, overthrew him; for being little beloved before, hereby he became less so stood for Bruce, and others of the Nobility (tender of the preservation of their Countreys liberty) took stomach against him; and not only for this, but shortly after for his injustice in the case of the Earl of Fife, one of the six Governors in the time of the Inter-regnum, who had been slain by the Family of Alberneth; the brother of which Earl prosecuting Law before King Baliol, in his high Court of Parliament, and having no right done him (King Baliol giving judgement of the side of the Alberneths) he appeals to the Court of the King of England:

whereupon Baliol is summoned, appears, sits with King Edward in his Parliament, till his cause was to be heard, and then is cited by an Officer to arise, and to stand in the place appointed for pleading; then he craves to answer by a Procurator, but is denied, and thereupon defends to the ordinary place, and defends his cause himself: which indignity (as he took it) so incenseth him, that he returns home with a breast full charged with indignation, meditates revenge, renues the ancient league with France, confirms it with marriage of his son Edward to a daughter of Charles brother to King Philip, glad in regard of late offences taken against the King of England, to embrace the same; which done, Baliol defies King Edward, renounceth his Allegiance, as unlawfully done, being not in his power, without consent of the State to do any such act. Hereupon brake out the mortal dissention between the two Nations, which consumed more Christian blood, and continued longer then ever quarrel we read of did, between any two people in the world. For he that began it, could not end it, but it lasted almost three hundred years; and was never thoroughly abolished, till the late blessed union wrought by him, in whom Wildom and Vertue, Right and Power concurred all to make it firm. And now the fatal Chair in which the Kings of Scotland used to be Inaugurated, seems to recover its secret operation according to ancient Prophecie: that whithersoever that Chair should be removed the Kingdom should be removed with it; and this Chair King Edward caused to be brought out of Scotland to Westminster, and to be placed there amongst the Monuments, where it still continues. But now King Baliol being summoned to appear at New-Castle, and refusing to come; King Edward enters Scotland with an Army consisting of four thousand Horse, and thirty thousand Foot, besides five hundred Horse and one thousand Foot of the Bishop of Durham. Bernick is first won, with the slaughter of fifteen thousand Scots; (our Writers say more) and after that, the Castles of Dunbar, Roxborough, Edenburgh, Sterling, and Saint Johns Town: and King Baliol sues for Peace, submits himself, takes again his Oath of Fealty to King Edward, as his Sovereign Lord: which done, a Parliament for Scotland is held at Bernick, where the Nobility likewise did homage to him, confirming the same by their Charter, under their hand and seals; only William Douglas refuseth, content rather to endure the misery of a Prison, then yield to the subjection of the King of England. But King Baliol, notwithstanding his submission, is sent Prisoner into England after his four years Reign in Scotland; and King Edward returns home, leaving John Warren Earl of Suffex & Surrey, Warden of all Scotland; Hugh Cressingham Treasurer, and Ormestey Chief Justice, with Commission to take in his name, the Homages and Fealties of all such as held lands of that Crown. But this continued not long, for King Edward being absent in France, the Scots fell upon the Officers he had left; slew Sir Hugh Cressingham with six thousand English, recovered many Castles, and regained the Town of Bernick, and all by the animation and conduct of one William Wallace, a poor private Gentleman, (though Nobly descended) who seeing his Countrey without a Head, and thereby without a Heart (all the great men, either in captivity, or subjection) assemblies certain of as poor and desperate estate as himself, and leads them to attempt upon whatsoever advantages they could find to annoy the English: and having therein good success it so increased both his courage, and company, that he afterward came to be the general Guardian of the whole Kingdom; and was in possibility to have absolutely redeemed his Countrey from the subjection of the English, if the speedy coming of King Edward had not prevented him.
For now King Edward, to bring his work near together, removes his Exchequer and Courts of Justice to York, where they continued above six years; and thither he calls a Parliament, requiring all his subjects that held of him by Knights service, to be ready at Roxborough by a peremptory day: where there assembled three thousand men at Arms on barded horses, and four thousand other armed men on horse without bards, with an Army of Foot answerable, consisting most of Welsh and Irish, besides five hundred men at Arms out of Gascon; and with his power he makes his second expedition into Scotland: the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, with the Earl of Lincoln, led his Vauit-guard at the famous battle of Fonkirk, where the shouts of the Scots were so great, that King Edwards horse frightened withall, cast him off, and brake two of his ribs; which notwithstanding he gets up again, goes on, and gets victory; wherein are reported to be slain two hundred Knights, and forty thousand foot of the Scots: but William Wallace, with some few, escaped to make more work. And here again that Kingdom might seem as if quite overthrow. Most of the estates of the Earls and Barons of Scotland (with their titles) that had stood out, were bestowed on the English; and a Parliament is called at Saint Andrews, where all the great men of that Kingdom, except only Wallace, once again swear Fealty to the King of England. It seems swearing of Fealty was with the Scots but a ceremony without substance, as good as nothing: for this is now the third time they swore Fealty to King Edward; yet all did not serve to make them loyal: for not long after, comes the news of a new King made and Crowned in Scotland, Robert Bruce Earl of Carrick, son to that Bruce who was competitor with Baliol, escaping out of England, becomes Head to the confused Body of that Kingdom: and perceiving John Cummin (who had a title himself) to go about to bewray his intentions to King Edward; he finding him at Dunfrays, sets upon him and murders him in the Church. Whereof as soon as King Edward heard, he sends Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, and the Lords Clifford and Percy, with a strong power to revenge the death of Cummin, and to relieve his Wardens of Scotland; who upon Bruces revolt, were all retired to Berwick, whilst himself prepares an Army to follow: wherein to be the more nobly attended, he caused Proclamation to be made, that whosoever ought by their Paternal succession, or otherwise had means of their own for service, should repair to Westminster, at the feast of Pentecost, to receive the Order of Knighthood, and a Military ornament out of the Kings Wardrobe. Hereupon three hundred young Gentlemen, all the sons of Earls, Barons, and Knights, assemble at the day appointed, and receive Purples, Silks, Sindons, Scarfs, wrought with gold or silver, according to every mans estate: For which train (because the Kings house was too little, by reason a part of it had been lately burnt) room is made, and the Apple trees cut down at the new Temple for their Tents, where they attire themselves, and keep their Vigile. The Prince (whom the King then likewise knighted, and gave him the Dutchy of Aquitaine) kept his Vigile with his Train at Westminster, and the next day he girded these three hundred Knights with the Military Belt, in such manner as he himself had received it. Which done, the King before them all, makes a Vow, that alive or dead, he would revenge the death of Cummin upon Bruce, and the perjured Scots: Adjuring his son and all the Nobles about him, upon their Fealty, that if he died in this journey, they should carry his corpse with them about Scotland, and not suffer it to be interred, till they had vanquished the Usurper, and absolutely brought the Countrey to subjection. The Prince and all the Nobles promise upon their faith, to employ their utmost power to perform his Vow: and herewithall he sets forth with a potent Army, presently after Whitson-tide, and makes his last expedition into Scotland, in the four and thirtieth year of his reign; at which time he made above two hundred Knights.

The Earl of Pembroke, with that power sent before, and aid of the Scottish party, had before the King arrived in Scotland, defeated in a battle near S. John's Town, the whole Army of the new King, and narrowly missed the taking of his Person, but he escaping in disguise, and thrusting himself in obscure places, was reserved for greater battles, his brothers Nigel, Bruce, and shortly after, Thomas, and Alexander a Priett, were taken and Executed after the manner of Traytors at Berwick. And now King Edward had done for fighting, all was now for Executions; and indeed his desire of revenge made him inexorable, and vow to spare none of what degree soever. The Earl of Athol, (though of Royal blood, and allied unto him) was sent to London, where all his preferment was, to have a higher pair of Gallows then the rest. The wife of Robert Bruce, taken by the Lord Rosse, is sent prisoner to London and his daughter to a Monastery in Lindsey. The Countess of Boughan, who had been aiding at Bruces Coronation, is put into a wooden Cage, and hung out upon the wall of Barnwick for people to gaze on. But though Bruces party was thus defeated, and himself at this time appeared not, but shifted privily from place to place in a distressed manner, (attended only with two Noble Gentlemen, who never forsook him in his misfortunes, the Earl of Lennox and Gilbert Hay) yet gives he not over, but gathers new Forces, with which he suddenly assails the Earl of Pembroke at unawares, gives him a great defeat, and within three daies after chaseth the Earl of Gloucester, into the Castle of Aire, where he belieged him, till by the Kings forces he was driven again to his former retire. Whereupon King Edward, who had spent his Winter at Carlisle, in July following, with a fresh Army enters Scotland himself, but falling into a Dysentery or Bloudy flux at Borough upon the Sands he ended his life: and thus ended King Edwards troubles with Scotland, but not Englands troubles, which are more to come then yet are past.

But though this business of Scotland never left King Edward till his dying day, yet it had been upon him but as an ague, sometime putting him into violent heats, and sometimes leaving him in a quiet temper with such a vicissitude, that when he had quietness with Scotland, he had troubles with France, whereof the time is now to speak. It is well known that Philip King of France, father of the present King, and Edward King of England were near Cousins, the sons of two sisters, and it hath been shewed before at King Edwards returning from the Holy Land, and passing through France, what extraordinary kindness and mutual courtesie, passed between them; that

A that one would have thought neither they nor theirs should ever have fallen out; and perhaps never should, if they had been private men, and not Princes; For private men may easily continue friends, as having none to consider but themselves; but Princes hardly, as having besides themselves, their Subjects to consider. And though they be the Subjects oftentimes that make the quarrel, yet they are the Princes that must maintain it. And besides, between Princes, there can never be but jealousies, and where jealousies are, every trifle makes a quarrel. And this was the case of these two Kings. Certain of the King of Englands Subjects had upon the Coast of Normandy, done spoil to some Subjects of the King of France: and this difference of the Subjects made a difference between the Kings, while each of them standing in defence of his own, fall out themselves; and for a beginning the King of France summons King Edward, as owing homage to that Crown, to appear and answer it in his Court; And King Edward, though voluntarily before he had done it in a way of courtesie, yet being now imperiously commanded, he refuseth it; upon which refusal, all his Territories in France are condemned to be forfeited, and an Army is presently sent to seize upon the same, led by Charles de Valois, and Arnold de Neel, Constable of France. Burdeaux; with divers other Pieces of importance, are taken from him. And now King Edward well knowing what danger it was to have so powerful an adversary, endeavours first to strengthen himself with friends abroad, seeks to match his son Edward with a daughter of Guy Earl of Flanders; Marries one of his daughters to the Duke of Barre, who pretended title to Champagne; another to John Duke of Brabant: sends fifteen thousand pound sterling to Adolph de Nassau the Emperour, for recovery of certain Lands which he claimed in France; and withall these and many other confining Princes, he sets upon the King of France, and then sends over his brother Edmund Earl of Lancaster, the Earls of Lincoln, and Richmond, with eight and twenty Banners, seven hundred men at Arms, and a Navie of three hundred and sixty sail. In the mean time the King of France having had intelligence of the intended alliance between King Edward, and Guy Earl of Flanders, sends for the said Earl (as if knowing nothing thereof) to come with his wife and daughter, to make merry with him at Paris: where instead of feasting him, he makes him Prisoner, and takes from him his daughter, in regard he sought (being his Vassal) to match her with his capital Enemy. The Earl excuseth it the best he could; and by much mediation is released himself, but not his daughter; whereupon the Earl, presuming upon aid from King Edward, takes Arms and defies the King of France; who thereupon comes with an Army of sixty thousand against him: which caused King Edward with all speed possibly to relieve this distressed Earl, and so leaving the Government of the Kingdom in his absence, to the Bishop of London, the Earl of Warwick, and the Lords Raynold Gray, and Clifford; with five hundred sail, and eighteenthousand men at Arms he passeth over into France, but finding the Countrey distracted into many popular factions, and the King of France daily getting upon them, (having already won Lille, Douay, Courtray, Barges, and Dam) and the Emperour Adolph failing to send him aid as he had promised, he fell into great perplexity; and having stayed the whole Winter at Gaunt, where by reason of many outrages committed by his souldiers, he was so affronted by the Gauntes, that his own person was not without some danger; he thereupon in the Spring of the year, concludes a Truce with the King of France for two years, takes his sister Margaret to Wife, and affianceth the daughter of the same King to his son Prince Edward, and so returns into England. And these were all the troubles King Edward had with France.

But now must something be spoken of the troubles with his Lords at home, whereof this was the beginning: In a Parliament at Salisbury, the five and twentieth year of his reign, the King requires certain of his Lords to go to the wars in Gascon; which needed a present supply, by reason of the death of his brother Edmund; but the Lords make all their excuses, every man for himself. Whereupon the King in great rage threatned, they should either go, or he would give their Lands to others that should: Upon this Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, High Constable, and Roger Bigod Earl of Norfolk, Marshall of England, make their Declaration, that if the King went in person they would attend him; otherwise not. Which answer offended the King more, and being urged again, the Earl Marshall protested he would willingly go thither with the King, and march before him in the Vauit-guard, as by right of inheritance he ought to do; But the King told him plainly, he should go with any other, though he were not himself in person. I am not so bound (saith the Earl) neither will I take that Journey without you. The King swore, by God, Sir Earl, you shall either go or hang: And I swear by the same oath (saith the Earl) I will neither go nor hang; and so without leave departs. Shortly after the two Earls assemble many Noble men, and other their friends, to the number of thirty Banners, so as they were fifteen hundred men at Arms, well appointed, and stood upon their guard. The King like a prudent Prince, who knew his times, prosecutes them not as then, but lets the matter pass, in regard that his business called him presently into Flanders; when being ready to take ship, the Archbishopps, Bishops, Earls, Barons, and the Commons send him a Roll of the grievances of his Subjects, concerning his Taxes, Subsidies, and other Impositions, with his seeking to force their services by unlawful courses: to which the King sends answer, that he could not alter any thing without the advice of his Counsel, who were not now about him; and therefore required them, seeing they would not attend him in his journey, (which they absolutely refused to do, though he went in Person, unless he had gone into France or Scotland) that they would yet do nothing in his absence prejudicial to the peace of the Kingdom; and that at his return, he would set all things in good order to their contentment. But having taken his journey, and being held held there with long delays, to his exceeding great expenses, he was forced to send over for a more supply of Treasure; and thereupon gave order for a Parliament to be held at York by the Prince, and (because of his Minority, for he was then but sixteen years of age) by such as had the managing of the Kingdom in his absence: and to the end he would not be disappointed of aid, he condescends to all such Articles as were demanded, concerning the great Charter: Promising from thenceforth never to charge his subjects otherwise then by their consents in Parliaments, and to pardon all such as had denied to attend him in this Journey. After this, in the 27 year of his reign, a Parliament is called at Westminster, wherein the promised confirmation of the two Charters, and the allowance of what disafforestation had heretofore been made, was earnestly urged, and in the end with much ado granted; and that with omission of the clause, Salvo Jure Corona nostra: which the King laboured to have inserted, but the people by no means would agree, and the perambulation of the Forests of England was then committed to three Bishops, three Earls, and three Barons. But some years after, in the two and thirtieth year of his reign, King Edward begun to shew his resentment of the stubborn behaviour of his Nobles towards him in times past; and so terrifies Roger Bigod, Earl Marshall, that to recover his favour the Earl made him his Heir, in possession; (though he had a Brother of his own living) referring only to himself a thousand pounds per annum, during his life. Of others likewise he got ving only to himself a thousand pounds per annum, during his life. Of others likewise he got great sums for the same offence; The Earl of Hereford escaped his fine by death. But the Archbishop of Canterbury, (whom he accused to have disturbed his Peace in his absence) he sends over to Pope Clement the fifth, (who succeeded Boniface) that he might be crusht with a double power. This Pope was Native of Burdeaux, and so the more regardful of the Kings desire, and the King the more confident of his favour; which to entertain and increase, King Edward sends him a whole furnish of all vessels for his Chamber of clean gold: which great gift wrought with the Pope, that he untied the King from the Covenant made with his subjects concerning their Charters, confirmed unto them by his last three Acts of Parliament, and absolved him from his Oath: A safe time for Princes, when they might tie themselves to any Obligation to their subjects, and afterward for a bribe to the Pope he untied again.

His Taxations, and waies for raising of money.

IF Taxations may suffer degrees of comparison, it may not unfitly be said of these last Kings, that King John was in the Positive; his son Henry the third, in the Comparative; and this King Edward in the Superlative. For not only he far exceeded the two former, but he hath left a spell to all that come after, for ever coming near him: but then under the name of Taxations, we must include the waies he took for raising of profit. But first in the way of Parliament. In the first year of his reign, was granted him a tenth of the Clergy for two years, besides a fifteenth of them and the Temporality. In his fifth year, a twentieth of their goods towards the Welsh wars: In his seventh, the old money was called in, and new coined, in regard it had been much devalued by the Jews; for which 297 were at one time executed in London: and this brought in profit of no small value. In his eleventh year, he had a thirtieth of the Temporality, and a twentieth of the Clergy, for his wars in Wales. In the thirteenth, Escheage, forty shillings of every Knights Fee. In his fourteenth year he had a thousand Marks of certain Merchants fined for false weights. In his nineteenth, William Marchion then Lord Treasurer of England, perceiving great riches to be in Churches and religious houses, put it so into the Kings head, that they were all brought into the Kings Treasury. In the eight year of his reign, he sent out his Writ Quo Warranto, to examine by what title men held their lauds; which brought him in much money, till John Earl of Warren, being called to shew his title, drew out an old rusty sword, and then said, he held his land by that, and by that would hold it to death; which though it made the King desist from his project, yet he obtained at that time a fifteenth part of the Clergy. In his seventeenth year he fined all his Judges for corruption: Sir Ralph Higham Chief Justice of the higher Bench, in seven thousand Marks: Sir John Loveton Justice of the lower Bench, in three thousand Marks: Sir William Brompton, in six thousand Marks: Sir Salomon Rochester, in four thousand Marks: Sir Richard Boyland, in four thousand: Sir Walter Hopton, in two thousand: Sir William Saham, in three thousand: Robert Lithbury Master of the Rolls, in one thousand: Roger Leycester, in one thousand: Henry Bray Escheator, and Judge for the Jews, in one thousand: but Sir Adam Stratton chief Baron of the Exchequer, in four and thirty thousand: and Thomas Wyland (found the greatest Delinquent, and of the greatest substance) had all his goods and whole estate confiscated to the King; and himself banished out of the Kingdom. In his eighteenth year he banished the Jews; of whom there was at that time above fifteen thousand in the Kingdom, who had all their goods confiscate, leaving them only means to bear their charges in going away.

In his four and twentieth year, he commanded a Subsidy to be levied upon all farplars of Wool going out of England: as likewise with Fels and Hides. In his five and twentieth year, he calls a Parliament at S. Edmundsbury, where is granted the eight part of the goods of good Towns, and all other people the twelfth. As for the Clergy they desire to be excused, and refuse to contribute, in regard of their many late payments; as in the two and twentieth year of his reign, they

He banisheth the Jews.

A payed the moiety of their goods: and in his three and twentieth year, he seized into his hands, all Priors, aliens and their goods: besides he had a loan of the Clergy, which amounted to a hundred thousand pounds: but notwithstanding upon this refusal of the Clergy, the Kings puts all Clergy men out of his protection, whereby they were to have no Justice in any of his Courts; a strain of State beyond any of his Predecessours) which so amazed them, that in the end, the Archbishop of York, with the Bishops of Durham, Ely, Salisbury, and Lincoln, yielded to lay down in their Churches, the fifth part of all their goods towards the maintenance of the Kings wars; whereby they appeased his wrath, and were received into grace. But the Archbishop of Canterbury, by whose animation the rest stood out, had all his goods seized on, and all the Monasteries within his Diocese, taken into the Kings hands, and Wardens appointed to minister only necessities to the Monks, converting the rest to the Kings use: at length by much suit, the Abbots and Priests giving the fourth part of their goods, redeem themselves, and the Kings favour. In the six and twentieth year of his reign, at a Parliament holden at York, is granted him the ninth penny of the goods of the Temporality: the tenth penny of the Clergy of the Diocese of Canterbury, and of York the fifth; and in this year also he raised the Imposition upon every sack of Wool, from a Noble to forty shillings. In his two and thirtieth year he sends out a new Writ of Inquisition, called Trailbaston, for intruders on other mens lands; who to oppress the right owner, would make over their land to great men; for Batters hired to beat men, for Breakers of Peace, for Ravishers, Incendiaries, Murderers, Fighters, false Assisors and other such Malefactors: which Inquisition was so strictly executed, and such Fines taken, that it brought in exceeding much treasure to the King. As likewise did another Commission at the same time, sent forth to examine the behaviour of Officers, and Ministers of Justice; wherein many were found Delinquents, and paid dearly for it. At this time also he called his Lords to account for their stubbornness some years before, in denying to attend him into Flanders; which brought him in profit answerable to their greatness that were called. After all this, in his four and thirtieth year, there is granted him the thirtieth penny of both Clergy and Laity, and the twentieth of all Merchants towards his journey into Scotland. And this may be sufficient to shew his taxations to have been in the superlative degree. And yet besides these, he had no small benefit by silver Mines; which in his time were found in Devonshire.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN the first year of his reign were made the Statutes called of Westminster the first. In his twelfth year were made the Statutes of Alton Burnell. In the fourteenth year of his reign were made Statutes called Additamenta Gloucestric. He ordained such men to be Sheriffs in every County, as were of the same County where they were to be Sheriffs. He ordained that Jews should wear a cognizance upon their upper garment whereby to be known, and restrained their excessive taking of Usury. In his time was also Enacted the Statute of Mortmain. In his twelfth year, in the Quindenes of Saint Michael, the Justices Itinerants began to go their general Circuits. In his time new pieces of money were coined, and half pence of silver came to be in use, which were before of base metal. In his time, three men for rescuing a Prisoner, arrested by an Officer, had their right hands cut off by the writs. In his time all Jews were banished out of the Realm. This King by Proclamation prohibited the burning of Sea-coal in London and the Suburbs, for avoiding the noisome smoak. In his eleventh year the Bakers of London were first drawn upon Hurdles, by Henry VValeys Maior, and Corn was then first sold by weight. In this Kings time the title of Baron which had before been promiscuous to men of estate, was first confined to such only as by the King were called to have voyce in Parliament. In the sixth year of this King, Michaelmas term was kept at Shrewsbury. In his twelfth, he divided VVales into Shires, and ordained Sheriffs there as are used in England.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN his time, at a Synod holden at Reading by the Archbishop of Canterbury, it was ordained according to the Constitutions of the General Council, that no Ecclesiastical person should have more then one Benefice, to whom belonged the Cure of souls: and that every person promoted to any Ecclesiastical living, should take the order of Priesthood within one year after. In his time lived and dyed Pope Boniface the 8. of whom his Predecessour had prophesied: Ascendes ut Vulpes, regnabis ut Lys, morieris ut Canis.

No Ecclesiastical person to have more then one Benefice.

In his time John Baliol King of Scots, builded Balioll Colledge in Oxford: also in his time, Walter Merton Lord Chancellor of England, and after Bishop of Rochester, founded Merton Colledge in Oxford, who was drowned passing over the water at Rochester, being at that time no Bridge there, as now there is. In his time was finished the new work of the Church of Westminster, which had been three score and six years in building. In his time was laid the foundation of the Black Friars besides Langgate by Robert Kilwarbie Archbishop of Canterbury, and of Baynards Castle also in his time, his second wife Queen Margaret began to build the Quire of the Gray Friars in London. In his time was begun to be made the great Conduit in London, standing against the Church called Arces in Cheap. In his time Henry Wallweys, Mayor of London, caused the Ton upon Cornhill, to be a Prison for night-walkers: and also builded a house called the Stocks, for a Market of fish and flesh, in the middle of the City. In this Kings time, Edmund Earl of Leicester, the Kings brother, founded the Minories, a Nunnery without Algate. This King builded the Castle of Flink in Wales, and the Castle of Beaumaris in the Isle of Anglesey, and the Castle of Carnarvan by Snowdon. Also in this Kings time, John Peckham Archbishop of Canterbury, founded a Colledge of Canons at Vvingham in Kent.

Casualties happening in his time.

A rot of sheep five and twenty years together, and how caused.

IN the second year of this Kings reign, there happened the greatest rot of Sheep in England that ever was known, which continued five and twenty years; and came (as was thought) by one infected sheep of incredible greatness, brought out of Spain by a French Merchant into Northumberland. In the fifteenth year of this Kings reign, Wheat was sold for ten groats a quarter; where the next year after there was so great a dearth, that it was sold for eighteen pence the bushel. In the seventeenth year of his reign, there fell so much rain, that Wheat was raised from three pence the bushel, to sixteen pence; and so increased yearly, till at last it was sold for twenty shillings the Quarter. And this year the City of Carlisle, and the Abbey with all the Houses belonging to the Fryers Minors: was consumed with fire. In his one and twentieth year, a great part of the Town of Cambridge, with the Church of our Lady was also burnt. In the seven and twentieth year of his reign, his Palace at Westminster, and the Monastery adjoining, were consumed with fire. The Monastery of Glocester also was burnt to the ground. In this year also an Act of Common-Council by consent of the King, was made concerning victuals; a fat cock to be sold for three half pence, two Pullers for three half pence, a fat Capon for two pence half penny, a Goose four pence, a Mallard three half pence, a Partridge three half pence, a Pheasant four pence, a Heron six pence, a Plover one penny, a Swan three shillings, a Crane twelve pence, two Woodcocks three half pence, a fat Lamb from Christmas to Shrovetide, sixteen pence, and all the year after for four pence; and Wheat was this year so plentiful, that a quarter was sold for ten groats. In his sixteenth year it chanced in Gascogne, that as the King and Queen sat in their chamber, upon a bed talking together, a Thunderbolt coming in at the window behinde them, passed betwixt them, and flew two of their Gentlemen, that stood before them.

Of his Wives and Children.

Monuments ordained in memory of
or*.

HE had two Wives, his first was Eleanor daughter to Ferdinand the third King of Spain; and was married to him at Bures in Spain: who having lived with him six and thirty years, in a journey with him towards Scotland, at Herdely in Lincolnshire she dyed; in whose memory, and as monuments of her vertue, and his affection, King Edward caused Crosses with her Statute, to be erected in all chief places; where her Corps in carrying to Westminster, rested: as at Stamford, Dunstable, Saint Albans, Waltham, Cheapside; and lastly, at the place called Charing-Cross: she was buried in Westminster, at the feet of King Henry the third, under a fair Marble Tomb, adorned with her Portraiture of Copper gilt. By this wife King Edward had four sons and nine daughters; his eldest son, John; his second, Henry; his third, Alphonfus; dyed all young in their Fathers time: his fourth son, Edward, called of Carnarvan, because born there, succeeded him in the Kingdom. Of his daughters, the eldest named Eleanor, was first married by Proxy to Alphonfus, King of Aragon; but he dying before the marriage solemnized, she was afterward married at Bristol to Henry Earl of Bary in France; by whom she had issue, sons and daughters. Joan the second daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, born at Acon in the Holy-Land, and thereof called Joan de Acres, was married to Gilbert Clare, called the Red Earl of Glocester and Hareford, by whom she had issue, sons and daughters. She survived her husband, and was re-married to the Lord Ralph Monthermer, Father to Margaret the Mother of Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, from whom the now Vicount Montacute is descended. Margaret the third daughter of King Edward and Queen Eleanor, was married to John Duke of Brabant: Berenger and Alice, their fourth and fifth daughters, dying young and unmarried. Mary their sixth daughter, at ten years of her age, was made a Nun in the Monastery of Aimsbury in Wiltshire, at the instance of Queen Eleanor her Grandmother, who lived there. Elizabeth their seventh daughter, was first married to John Earl of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Friesland; he dying within two years, she was afterward married to Thomaspri Bohun Earl of Hereford and Essex, Lord of Brcknock, and High Constable of England, by whom she had issue, sons and daughters. Beatrice and Blanch, their eighth and ninth daughters, died young and unmarried. King Edwards second wife was Margaret, eldest daughter of

A of Philip King of France, called the Hardy, and sister to Philip called the Fair; at eighteen years old she was married to King Edward, being above three score; yet at these unequal years she had issue by him, two sons and a daughter: their eldest son was born at a little Village in Yorkshire called Brotherton, and was thereof called Thomas of Brotherton: he was created Earl of Norfolk, and Earl Marshal of England, after Roger Bigod, who died without issue. Their second son Edmund, was born at Woodstock in Oxfordshire, and of the place was so called: he was created Earl of Kent, and married Margaret Daughter of John, and sister and sole Heir of Thomas Lord Wake of Lyddell in the County of Northampton; by whom he had issue two sons and one daughter: his sons Edmund and John died without issue; his daughter Joan for her beauty called the Fair maid of Kent, was married first to William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, and from him divorced, was remarried to Sir Thomas Holland, in her Right Earl of Kent, and Father of Thomas and John Holland, Duke of Surrey, and Earl of Huntington: and lastly, she was the Wife of Edward of Woodstock, the Black Prince of Wales; and by him Mother of King Richard the second. This Earl Edmund was beheaded at Winchester, in the fourth year of King Edward his Nephew. Eleanor the daughter of King Edward by his second wife Margaret, died in her childhood.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was tall of stature, higher then ordinary men by head and shoulders, and thereof called Longshank; of a swarthy complexion, strong of body, but lean; of a comely favour; his eyes in his anger, sparkling like fire; the hair of his head black and curled. Concerning his conditions, as he was in War Peaceful; so in Peace he was warlike, delighting specially in that kind of hunting, which is to kill Stagges or other wild Beasts with Spears. In continency of life, he was equal to his Father; in acts of valour, far beyond him. He had in him the two wisdoms, not often found in any, single; both together, seldom or never: An ability of judgment in himself, and a readines to hear the judgment of others. He seemed to be a great observer of opportunity (a great point of wisdom in any, in Princes greatest) and that he could bear an injury long, without seeking to revenge it; as appeared by his carriage toward the Earl Roger Bigod, whom when he saw his time, he called to account for an affront he had offered him divers years before. He was not easily provoked into passion, but once in passion, not easily appeased; as was seen by his dealing with the Scots; towards whom he shewed at first patience, and at last severity. If he be censured for his many Taxations, he may be justified by his well bestowing them; for never Prince laid out his money to more honour of himself, or good of his Kingdom. His greatest unfortunateness was in his greatest blessing; for of four sons which he had by his Wife Queen Eleanor, three of them died in his own life time, who were worthy to have out-lived him; and the fourth out-lived him, who was worthy never to have been born.

King Edward called Longshank; and why;

Of his Death and Burial.

IN his last expedition into Scotland, being at Carlisle, he fell sick; and lying in his death bed, he sent for his son Edward: to whom, besides many admonitions to piety; he commended three things specially; that he should carry his bones about with him through Scotland till he had subdued it: that he should send his heart into the Holy-Land, with seven score Knights to that war, and the two and thirty thousand pounds, he had provided for that purpose; and that he should never recal Gawston from banishment: and soon after of a dysentery or Bloudy-Flux he died at Borough upon the Sands, the seventh of July, in the year 1307. when he had reigned four and thirty years and seven moneths, lived three score and eight years: Being dead, his Corps was brought to Waltham Abbey, and there kept the space of sixteen weeks, and after on Simon and Judes day buried at Westminster.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF KING EDWARD THE SECOND.

Of his A&amp;ts before, and at his Coronation.

Edward of Carnarvan, eldest son of King Edward the first, succeeded him in the Kingdom, and never did Prince come to a Crown with more applause of Nobility and People; and there was good cause for it; for he had been trained up in all good courtes for Piety and Learning; he had seen the Government of his Father, from whose Example he could not but have learned many good Lessons; he had been initiated in the ways of State, having been left Governour of the Realm, and presiding in Parliament in his Fathers absence; and he was now three and twenty years old, a fit age for bearing the weight of a Scepter; and yet for all these advantages, there wanted not fears of him in the minds of many, who could not but remember, what pranks he had played not long before; how he had broken the Bishop of Cheshers Park, and in most disorderly manner had killed his Deer, for which both himself had been committed to Prison, and his friend Pierce Gaveston banished the Realm: and if he did such things being but Prince, what might not be feared of him coming to be King? For seldom doth advancement in honour alter men to the better; to the worse often, and commonly then when it is joyned with an authority that sets them above controullment. Neither yet was their fear more out of what they had seen, then out of what they saw; for where he should have endeavoured to accomplish the charge his Father had given him on his death-bed, he seemed to intend nothing less, nothing more then wholly to break it; for he presently called home Pierce Gaveston from banishment: and either all or the most of it, he bestowed upon Gaveston: and for carrying his Fathers bones with him about Scotland; it had been well if he had suffered them quietly to be laid at rest in England; for after the Corps had been kept above ground, sixteen weeks in the Abbey of Waltham, and that the Bishop of Cheshere, Walter Langton, the then Lord Treasurer, and Executor of his Fathers Will, was busie in preparing for his Funeral: he sent the Constable of the Tower to arrest him, and imprison him at Wallingford, seiling upon all his Goods, and giving them to Gaveston; and all for old grudges. And (that which seemed a high strain of incongruity) before he had seen performed his Fathers Funerals, which was not till the 27. of October following, he entered into a Treaty of his own Nuptials: for going over to Bolovigne, on the two and twentieth of January, he married Isabel, the Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France: which marriage was honoured with the presence of four Kings, the King of France himself, the King of Norwre his son, the King of the Romans, and the King of Sicilie: and three Queens besides the Bride, Mary Queen of France, Margaret the Dowager Queen of England, and the Queen of Norwre: and yet did Gaveston exceed them all in braverie. This was observed by the Lords of England: and thereupon when his Queen and he came afterward to be Crowned, they went unto him, signifying what a hainous transgression of his Fathers will it was to call home Gaveston; and seeing the charge was no less given to them then to him, if he did not perform it they would, and therefore unless he would remove Gaveston from the

the Court and Kingdom, they would hinder his Coronation from proceeding, which struck such a damp to Prince Edward's spirits, to think what a disgrace it would be to him, if so many of his great friends being present, Charles of Valois the King of France's Brother, the Dukes of Brittain and Brabant, the Count of Luxemburg, who was afterward Emperor, the Duke of Savoy, the two Duchesses of Brabant and Artois, with many other Princes and great Ladies, if now his Coronation should be called in question, that he solemnly swore he would do what they desired in the next Parliament, so they would be quiet now; and thereupon on the 24. day of February, in the year 1307. his Queen and he were both Crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Henry Bishop of Winchester, by Commission from Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, being then in exile and out of the Kingdom: At which solemnity there was so great a press of people, that Sir John Blackwell Knight was crowded to death. And now in the very act of his Coronation, there was given another provocation to the Lords against Gaveston: for the King had appointed him to carry the Crown of Saint Edward before him, (the greatest honour could be done to a subject) which added to the other honours the King had done him, (for he had made him Earl of Cornwall, Lord of Man, and Lord Chamberlain) so incensed the Lords, that they entered into consultation how to suppress this violence of the King's affection; which shortly after they put in execution. Portion in money, King Edward had none with his Wife: but the King of France gave him the Duchy of Guyenne, which he had seized upon before, as confiscate to him: and thereupon King Edward did him Homage for that Duchy, and for the County of Ponthieu.

Of his differences with his Lords about Gaveston.

WE shall have here no Quinquennium Neronis, no such five years, as Nero afforded in the beginning of his Reign; but this King at his first entrance will shew what he is, and what he will continue to be as long as he lives; for though he took some great and grave men to be of his Council, yet (as appeared afterward) he did it rather to the end they should be pliant to him, than that he had any meaning to apply himself to them; For let them say what they would, Gaveston must be the Oracle; all the Kings actions were but Gaveston's impressions: And now Gaveston presently after the Coronation, to let the world be a witness of his worthiness, and that the King had not bestowed his Favours upon him without cause; caused to be published a Tournament at Wallingford: whither came all the great Lords of the Kingdom, as Thomas Earl of Lancaster, Humphrey Earl of Hereford, Amyer Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Warren, with many others, all Valiant men at Arms; yet none had the honour of the day like to Gaveston. And thus far he did well, if he could have stayed here, if having gotten true glory, he had not fallen into vain-glory: For the Lords envied him not so much for his advancement in honours, as they hated him for his infolency in Manners: for in a scornful pride he would be calling scoffs upon them all, calling Thomas Earl of Lancaster, the Stage-player; the Earl of Lincoln Burthen-belly; Amyer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, Joseph the Jew, and Guy Earl of Warwick the black Dog of Artois; which scoffs together with his other infolencies, drew such a party upon him, that in the next Parliament, the whole Assembly obtains of the King to draw Articles of their grievances: of which the chief were, that the great Charter of Magna Charta should be observed; that all strangers should be banished the Court and Kingdom; that the business of the State should be treated of by the Counsel of the Clergy and the Nobles; and that the King should not begin any War, nor go out of the Kingdom without consent of Parliament. Which Articles though seeming harsh to the King, yet for avoiding of further inconvenience, he yields unto them; and specially to the banishment of his minion Gaveston, as hoping that would excuse him from exile, pronounceth excommunication against all such as should oppose the Articles. Hereupon Gaveston is sent away into Ireland, where he lived a while, not as a banished man, but as Lieutenant rather of the Country, and indeed not unworthily; for in the time of his being there, he is said to have made a journey into the Mountains of Dublin, and to have broken and subdued the Rebels there; built New-Castle in the Kerns Country, repaired the Castle of Keryn, and passed up to Monster and Thomond; performing every where much service, with great valour and worthiness, that if he had stayed there but a while longer, he might perhaps by his deserts in Ireland have redeemed his defects in England: but the King impatient of his absence, and asking advice what means might be used to recal him; It was told him, that if he could but match him with the Earl of Glocester's sister, a man of such greatness, and so greatly beloved of the people, for his sake certainly no man would grudge at his coming home. Hereupon the King sends for Gaveston, and makes up the Match between them, and married they were at Barkinsfold; but this did no good; for Gaveston still working upon the King in such manner, that he scarce left him means to sustain himself, and as little to maintain the Queen; nothing being done, but as Gaveston would have it; put the Lords into a new discontentment; who thereupon went again to the King and told him plainly, that unless he would put Gaveston out of the Court and Kingdom, they would rise up in arms against him as a perjured King. This put the King into a great strait: loath he was to leave Gaveston, and fearful he was to provoke the Lords; in the end his fear prevailing over his love, he was content he should be banished, and in such sort banished, that if ever he returned, or were found in the Kingdom, he should be held and proceeded against as an enemy of the

A the State. So once again is Gaveston sent packing out of the Kingdom, and goes into France, but found no safe harbouring there: For the King of France hearing of it, gave a strait charge, if he were found in his Dominions to apprehend him: Then he passeth into Flanders, but is no farther there than in France: After waving about, and finding no place to rest in safety, he returns secretly into England, relying upon the Kings love, and the Duke of Glocester's favour. The King receives him as an Angel sent from Heaven, and to be out of the Lords eye, goes a journey to Turk, taking Gaveston along with him, and there thinks to be in quiet; but the Lords hearing of it follow him thither, chusing for their General Thomas Earl of Lancaster, a man posselt of five Earldoms, Lancaster, Leicester, Ferrers, Lincoln, and Salisbury; besides the Liberties of Pickering, and the honour of Cockermere, and other Lands in Wales, and there was not a man of the whole Nobility that was not of the Party, but only Gilbert Earl of Glocester, the Kings sisters Son; These Lords sent to the King, either to deliver Gaveston into their hands, or at least to send him peremptorily out of the Kingdom. But the King led by ill counsel, and little regarding the Lords Message, takes Gaveston with him to New-Castle upon Tins, thence to Tinmouth, where the Queen then lay, (who though great with child, and entreating the King with tears to stay with her) yet such was his desire to see Gaveston put into some place of security, that hearing of the Lords approaching, he took a Ship, and passed with Gaveston to Scarborough, and leaving him there in a strong Castle, not ealie to be won, he went himself into Warwickshire; perhaps that the Lords might see he had not Gaveston with him. But the Lords hearing where Gaveston was, assaulted the Castle with such violence, that Gaveston seeing no means to escape was content to render himself; requesting only, that he might but once be allowed to see the Kings face; and the King hearing he was taken, desired as much: to which the Earl of Pembroke consented; and taking Gaveston into his custody, promised upon Forfeiture of all he had, to have him forth coming: but desiring to be with his Wife that night, who lay not far off, at Didington, he delivers him to his servants to carry to Wallingford; From whom as they passed by Warwick, the Earl of that place hearing of it, took him forcibly from his Keepers, and brought him to his own Castle. Where after long deliberation, whether it were wisdom to suffer Gaveston to speak with the King or no; it was at last concluded to take off his head; which at a place thereby called Blacklow, was presently put in execution. His corps was carried to Oxford, and kept there two years, till the King caused it to be brought to Langley, and there builded a Monastery of purpose, where his soul should be prayed for.

This Gaveston, was the Son of a Gentleman of France, who had done good service for King Edward the first in France, and for his sake this Son of his was taken and brought up with the Prince: a man of excellent parts of body, and of no less endowments of mind; Valiant and Witty; to which if we might add Vertuous, he had been compleat; Though the Lords (whether they had heard so, or whether they said it to wean the King from him) told the King, that his Father was a Traitor to the King of France, and for the same was executed; and that his Mother was burnt for a Witch; and that this Gaveston was banished out of France for consenting to his Mothers Witchcraft, and that he had now bewitched the King himself. But why should the Lords be so violent against Gaveston? might not the King place his affection where he pleased? Might he not make his own choice of what companion he liked? No doubt he might; and fit he should: but yet in this case the Lords had great cause to do as they did; both in regard of the King, of themselves, and of the Common-wealth. It is true, if the Valour of Gaveston could as well have made the King valiant, as his riot made him riotous; there might some good have come of their extraordinary conjunction: but seeing virtues are but personal, vices only are communicative; it now made the King not only more vicious than otherwise he would have been, but vicious where otherwise he would not have been; and therefore great cause in regard of the King to remove Gaveston from his company; and no less in regard of the Lords themselves; For Gaveston's advancing was their debasing; his greatness with the King made them but cyphers: but in regard of the Common-wealth, most cause of all; for while the King was altogether ruled by Gaveston, and Gaveston himself was altogether irregular, the Common-wealth could have but little hope of Justice, but was sure to suffer as long as Gaveston was suffered. And this may be sufficient to justify the Lords, that it be not interpreted to be Rebellion, which was indeed but Providence.

Of his Troubles with Scotland.

AND now we have seen two of the charges of his Fathers Will broken by the King and punished in him; the two and thirty thousand pounds appointed for the Holy War, bestowed upon Gaveston, and the King for it punished himself with want, Gaveston called home from banishment, and the King for it punished with the loss of his Subjects love. It remains to see how well he performed the third charge of his Fathers Will, for subduing of Scotland. It was now the sixth year after the death of his Father King Edward, and Robert Bruce now gotten to be King of Scotland, had stayed all this while to see how this new King Edward would prove: and when he found by the courses he held, that he was like to prove a good easie enemy; he thereupon took heart, and began to stir, and in a very short time had brought almost all Scotland under his obedience; and finding no opposition he entered the English borders, took and burnt Towns; that that now King Edward, unless he would sit still, and suffer Bruce to come and pull his Crown from his head, he could not chuse but do something to stop his proceeding. Hereupon he prepares an Army, but like himself, fitter for a Court than for a Camp: Many men and great bravery; but readier to take spoils, than to make spoil: and accordingly they speed; For going to raise the siege at Strivelling, defended for King Edward by the valiant Knight Philip Morley, the Kings Army consisting of a hundred thousand, was defeated and overthrown by the Scots Army, consisting of scarce thirty thousand: So true is that saying of an ancient Souldier; There is more hope of an Army where the General is a Lion, though the Souldiers be but sheep; then of an Army, where the General is a Sheep, though the Souldiers be Lions. But indeed the Scots, besides Valour used Policy: For having in their own Army none but Foot, no Horse at all, they had made Trenches in the ground three foot deep, covering them with Twigs and Hurdles, where the English Horsemen were to pass, who floundring in those Trenches, were killed no less by their own Fellows, than by the Enemy. In this Battle, called of Bannockborough, were slain the Lord Mauve, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Tiptot, the Lord William Marshall, Sir Giles, Doctor Argenton, and seven hundred Knights and Esquires, specially Gilbert Earl of Gloucester, who had shewed much valour that day; and whom the Scots would willingly have kept for ransom, if they had known him; but he had forgotten to put on his Coat of Arms, whereby to be known. The slaughter of common Souldiers was certainly great, though perhaps not so great as Hector Boetius speaks of, who saith they were fifty thousand. There were taken Prisoners Hunsfrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford, John Seagrave, John Claveringham, William Latimer, and Sir Roger Northbrook, bearer of the Kings shield; the King himself with the Bishops, the Earls of Hartford, and Pembroke, and Hugh Spenser, saved themselves by flight; Hunsfrey de Bohun Earl of Hereford was afterward released in Exchange for Bruce Wife, who had been long kept a Prisoner in England. After this many English fell away to the Scots, and all the North parts from Carlisle to York, came under their subjection; and the English grew so faint-hearted; and into such contempt, that three Scots durst venture upon a hundred English, when a hundred English durst scarce encounter with three Scots. And what can be thought the cause of this great disaster to this King, but the want of his Fathers blessing for not performing the charge he gave him dying, which is commonly accompanied with the want of a higher blessing, without which a Vacat is set upon the labours of men, that makes them all frustrate? But Bruce not satisfied with his acquiescence in England, sends his Brother Edward into Ireland also; who so far prevailed, that many Irish came in unto him, and in the end crowned him King of a great part of that Island, and so he continued the space of three years; till the Primate of Armagh, and the Lord Brimingham, Justiciar of Ireland, gathering Forces together opposed him, and in a Battle taking him Prisoner at Dundalk cut off his head, with the slaughter of many thousands of the Scots besides. With which the Scots are so incensed, that they invade again the English borders, foraging as far as York; whereupon a Parliament is assembled at London, wherein an aid is granted of armed men to go against them; London sets forth two hundred, Canterbury forty, Saint Albans ten, and so proportionably for all Cities and Boroughs, whereby a great Army was levied; which coming to York, through mutiny, emulation, and other impediments was soon dissolved, and returned back without effecting any thing. Not long after the Town of Barnwick was betrayed to the Scots through the Treason of Peter Spalding the Governour, and other English men; whom the King of Scots to make them an example, caused to be hanged for being Traitors to their Country. King Edward hearing of the surrendring of Barnwick, raiseth an Army, and beleaguers it; but the Scots to divert his Forces, enter upon England by other ways, and were like to have surprised the person of the Queen, lying then near York. The siege of Barnwick is notwithstanding eagerly continued, and the King in great possibility to have regained the Town, had not the Earl of Lancaster with his followers withdrawn himself upon discontent; hearing the King say he would give the keeping thereof to Hugh Spenser the younger, who was now grown a special Favourite of the Kings, and therefore not to be endured by the Earl. In the mean time the Scots won the Castles of Harbottle, Wark and Midford, so as they possessed the greater part of all Northumberland, burning all before them till they came to Rypon, which Town they spoiled, and carrying there three days, they received a Thousand Marks to save the Town from burning, as they had done the Towns of Northallerton, Borough-Briggs, and others. In their returning back they burnt Knaresborough, and Skipton in Craven, and all other afore them, carrying into Scotland a marvellous number of Cattel, besides Prisoners, men and women. The Yorkshire men thus grievously endamaged, gather together the number of ten thousand, and at the Town of Milton, ten miles from York, encounter the Scots, where they lost three thousand of their men, and were defeated: which Battle, because of the many spiritual men that were in it, was called the white Battle. Whereof when the King heard he left the siege of Barnwick, to follow the Scots, but they returned another way. The year following, King Edward once again with a great Army entered Scotland; but the Scots having destroyed all afore, the King oppressed with famine was forced to return, whom the Scots followed, and in a place of the Forest of Blackmore set upon him, that hardly escaped; where were taken John Earl of Britain, and the Lord of Silico, the French Kings Embassadour, and many other. After this King Edward finding the Scots either too strong, or too wily for him, made a truce with them for two years, some say for thirteen. And this was the success of this unfortunate King in his Wars with Scotland.

Of his Troubles at home.

But his troubles abroad were not so grievous as those at home; or rather, they were those at home that made his troubles abroad so grievous; for though the Lords having made an end of Gaveston, and cut off his head, thought they had made an end of their need to bear Arms, and had cut off the head of all their discontents; yet as if Gaveston had been a Phoenix, as it were out of his ashes another Phoenix riseth presently up, and puts the Lords to as much trouble as ever Gaveston did. For now the younger Spenser upon a sudden grows as great a favourite of the Kings as ever Gaveston was: and indeed in all points just such another, equal to him in goodlines of personage, in favour of the King, and in abusing the Lords; for though they were the Lords themselves that brought him at first to be the Kings Chamberlain, the rather (as was thought) because he was one whom the King did not love: yet being once in the place, he so won upon the King by diligent service, and by complying with the Kings humour; that he brought the King at last to comply with his humour, and nothing must be done but as Spenser would have it. It seems it was the Kings nature, that he could not be without a bosome friend; one or other to be an Alter idem: and to seek to remove such a one from him, was to seek to remove him from himself; as impossible a thing as to alter nature; yet the Lords being more sensible of their own grievance, to be insulted on by a Favourite, than of the Kings grievance to be affronted by his subjects, are more intentive to work their own ends than the Kings: and therefore to remove Spenser and his Father from the King, which they knew was a work not to be done but by strong hand, they continue their Arms, and confederating together, they send to the King, peremptorily requiring the confirmation and execution of the Articles formerly granted; threatening with all, that unless he presently perform the same, they would constrain him to it by force of Arms: and thereupon assemble strong Forces about Dunstable, where the King then lay. The great Prelates of the Kingdom, with the Earl of Gloucester, labour to appease them, and with two Cardinals sent lately by the Pope, to reform these disorders, they repair to Saint Albans, and desire conference with the Lords, who receive them peaceably; but the Letters which the Pope had written to them, they refuse to receive; saying, they were men of the Sword, and cared not for reading of Letters; that there were many worthy and learned men in the Kingdom, whose counsel they would use, and not strangers, who knew not the cause of their commotion: so the Cardinals with this answer returned to London. But the Prelates of England so labour the business, that the Lords were content to yield up to the King such horses, treasure and jewels, as they had taken of Pierce Gaveston at New-Castle, so as the King would grant their Petitions; and thereupon John Sandall Treasurer of the Kingdom, and Ingelard Warle keeper of the Wardrobe, are sent to Saint Albans to receive those things at their hands.

Shortly after a Parliament is called at London, wherein the King complains of the great contempt was had of him by the Barons, their rising in Arms, their taking and murdering Pierce Gaveston, and such other affronts: Whereunto with one accord they answer, that they had not offended therein, but rather merited his love and favour; having taken Arms, not for any contempt of his royal person, but to destroy the publick enemy of the Kingdom, which otherwise would never have been done: Which stout resolution of theirs, the Queen with the Prelates and the Earl of Gloucester seeing, they seek by all means to qualify their heat; and at length so prevailed with them, that they humble themselves to the King, and crave pardon for that they had done, which they obtained; and the King receives them into grace, as his loyal subjects; grants them their Articles, and particular pardons by his Charter, for their Indemnity concerning the death of Gaveston: and for the greater shew of true reconciliation, Guy de Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, is made of the Kings Counsel, though shortly after he had ended his life; not without suspicion of poison; as being a man much envied by such as possessed the King. The King kept his Christmas at Clifton, and his Easter at Clarendon: and they seemed to be all good friends, but this reconciliation of the King with his Barons, was but as the covering of fire with ashes, every little wind that blew, made it break out into flames afresh; and the time being so unfertile as it was, it was impossible but such winds would continually be blowing. It was such a wind blew, when the great Earl of Lancaster had his wife (a Lady who had lived with him alwaies in good fame) taken out of his house at Canford in Dorsetshire, by one Richard Saint Martin, a deformed lame Dwarf, who challenged her to be his wife, and had lien with her before the Earl married her: and this wind was made to blow the stronger, by the Ladies own confession; for upon examination, she voluntarily averred, it was all true: and thereupon the ugly fellow in her right, claimed the two Earldoms of Lincoln and Salisbury, which he durst not have done, if he had not been back'd with great Abettors: and it was not without aspersion upon the King himself. It was another such wind blew, when at the Feast of Pentecost, at dinner in the open Hall at Westminster, a woman fantastically disguised, entred on horseback, and riding about the Table, delivered the King a Letter, wherein was signified the great neglect he shewed of such as had done him and his Father noble services, taxing him for advancing men of unworthy parts, and such other complaints; which Letter read, and the woman departed, put the King into a great rage; they who guarded the door being sharply reprehended for suffering her to enter in such manner, answered, It was the fashion of the Kings house in times of Festivals, to keep out out none that came as this woman did, to make sport. Search being made for the woman, she is found and examined who fet her on; she confessed a Knight gave her money to do it; the Knight is found, and upon examination, boldly answered, he did it for the Kings honour, and to no other end, and thereupon escaped without further trouble. It was such another wind blew, when a Knight was taken passing by Pomfret, with Letters sealed with the Kings Seal, directed to the King of Scots, about murdering the Earl of Lancaster; which messenger is executed, his head fet upon the top of the Castle, and the Letters referred to witness the intended plot. Which whether it were feigned or true, the report thereof reflected upon the King; and made many to take the Earls part. It was such another wind blew, when a fanatic fellow, one John Ponder, a Tanners son of Excester gave forth, that himself was the true Edward, eldest son of the late King Edward the first, and by a false Nurse was changed in his cradle, and that the now King Edward was a Carters son, and laid in his place: but this wind was soon blown over, when at his death, being drawn and hanged, he confessed he had a familiar Spirit in his house in the likeness of a Cat, that assured him he should be King of England, and that he had served the said Spirit three years before to bring his purpose about. But most of all, it was such a wind blew, when a Baron named William Brewis, having waited his estate, offers to sell unto divers men, a part of his inheritance called Powis; Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, obtains leave of the King to buy it, and bargains for it: The two Roger Mortimers, Uncle and Nephew, great men likewise in those parts, not understanding, it seems, any thing of the former bargain, contract also for the same Land with the said Sir William Brewis: Hugh Spenser the younger, hearing of this sale, and the land adjoining to part of his, obtains a more special leave of the King, being now his Chamberlain, and buys it out of their hands. The Earl of Hereford complains hereof to the Earl of Lancaster: who thereupon at Sherbourne enters into a new confederation with divers Barons there assembled, taking their Oaths intermutually, to live and dye together in maintaining the right of the Kingdom, and to procure the banishment of the two Spensers, father and son, whom they now hold to be the great seducers of the King, and oppressors of the State, disposing of all things in Court at their pleasure, and suffering nothing to be obtained but by their means; and under this pretence they take Arms, and coming armed to St. Albans, they fend to the King, being then at London, the Bishops of London, Salisbury, Hereford, and Chichester, (who were there assembled to consult for peace) requiring him as he tendered the quiet of the Realm, to rid his Court of those Traitors, the Spensers condemned in many Articles of high treason, by the commonality of the Land; and withall to grant his Letters Patents of pardon and indemnity both to them and all such as took part with them. The King returns answer, that Hugh Spenser the father was now beyond the Seas, employed in his business, and his son was guarding the Cinqueports according to his office; and that it was against Law or Custom they should be banished without being heard: and withall swore, he would never violate the Oath made at his Coronation, by granting Letters of pardon to such notorious offenders, who contemned his person, disturbed the Kingdom, and violated the Royal Majesty: Which answer so exasperated the Lords, that presently they approached to London, and lodging in the Suburbs, till they had leave of the King to enter into the City, where they peremptorily urge their demands: to which at length by mediation of the Queen, and the chief Prelates, the King is brought to condescend, and by his Edict, published in Westminster Hall, by the Earl of Hereford, the Spensers are banished the Kingdom. Hugh the father hearing it, keeps beyond the Seas, but the son secretly hides himself in England, expecting the turn of a better season. And indeed shortly after the Archbishop of Canterbury in a Council holden at London, pronounceth the banishment of the Spensers to have been erroneous; and thereupon the Edict is revoked, and the Spensers are called home, and set in as great authority as they were before. But the Lords having thus obtained their desire, with the Kings Letters of indemnity, return home, but yet not with such security as to give over the provision for their own defence. Not long after there fell out an unexpected accident, that suddenly wrought the Lords confusion. The Queen making her progress towards Canterbury, intended to lodge at the Castle of Leeds, belonging to the Lord Bedlesmer, (who had been long the Kings Steward, but now took part with the Lords) and sending her Marshall to make ready for her and her train; they who kept the Castle told him plainly, that neither the Queen, nor any else should enter there without Letters from their Lord. The Queen her self goes to the Castle, and receives the like answer; whereupon she is driven to take such lodging elsewhere as could be provided. Of which indignity she complains to the King; who took it so to heart, that presently with a power of armed men out of London, he laies siege to the Castle, takes it, hangs the keeper Thomas Colepeper, sends the wife and children of the Lord Bedlesmer to the Tower, and seisth upon all his goods and treasure. And having this power about him, and warmed with success and the instigation of the Queen, suddenly directs his course to Chichester; where he keeps his Christmas, and there provides for an Army against the Barons: whereof many (seeing the Kings power encreasing) left their Associates, and yield themselves to his mercy: amongst whom were the two Roger Mortimers, men of great might and means; the Lord Hugh Audley, the Lord Maurice Barkley, and others: who notwithstanding, contrary to their expectation, were sent to divers Prisons. The Earls of Lancaster and Hereford seeing this sudden change, withdrew themselves and their company from about Glocester, towards the North-parts: whom the King follows with his army; wherein were the Earls of Arbol and Angus; and at Burton upon Trent, where they had made a head, discomfited their forces, and put

A put them to flight. In the mean time the Earl of Lancaster had sent into Lancashire a Knight of his, named Robert Holland, (one whom he had brought up of nought) to raise more Forces amongst his Tenants; but he hearing of this flight of his Lords, goes with his Forces to take the Kings part; which so disfaistes the Earl, that he began now to think of suing to the King for grace; but being in the way, at a Town called Borough-bridge, was there set upon by Sir Simon Warde Sheriff of York, and Sir Andrew Harkeley Constable of Carlisle, who utterly defeat his Forces: In which fight was slain the Earl of Hereford, (who fighting valiantly upon a Bridge, was by a Varlet skulking under the Bridge, thrust with a Spear into the fundament) Sir Roger Benefield, Sir William Sulland and others; there was taken the Earl of Lancaster, Sir Roger Clifford, Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Tuckets, Sir William Fitz-Williams, with divers other, and were led to Tork. This field was fought the fifteenth day of March, in the year 1320. It was not long after that Sir Hugh Daniel, Sir Bartholomew de Baddlesmer were taken. Three daies after the Earl of Lancaster is brought to Pomfret, where the King sitting himself in judgement with Edmund Earl of Kent his brother, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl Warren, Hugh Spenser, lately created Earl of Winchester, and others; sentence of death is given against him, to be drawn, hanged, and beheaded as a Traitor. The two first punishments are pardoned, in regard he was of Royal blood: and beheaded he was the same day without the Town of Pomfret, before his own Castle. To speak of the Miracles said to be done by him after his death, might be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle, and therefore I omit them. By the like judgement were condemned the Lord Roger Clifford, the Lord Warren Lisle, the Lord William Tucket, Thomas Mandit, Henry Bradburn, William Fitz-Williams, Lord Cheyney, Thomas Lord Mowbray, Joceline Lord Daniel, all which were executed at Tork: Shortly after, the Lord Henry Teyes is taken, drawn, hanged, and quartered at London, William the Lord Aldenham at Windfor; the Lords Baddlesmer and Ashburton at Canterbury; at Cardiffe in Wales, Sir William Fleming; at Briffor, Sir Henry Womington, and Sir Henry Montford Bannet; at Glocester, the Lord Clifford, and Sir William Elmbridge, principal men in principal places; to spread the terror over the Kingdom: all their estates and inheritances are confiscated, and many new men advanced by the same. And this is the first blood of Nobility that ever was shed in this manner in England since Williams the Conquerour.

But not long after, the King in a calmer humour, began to have sense of the Earl of Lancaster's execution, which he discovered upon this occasion: some about him making earnest suit for a Pardon to one of the Earls followers; and pressing the King hard to it, he fell into a great passion, exclaiming against them as unjust and wicked Counsellors, who would urge him to save the life of a notorious Varlet, and would not speak one word for his near kinsman the Earl of Lancaster: who (said he) had he lived, might have been useful to me, and the whole Kingdom; but this fellow the longer he lives, the more mischief he will do, and therefore by the soul of God, he should die the death he had deserved. Sir Andrew Harkeley, who was the man that took the Earl of Lancaster prisoner, being advanced for this service to the Earldom of Carlisle, enjoyed his honour but a while; for the next year after, either thrust out into discontent by the Spensers, envying his high preferment, or combining with the Scots, upon hope of a great match, (as he was accused) he is degraded of all his honours; drawn, hanged, and quartered at London for Treason.

But now the King of France summons King Edward to come and do his homage for Giscome; and he not coming, all his Territories in France are adjudged to be forfeited, and many places of importance are seized on by the French. Hereupon a Parliament is called; and it is by common consent of all agreed, that the King should not go in person himself, in regard of the distraction of the times, but should send some special men to excuse his appearance; whereupon Edmund Earl of Kent the Kings brother is sent, but to little effect. Then it is thought fit the Queen should go, and indeed the Queen went; but what was the cause of her going, there is amongst Writers great variance: some say she was sent by the King to accommodate this business, which she negotiated so well, as that all quarrels were ended, upon condition the King should give to his son Edward the Dutchy of Aquitaine, with the Earldom of Ponthieu, and send him over to do his homage for them; which after many consultations, the King is wrought to yield unto; and the Prince is sent with the Bishop of Excester and others, to the Court of France accordingly; but others say, she went out of discontent, to complain to her brother the King of France for wrongs offered her by the Spensers, who had so alienated the Kings mind from her, that he would scarce come where she was, nor allow her fit maintenance for her calling. But whatsoever was the cause of her going, there appeared no cause of her staying, but that she had gotten into her company, Roger Mortimer Lord of Wigmore, a gallant young Gentleman, whom the specially favoured, lately escaped out of the Tower of London, by giving his keepers (as was said) a sleeping drink. And withall, the Bishop of Excester perceiving some plots to be in hand, and their close consultations made without him, withdraws himself secretly, and discovers to the King what he observed in their courses. Whereupon the King sends presently for the Queen and Prince, and solicits the King of France to hasten their return; which when he saw was neglected and delayed, he caused them openly to be proclaimed enemies to the Kingdom, banished them and all their adherents out of the Land; and withall caused all the Ports to be strongly kept; and sends three Admirals to attend in several Coasts to hinder their landing. It was not without suspicion, that the King as for love of the Spensers, had his minde alienated from loving the Queen; so the Queen for love of Mortimer had her mind alienated from loving the King, and therefore having him with her, cared not how long she stayed. However it was, when the Queen heard of the Kings Proclamation, she knew there was no returning for her into England without some good assistance: whereupon soliciting her brother the King of France he aided her with men and money, say some, but others, that he refusing to aid her, as being wrought under hand by the Spensers against her, she left the French Court, and went into Hainault, to the Earl of that Country, who upon a contract between her son Prince Edward and Philippa the Earls daughter, aided her with a competent Army under the conduct of his brother John: and with them and her beloved Mortimer, she took shipping and landed at Orwell, a Port neer unto Harwich in Suffolk: where presently came to her the Earl Marshal, Henry Earl of Leicester, and Henry Earl of Lancaster with the wry neck, called Torcello, and many other Lords and Bishops. The King at this time being at London, and hearing of the Queens landing with such Forces, and chiefly how all the Realm ran flocking to her, was suddenly, stricken in with a great amazement; and though he had his great Counsellors the Spensers about him, yet now he found what little good their counsel could do him: and indeed in this case, what should he, or what could he do? to stay in London was apparent danger, for he plainly saw the Londoners to be more inclining to take the Queens part then his; and to go from London to any other place was as unsafe, all places being possessed either with certain enemies, or uncertain friends: at last the Isle of Lundy is thought of, a place plentiful of provision, abounding with Conies, Fish and Fowl, and the Island of hard access, as having but one place in it where it could be entered, and that so narrow that a few might easily keep out many; upon this place he resolves, and taking with him the Earl of Glocester, the Spensers, and Robert Baldock with some few others, he takes shipping, but by contrary winds is driven back, and fain through Templets to land in Wales, and there in the Abbey of Nethe in Glamorganshire kept himself close. In the mean time the Queen was come to Oxford, where Adam Bishop of Hereford took for his Text, Caput meum doleo, and thereupon inferred, that the Kingdom being now deadly sick of its head, it was fit to remove that head, and put a sounder in the place. At this time also, the Londoners to shew their love to the Queen, seized upon Walter Stapleton, the good Bishop of Excester and Lord Treasurer of England, left Governour there by the King, and with great despite beheaded him, as also divers others, only because they favoured the King. In the mean time, the Queen went from Oxford to Glocester, and from thence to Bristol, where Hugh Spenser the Father was, a man of fourscore and ten years old, who is there taken, and without examination or Judgment, in most cruel manner executed, having his heart pulled out of his body being yet alive, and his body left hanging upon the Gallows. After this the Queen stayed at Hereford the space of a month, and then dividing her Army, she sends one part of it under the Conduct of Henry Earl of Lancaster, and Rice ap Powell a Clerk to find out the King: and this Rice being a Welshman, and knowing the Country well, brought the Earl to the Monastery of Nethe where the King was, whom they there take together with Spenser the Son, Robert Baldock, and Simon of Reading. The King is by the Bishop of Hereford committed to the custody of the Earl of Leicester: where all that winter he was used no worse then was fit for a captive King, but Edmund Earl of Arundell, John Daniel, and Thomas Micheldene, at the instance of Mortimer, are all three beheaded. Presently after is Hugh Spenser, the younger who was now Earl of Glocester, drawn, hanged, and quartered, his head sent up to be set upon London Bridge, and his four quarters bestowed in several Cities. The like is done with Simon of Reading, but Robert Baldock is committed to Newgate, against whom, when no just cause of death could be found, there was used so much cruelty in his imprisonment, that he shortly after died.

Presently after Christmas a Parliament is called, wherein it was agreed to depose the King and set up his Son; which he hearing refused it, unless his Father would freely resign; whereupon are appointed three Bishops, two Earls, two Abbots, four Barons, and of every City a Burgess to go to the King; in custody then at Kensworth the Bishops were John of Stratford Bishop of Winchester, Adam Tarleton Bishop of Hereford, and Henry Bishop of Lincoln. But the Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln, getting to the King before the rest came, persuaded the King to resign his Crown to his eldest Son; craftily promising him he should have as good maintenance afterward, as ever he had when he was King; And contrarily threatening him, that if he did it not, the people would exclude both him and his Son too, and make a King of another Race. By these promises and threatnings, the meek King is drawn to yield to the Bishops motion; but when afterward the Bishop of Hereford and the other Commissioners came, and were fere in a place appointed to take his Resignation, the King coming forth amongst them in mourning Robes, upon a sudden fell down in a swoon; in whom the Earl of Leicester, and the Bishop of Winchester, had much ado to recover life, but then the Bishop of Hereford rising up, delivered the cause of their coming, as the other Bishops before had done; To which the King answered, that as he much grieved his people, should be so hardened against him, as utterly to reject him; so it was some comfort unto him, that they would yet receive his Son to be their Sovereign. After this Thomas Blunt Knight, Steward of the Kings house brake the Staffe of his Office; and William Trussell Speaker of the Parliament in the name of the whole Kingdom, pronounced a Form of renouncing all Allegiance to Edward of Carnarvan. Here Croxton writes, that from the time of this Kings depoling, which was in December, to the time of his Sons Crowning, which was not till Candlemas following, all Pleas of the

A Kings Bench were stayed, and all Prisoners, arrested by Sheriffs, commanded to be set at liberty; which seems to have little probability, seeing his Son Edward presently upon his Depoling was received for King: But howsoever so great a Dowry was then assigned to Queen Isabel, that scarce a third part of the Revenues of the Crown is left for the new King and his wife: And to the late King is allowed a hundred marks a month for his maintenance; with which he lived with his cousin Earl of Leicester, in good plenty and contentment for a time; only this grieved him most of all (he said) that the Queen his Wife would never be gotten to come to see him: For he swore most devoutly that from the time he first saw her face, he could never like of any other Woman. By which it may appear, that neither Graveston nor the Spensers had so debauched him, as to make him false to his bed, or to be disloyal to his Queen. But the Queen being hardened against him, and conceiving he had too great Liberty under the Earl of Leicester, by advice of her peltilent Counsellour, Adam Tarleton Bishop of Hereford, appoints Thomas Gurney, and John Matrevers Knights, to take him from the Earl into their own custody, and to carry him whither they thought good; who thereupon take him from Kensworth, and carry him first to Corf Castle, and from thence to Bristol; where they shut him in the Castle; till upon knowledge of a Plot laid to get him out, and send him beyond Sea, they took him in the night and carried him to Barkley Castle, where by the way they abused him most inhumanely, as Sir Thomas de la More a Knight of Glocestershire, in his life relateth: For to the end he should not be known, they shaved his head and beard, and that in most beastly manner; for they took him from his Horse and set him upon a Hillock, and then taking piddle water out of a Ditch thereby, they went to wash him, his Barber telling him that cold water must serve for this time; whereat the miserable King looking sternly upon him, said, That whether they would or no, he would have warm water to wash him; and therewithal to make good his word, he presently shed forth a shewre of tears. Never was King turned out of a Kingdom in such a manner; Many Kingdoms have been lost by the chance of War, but this Kingdom was lost before any Dice were cast; no blow struck, no batrel fought; done forcibly, and yet without force; violently, and yet with consent; both parties agreed, yet neither pleased; for the King was not pleased to leave his Kingdom, and the Queen was not pleased to leave him his life; it was not safe to leave him a part, by which he might afterward recover the whole; and therefore this was the mark now aimed at, having taken away his Kingdom openly, how they might take away his life secretly; be the Authors of it, and not be seen in it; but this must be the Contents of a Chapter hereafter.

Is inhumanely used.

Of his Taxations.

BY this King it appears, there is something else besides the grievance of Taxations, that alienates the mindes of English Subjects from their King; for never were fewer Taxations then in this Kings time, yet never were the Subjects minds more alienated from their King, then they were from him: Before his Coronation, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Clergy, and a twentieth of the Temporality. In his fifth year in a Parliament at London, was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporality. In his fifteenth year was granted the sixth penny of temporal mens goods, through England, Ireland, and Wales, towards his Wars with Scotland; And more then these we read not of; but then at the defeat of the Earl of Lancaster, there were Confiscations that supplied the place of Taxations, by which (as one saith) he became the richest King that had been since the Conquest.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE Ordained that the money of his Father, though counted base by the People, should be current. In the eighth year of his reign, by reason of a dearth which raised the price of all Victuals, it was ordained by Parliament, that an Oxe fatted with grafs should be sold for fifteen shillings, fatted with Corn, for twenty; the best Cow for twelve shillings; a fat Hog of two years old, three shillings four pence; a fat sheep shorn, fourteen pence, with the Fleeces twenty pence; a fat Goose for two pence half penny; a fat Capon two pence; a fat Hen a penny; four Pigeons a penny; whosoever fold for more, should forfeit their ware to the King: But after these rates imposed, all kind of victuals grew so scarce, that Provision could hardly be made for the Kings house; whereupon shortly after, the Order was revoked, and Market folks permitted to make the best of their wares. In this Kings time an Ordinance was made against Knights Templars, accused of Heresie and other crimes, and they were all apprehended, and committed to divers prisons. The like was done by all the Kings of Christendome, at one instant, being condemned in a General Council at Vienna. In the 14. year of his reign, on the 15. of October, the Clerks of the Exchequer went towards Tork with the Book called Domus Dei, and other Records, and Provision that laded one and twenty Carts, but in half a year they were brought back again.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

A Bishop arrested by the King, was rescued by the other Bishops.

IN the 17. year of his reign the Bishop of Hereford was arrested, accused of High Treason, for aiding the Kings enemies in their late rebellion; but he refused to answer, (being a consecrated Bishop) without leave of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose suffragan he was, (and who he said was his direct Judge, next the Pope) or without the consents of his fellow Bishops, who then all arose, and humbly craved the Kings Clemency in his behalf; but finding the King implacable, they took him away from the Barre, and delivered him to the custody of the Archbishop of Canterbury: shortly after, he was again taken and convented as before, which the Clergy understanding, the Archbishops, Canterbury, York, and Dublin, with ten other Bishops, all with their Croffes erected, went to the place of Judgment, and again took him away with them; charging all men, upon pain of Excommunication, to forbear to lay violent hands upon him; with which audacious Act, the King was so much displeased, that he presently commanded inquiry to be made ex Officio Judicis, concerning those Objections against the Bishop: wherein he was found guilty, though absent, and had all his Goods and Possessions seized into the Kings hands. In this Kings time the Crowcher Fryers came first into England. In his time Pope John the two and twentieth, first intituted the Feast of Corpus Christi; begun before by Urban the fourth.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

Oriel Colledge in Oxford founded.

THis King founded Oriel Colledge, and Saint Mary Hall in Oxford: He builded a Church of Fryers at his Manour of Langley, where the soul of Gaveston should be prayed for. In this Kings twentieth year, Richard Roshing Sheriff of London, builded the Parish Church of Garlick-bith in London, Ralph Baldock Bishop of London, gave two thousand Marks to the building of the new Work of the Chappel, on the South side of Paul's Church, And left much more by his Testament.

Casualties.

A marvailous death.

IN the eight year of this Kings reign, was so great a dearth, that Horses and Doggs were eaten, and Theeves in prison pluckt in pieces those that were newly brought in amongst them, and eat them half alive; which continuing three years, brought in the end such a pestilence, that the living scarce sufficed to bury the dead. In the fourth year of his reign, the Church of Middleton in Dorsetshire, with all the Monuments, was consumed with Lightning, the Monks being at Matins. In this Kings time, digging the Foundation of work about Paul's, were found more then a hundred heads of Oxen and Kine, which confirmed the opinion, that of old time it had been the Temple of Jupiter, and that there was the Sacrifice of Beasts.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Isabel Daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France, she being but twelve years of age; who lived his Wife twenty years, his Widow thirty, and dying at threescore and three years old at Ryfings near London, was buried in the midst of Gray-Friers Quire in London. By her he had issue two Sons and two Daughters: his eldest Son named Edward of Windsor, because born there, succeeded him in the Kingdom. His second Son named John of Eltham, because born there, was at twelve years old created Earl of Cornwall: he dyed in Scotland in the flower of his Youth, unmarried. His eldest Daughter Joan, being a child, was married in the fourth year of King Edward her brother, to David Prince of Scotland, Son to King Robert Bruce, at seven years old; who coming afterward into England to visit her Brother, dyed here, and was buried at the Gray Friars in London. His second Daughter Eleanor, was married to Reginold the second Earl of Gelder, with a portion of fifteen thousand pounds and had issue by him two sons, who were Earls successively.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was fair of body, and of great strength, but given much to drink, which made him oftentimes bewray his own Secrets; For his other conditions, his greatest fault was, that he loved but one, for if his love had been divided, it could not have been so violent. He was yet extream in nothing but in loving; and though love moderated, be the best of affections, yet the extremity of it is the worst of passions. He was rather unfortunate then unhappy; seeing unfortunateness is in the event, unhappiness in the cause; and if his fortune had been to love good men,

A his own goodness would have made him happy. Two Vertues were eminent in him above all his Predecessours, Continnence, and Abstinence: So continent, that he left no base illue behind him; so abstinent, that he took no base courtes for railing of money. They who despised him being alive, so much honoured him being dead, that they could have found in their hearts to make him a Saint.

Of his Death and Burial.

MAny waies were attempted to take away his life: First, they vexed him in his diet, allowing him nothing he could well indure to eat, but this succeeded nor. Then they lodged him in a chamber over carion and dead carkasses, enough to have poysoned him; and indeed he told a workman at his window, he never endured to great a misery in all his life, but neither did this succeed. Then they attempted it by poysons, but whether by the strength of his constitution, or by the Divine Providence, neither did this succeed. At last the pestilent Achitophel, the Bishop of Hereford, devised a Letter to his keepers, blaming them for giving him too much liberty, and for not doing the service which was expected from them: and in the end of his Letter wrote this line, Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est: Craftily contriving it in this doubtful sense, that both the keepers might find sufficient warrant, and himself might find sufficient excuse. The Keepers guessing at his meaning, took it in the worst sense, and accordingly put it in execution; they took him in his bed, and casting heavy bolsters upon him, and pressing them hard down, stifled him; and not content with that, they heated an iron rod hot, and through a Pipe thrust it up into his Fundament, that no marks of violence might be seen; but though none were seen, yet some were heard; For when the Fact was in doing, he was heard to roar and cry all the Castle over. Gourney and Matrevers, his murderers, looking for reward, had the reward of murderers: For the Queen and Bishop Torleton disavowing the command, threatened to question them for the Kings death: whereupon they fled beyond Sea; and Gourney after three years, being taken in France, and sent into England, was in the way upon the Sea, beheaded. Matrevers flying into Germany, had the grace to repent, but lived ever after miserably. Thus died this King in the year 1327. more then half a year after his depoling; when he had reigned almost 19. years, lived 43. His body was carried to Gloucester, and there without any Funeral Pomp buried in the Monastery of Saint Peter, by the Benedictine Fryers.

Of Men of Note in his time.

IN this Kings time, of Martial men were many, whose Acts have been spoken of in the late Kings life. Of learned men also many, as John Duns the great Logician, called Doctor Subtilis, born in Northumberland, at Emildune a Village three miles distant from Alnwick; though both the Scots and the Irish challenge him for theirs: Robert Walsingham a Carmelite Fryer, who wrote divers Treatises; Robert Bafon born in Nottinghamshire, a Carmelite Fryer of Scarborough, whom King Edward took with him into Scotland, to write some remembrances of his victories; but being taken by the Scots, was constrained by Robert Bruce, to write Remembrances of his overthrowes; William Rishanger, a Monk of Saint Albans, an Historiographer; Ralph Baldocke, Bishop of London, who wrote a History intituled Historia Anglica; John Walsingham, a Carmelite Fryer, who wrote divers Treatises; Nicolas de Lyra a Jew by birth, who wrote many excellent Treatises, in Divinity; William Ockam a Fryer Minor, who wrote divers Treatises, and namely against John Duns, and also against Pope John the 23. in favour of the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria; Thomas Halsewood, a Canon of Leeds in Kent, who wrote a Chronicle called Chronicon compendiarium; Robert Persecurator born in Yorkshire, a black Fryer and a Philosopher, or rather a Magician; and last, though not least worthy to be remembered, John Mandeville, the great traveller, a Doctor of Phylick and a Knight.

THE LIFE and REIGN OF KING EDWARD THE THIRD.

Of his coming to the Crown, and Acts done in his Minority.

Edward of Windsor, eldest son of King Edward the second, by the Order of Parliament, upon his Fathers Resignation, was proclaimed King of England, on the five and twentieth day of January, in the year 1327. and because he had not yet received the Order of Knighthood, he was by Henry Earl of Lancaster girt solemnly with the Sword; and on the first day of February following, was crowned at Westminster by Walter Reginold Archbishop of Canterbury: and thereupon a general Pardon is proclaimed, which hath since been used as a Custome with all succeeding Kings: that at their first coming to the Crown, a general Pardon is alwaies granted.

Anno Dom.

King Edward the third crowned.

And because the King was under age, scarce fifteen years old (though Froysard saith he was then eighteen) there were twelve appointed Governours of him and the Kingdom; namely the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Bishops of Winchester, Hereford, and Worcester; Thomas of Brotherton, Earl Marshal, Edmund Earl of Kent, the Kings Uncles: John Earl Waren, Thomas Lord Wake, Henry Lord Pierce, Oliver Lord Ingham, and John Lord Rosse: but though these were appointed and bore the name, yet the Queen and Roger Mortimer took all the authority to themselves. The first action that was undertaken, was an expedition against the Scots; for Robert Bruce, though now old and sickly, and (as was said) Leprous; yet considering the youth of the new King, and the distractions of the Kingdom, thought it now a fit time to do some good upon England: and entering the English borders with an Army, sent defiance to King Edward: whereupon an Army is raised, and the Heynaudders, whom the Queen had brought over) are joyned with the English; but a variance falling out between the two Nations, made the action not successful. For the Kings Army encountering the Scots at Stanhope Park in VVeredal in the Bishoprick of Durham, though three times as many as the Scots, as being thirty thousand; yet through this variance, but more through treason of some great men, suffered them all to escape their hands, and the Scots returned home in safety, the English with dishonour: and after this, the English seeing the Heynaudders could do them no good, sent them away to their own Countrey. In King Edward's second year, his marriage with Philippa of Heynault is solemnised, (a dispensation being first gotten, because of their nearness in blood) and a Parliament is holden at Northampton, where the King made three Earls: John of Eltham his brother, Earl of Cornwall, Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, and James Butler of Ireland, Earl of Ormond: and in this Parliament a dishonourable peace is concluded with the Scots, and confirmed by a match between David Bruce Prince of Scotland, being but seven years old, and Joan sister to King Edward not so old; at which time by the secret working of Queen Isabell, Roger Mortimer and Sir James Douglas, the King surrenders all his title of Sovereignty to the Kingdom of Scotland, restores divers Deeds and Instruments of their former Homages and Fealties, with the famous Evidence called Ragmans Roll, and many ancient Jewels and Monuments, amongst which was the Black Crofs of Scotland; and besides, any English man is prohibited to hold Lands in Scotland, unless he were a dweller there. In consideration whereof whereof King Bruce was to pay 30000 Marks, and to renounce his claim to the Counties of Cumberland and Northumberland, and any other place possessed by him in England. This was no good beginning, and yet worse followed after. For another Parliament being holden at Winchester, Edmund Earl of Kent, the Kings Uncle, is there accused, and condemned upon his confession, for intending to restore his brother, the late King Edward; an intention only without any fact; yet condemned he was; and brought to the Scaffold, but generally so beloved of the people, that he stood on the Scaffold from one clock till five, before any executioner could be found that would do the office, till at last a silly wretch of the Marshalsey was gotten to cut off his head. But the Authors of his death escaped not long themselves, for in the third year of the Kings reign, another Parliament is holden at Nottingham, wherein the Queen hath all her great Joynture taken from her, and is put to her Pension of a thousand pounds a year, and her self confined to a Castle, where she remained the rest of her daies, no fewer then thirty years, a time long enough to find that her being the daughter of a King, the sister of a King, the wife of a King, and the mother of a King, were glorious titles, but all not worth the liberty of a mean estate; and as for Mortimer, (lying then in the Castle of Nottingham) and lately created Earl of the Marches of Wales) he was seized on in this manner; the King taking with him William Montacute, Robert Holland, and others go secretly one night by Torch-light, through a privy way under ground, till they came to the Queens Chamber, where leaving the King without, they entred and found the Queen with Mortimer, ready to go to bed: then laying hands on him, they led him forth: after whom the Queen followed, crying, Bel fits, yet pitié du gentil Mortimer; good son, good son, take pity upon the gentle Mortimer, suspecting that her son had been amongst them: this course was taken to apprehend him for avoiding of tumult, he having no fewer then nine score Knights and Gentlemen, besides other meaner servants continually about him. But thus seized on, he is committed presently to the Tower, accused of divers great crimes, whereof these were chief; that he had procured the late Kings death; that he had been the author of the Scots safe escaping at Stanhope Park, corrupted with the gift of thirty thousand pounds; that he had procured the late marriage and Peace with Scotland, so dishonourable to the King and Kingdom; that he had been too familiar with the Queen, as by whom she was thought to be with child: of which Articles he was found guilty and condemned; and thereupon is drawn and hanged on the common Gallows at the Elms, now called Tiburn, where his body remained two daies as an opprobrious spectacle for all beholders.

After these busineses in England, there comes a new busines upon him from the King of France: for about this time Philippe le Bel, King of France, the Queens brother, dying without issue, the right of succession to the Crown is devolved upon the Heir to Charles a former King, wherein are competitors Philip Duke of Valois, and Edward King of England; Edward is the nearer in blood, but draws his Pedegree by a Female: Philip the farther off, but descending by all Males; and because the Law Salique excluding Females, was conceived as well to exclude all descendants by Females, therefore is Philip's title preferred before King Edwards; and Philip is received and crowned King of France: to which preferment of his, Robert de Artois a Peer of great power, gave no small furtherance. And now as soon as Philip was Invested in the Crown, he summons Edward to come and do his Homage for the Duchy of Guyenn, and his other lands in France, held of that Crown, according to the custome; which though it were some prejudice to King Edwards claim afterward, yet in regard his Kingdom of England was scarce well settled, and himself but young, he was contented to do it; and thereupon the sixth of June, in the year 1329. King Edward in a Crimson Velvet Gown imbrodered with Leopards, with his Crown on his head, his sword by his side, and golden Spurs on his heels; presents himself in the body of the Cathedral Church of Amiens before King Philip, sitting in his Chair of Estate, in a Velvet Gown of a Violet colour imbrodered with Flowers de lys of Gold, his Crown on his head, and his Scepter in his hand, with all his Princes and Peers about him. The Viscount Melun Chamberlain of France, first commands King Edward to put off his Crown, his Sword, and his Spurs, and to kneel down, which he did on a Crimson Velvet Cushion before King Philip, and then the Viscount putting both his hands together between the hands of the King of France, pronounced the words of the Homage, which were these: You become Leigeman to my Master here present, as Duke of Aquitaine and Peer of France, and you promise to bear faith and loyalty unto him; Say yea: and King Edward said yea, and kissed the King of France on the mouth, as Lord of the Fee. The like Homage also he did for the Earldom of Ponthieu. But this act of submission left a rancour in King Edwards heart, which afterwards brake so out, that it had been good for France it had never been exacted.

This done, King Edward returns home, and there finds a new busines with Scotland, upon this occasion, Edward Balioll, son to John Balioll (sometimes King of Scotland) two and thirty years after his Fathers depolition, began now to shew himself, attempting the recovery of that Crown; and coming out of France, where he had all that while remained, and getting aid under-hand in England, with them he suddenly assails those who had the government of Scotland, during the Nonage of the young King David, (being at that time with the King of France) and in a batel overcame them, with the slaughter of many Noble men, and thousands of the common people; and thereupon was immediately Crowned King of Scotland at Scone. But notwithstanding his great defeat, King Balioll was forced to retire him into England to get more aid

King Edward doth homage to the King of France for his Duchy of Guyenne; and the manner of doing it.

Edward Balioll is crowned King of Scotland.

A of King Edward: who now shews himself in the action, joyns with Baliol against his Brother in Law, King David; goes in person with a strong Army to recover Berwick, which after three months siege, being valiantly defended by the Lord Seton, was taken in, and the Army of the Scots which came to the rescue thereof, at Halidown-Hill, utterly defeated: where were slain seven Earls, ninety Knights and Bannerets, four hundred Esquires, and about two and thirty thousand common souldiers, as our Writers report: as theirs, but fourteen thousand: and with this effusion of blood is Balioll returned to his miserable Kingdom, and to hold good correspondence with the King of England hereafter, doth him Homage for his Realm of Scotland; and the Islands adjacent. But though he had a Kingdom, yet he had not quietness, for many of the Scots aided by the French, made war upon him divers years after; during all which time, King David with his wife remained in France. If any man marvel why King Edward would aid Balioll against King David, who had married his sister, he may consider that Alliances, how near soever, weigh but light in the scales of State.

About this time, the Isle of Man is conquered by William Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, for which service King Edward gave him the title of King of Man.

Of his Aets after he came of age.

C And now Robert of Artois banished out of France, comes into England, whom King Edward makes Earl of Richmond, and of his Council. This Robert persuades King Edward to make war upon France, to which Crown (he said) he had more right then he that held it: with whose persuasions, King Edward is at last resolved to undertake the enterprise: and to furnish himself of noble Cheitains, he at one time in a Parliament at Westminster, the eighth year of his reign, creates six Earls, Henry of Lancaster he made Earl of Derby, William Montacute he made Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Audley Earl of Gloucester, Williams Clinton Earl of Huntingdon, and Robert Clifford or Clifford Earl of Suffolk; also twenty Knights, of whom Thomas de la Moore, who writ the life of the Kings Father, was one. Withal he sends the Bishop of Lincoln, to procure leagues of amity, with divers Princes abroad; where it is scarce worth remembering, what Froissard mentions here, that certain young Gentlemen covered one of their eyes with a piece of silk, and vowed to see but with one eye, till it might be seen, what great deeds of Arms they performed, but for all this vow of theirs we hear nothing of their exploits. And as the King of England laboured to procure himself friends, so likewise the King of France got to take his part, the Bishop of Leige, with the Dukes and Earls of Gelders, Juliers, Cleve, Heynalt, and Brabant, and with the Archbishops of Colen, and Valeran his Brother: John King of Bohemia, Earl of Luxemburg, Henry Count Palatine, Aubert Bishop of Metz, Otto Duke of Austria, Anne Earl of Geneva, with many other Princes and Captains out of Germany, Spain, and other Countries. King Edward thus resolved in himself, and furnished with friends abroad, goes over into Flanders with his Queen and Children, makes his residence at Antwerp; where by perswasion of the Flemings he takes upon him the Stile, Title, and Arms of the King of France; for by this they accounted themselves disobliged of the Bond of twenty hundred thousand crowns, which they had entred into, never to bear Arms against the King of France; and hereupon the League was established between them and King Edward: and from this time forward, the Kings of England quartered the Arms of France with those of England, and took upon them the name of Kings of France. And now King Edward for a beginning to put his claim in execution, sets upon Cambray, and enters France by the way of Vermandois and Thierach; on the other side King Philip seizes on the Duchie of Guienne, and sends thither the Conte d'Eu, Constable of France, with the Earls of Foix and Armigniac. At last both Armies came so near together, that a fight was appointed the Friday after; but upon better consideration, the English thought it no discretion to give batel to an Army so much greater than their own, if they could avoid it; and the French thought it as little discretion for them to hazard the person of the Prince within his own Kingdom; and perhaps were not a little moved with the warning given them by Robert King of Sicilie, a great Astronomer, that he foresaw by the Stars, some great misfortune to threaten the French, if they should that day fight with the English, King Edward being present: and thus both Armies having their several reasons to decline the batel, they parted without doing any thing; only an accident happened scarce worth remembering, yet must be remembered. A Hare starting out before the head of the French Army, caused a great shout to be made; whereupon, they who saw not the Hare, but only heard the shout, supposing it to be the onset of the batel, disposed themselves to fight, and fourteen Gentlemen for encouragements sake, as the custom is, were knighted; called afterward in merriment, Knights of the Hare.

G But now King Edward must a little look home, and therefore leaving the Queen in Brabant, he passeth himself into England about Candlemas, having been in Brabant about a year; and landing at the Tower about midnight, and finding it unguarded, was so much displeased, that he presently sends for the Mayor of London, commanding him to bring before him the Chancelour and Treasurer, with Sir John Saint Paul, Michael Wath, Philip Thorpes, Henry Stratford, Clergie man, (who it seems were Officers for his Receipts) and John Sconer Justice of the Bench; all which, except the Chancelour, were apprehended and committed to prison; as were afterward in like manner, divers Officers of Justice, and Accomptants, upon inquiry of their unjust proceeding. During the Kings abode in England, William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, and Robert Clifford Earl of Suffolk left in Flanders to oppose the French, having performed divers great exploits, were at last in an encounter about Lille, so overlaid by multitude, as they were both taken, and sent Prisoners to Paris: Besides, about this time two accidents happened that were thought would be great rubs in King Edward's proceeding; one, that his Wives Father, William Earl of Hainault, dying, and leaving his Son to succeed, this son left his Brother King Edward, and fell to take part with the King of France; the other, that the Duke of Normandy, thinking himself as strong as ever William Duke of Normandy was that conquered England, he saw no reason but he might conquer it as well as that William; and thereupon makes preparation by Sea and Land to attempt the enterprise: but these were but vapours that never came to be winds, at least brought no storms: for John Earl of Hainault had quickly enough of the King of France, and was soon after reconciled to his brother King Edward; and the Duke of Normandy went no further then preparations: for indeed King Edward prosecuted his courses against France with such heat, that all the neighbouring Princes seeing a fire kindled so near their own borders, were glad to look to themselves at home. But now to impeach the King of Englands return into France, King Philip had provided a mighty Navie in the Haven of Sluce, consisting of two hundred sail of Ships, (besides many Gallies) and two thousand armed men in the Port ready to encounter him upon his landing: whereof King Edward being advertized, prepares the like number of Ships, and sets out to Sea upon Midsummer Eve; is met the morrow after with a Navie likewise from the North parts, conducted by Sir Robert Morley, and encounters his enemy who lay to intercept him with such force and courage, and such advantage of Wind and Sun, that he utterly defeated their whole Navie, took and sunk all their ships, slew thirty thousand men, and landed with as great glory, as such a victory, (the greatest that ever before was gotten by the English at Sea) could yield, though King Edward himself was there wounded with an Arrow in the thigh. Most of the French, rather than to endure the Arrows of the English, or be taken, desperately leapt into the Sea; whereupon the French Kings Jester, set on to give notice to him of this overthrow, (which being so ill news, none else would willingly impart unto him) said, and oftentimes repeated it in the Kings hearing; Cowardly English men, Dastardly English men, faint-hearted English men! the King at length asked him why? for that (said he) they durst not leap out of their Ships into the Sea, as our brave French men did. By which speech the King apprehended a notion of this overthrow: which the French attributed to Nicolas Butcher, one of their chief Commanders, who had armed his Ships with men of base condition, (content with small pay) and refused Gentlemen and sufficient soldiers, in regard they required greater wages: And indeed it often happens that the avarice of Commanders is the occasion of great defeats.

King Edward's Army of five and fifty thousand defeated, King Edward sends a challenge to the King of France, and the King of France's Answer.

By this victory King Edward gained a free entrance into Flanders, and presently went and besieged Tournay with an Army of five and fifty thousand, but was so valiantly encountered by the Duke of Burgundie and the Earl of Armignack, that they routed his Army, and slew four thousand upon the place: which so enraged King Edward, that two dayes after, he sent a challenge to King Philip to meet him in a single combat, or with an hundred against as many, before the walls of Tournay. King Philip answers, that his challenge being made to Philip de Valois, with mention of King, he took it not to be to him, who was truly King of France; but he wished him to remember the Homage he had done him at Amiens, and the wrong he did to the Christian world, by his troublesome courses to hinder him from his voyage intended to the Holy-Land. Besides this answer in writing, he sends to him by word of mouth; that by his challenge he hazarded nothing of his own, but exposed only the Dominion of another, which was against all reason: but if he would set his Kingdom of England, though much meaner, against his of France, he would then accept the challenge, and meet him in the field in single combat. But this King Edward would not hearken to, for as he was valiant to make the challenge, so he was circumspect to look to the conditions. But hereupon he continues his siege of Tournay; to the relief whereof King Philip sends all the forces he could possibly make by himself or his friends; and after the siege had continued three moneths, partly by mediation of Robert King of Sicilie, but chiefly by the Lady Jane of Valois, sister to King Philip, and mother of King Edward's wife, (who had vowed her self a Nun; but to do this good office, travelled from one to another) a Truce was concluded for a year, and both their Armies are dissolved.

After this, King Edward returning into England, was advertized how the Scots after many other places gained, had besieged the Castle of Striveling; for relief whereof, the King makes all the haste he can; and yet before he could come, it was by force of battery, compelled to render it self upon conditions. Then King Edward being at Berwick, passeth to New-Castle upon Tyne, where he stays a moneth, waiting for his provision that was to come by Sea; but that being driven into other parts by tempest, he makes a Truce with the Scots for three or four months, and then returns home. In the time of this Truce, the Scots send to King David, to come and govern the Kingdom in his own person; who thereupon taking his leave of the King of France, with whom he had remained seven years, he with his wife Joan, King Edward's sister, returns into Scotland; where, after he had been most honourably received by the Prince of Orkney, and the other Lords and Barons of the Kingdom, as soon as the Truce was ended, with a strong Army enters Northumberland, passing on to New-Castle upon Tyne, where he plants his Camp. Of this Castle, John Neville was left governour by King Edward, who sending out certain companies panies, took the Earl Murray prisoner, and with the slaughter of divers of his men, and rich booties, returned back to his Castle; which so incensed King David, that he assaulted the Castle as a man enraged, but finding it too strong for his taking, he then passed into the Province of Durham, where he used all kinds of cruelty, first upon the Countrey, and then upon the City, killing men, women, and children, Clergy, and others; burning and destroying houses and Churches, and utterly defacing it. From thence he passeth on to the Castle of Salisbury, which Castle belonged to William Montacute Earl of Salisbury in right of his wife, but himself being then prisoner in France, only his Countess, and one William Montacute a Cousin of his, was in the Castle. This William perceiving the Scottish horse to be so over-charged with pillage, that they were scarce able to go; issues out of the Castle with forty horse, sets upon them, kills two hundred, and takes sixscore, whom he brings with their rich pillage, into the Castle. King David soon after with his whole Army arrived, but hearing of King Edwards coming (who certified of these things, made all the haste he could) he retires himself from thence; and King Edward finding him gone before he came, yet would needs go in and visit the Countess: of whom, as soon as he saw her, he was so enamoured, that he laid more battery to her chastity, then King David had done to her Castle; but finding it inexpugnable, after a day and a night he left it, and followed after the Scots, with whom for three daies together he had many skirmishes till at last a Truce was concluded for two years; and amongst other conditions, William Earl of Salisbury, prisoner with the King of France, was set at liberty in exchange for the Earl Murray, prisoner with the King of England.

About this time another difference fell out between the Kings of England and France. John Earl of Montford laid claim to the Duchy of Britain, but in the quarrel was taken prisoner by the King of France: his Lady sends to King Edward for succour; which King Edward grants upon condition that a marriage be made between his daughter Mary and the Earl of Montford's son; which being agreed on (he sends over to her aid, first, Walter de Manny a valiant Knight, and afterward Robert d'Artois; but while his Army was preparing, King Edward was informed by Edward Bayliol, the pretended King of Scotland, and Governour of Berwick, that the Scots had not kept the conditions of the Truce; whereupon King Edward draws a great Army to Berwick, with a purpose to do great matters, but nothing was done, for a new Truce was again concluded for two years. By this time Robert d'Artois had made ready his Army, and taking with him the Countess of Montford, the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, and Suffolk, and many other Barons; after great tempests and encounters at Sea, lands safely at last near to Vannes, which was held by the French, and laying siege to the City, with the assistance of Walter de Manny, who came unto him, after many assaults, at last he took it, to the great joy of the Countess of Montford, though she held it not long; for certain resolute French Knights assaulted it soon after, and recovered it from the English. In which action many Lords, were slain or wounded, and particularly Robert d'Artois himself; who passing over into England, for the better curing of his wounds, soon after died, and was buried in Pauls Church in London. And now King Edward himself with a strong Army passeth over into Britain, and plants his Camp before the City of Vannes, where was like to have been a cruel battel; but in the instant, there came from Pope Clement the sixth, two Cardinals, the Bishops of Preseste and Tusculum; who upon certain conditions concluded a Peace; amongst other conditions, this was one; that the City of Vannes should be delivered to King Philip, and thereupon John Earl of Montford should be set at liberty, but yet with this charge, not to go into Britain: which promise notwithstanding, he kept not but went presently and besieged a Town in Britain, though he were forced to retire, and died shortly after. But the Truce cracked thus, as it were, by Montford, was afterward absolutely broken by King Edward, though he charged the breach of it upon King Philip, and King Philip upon him: But howsoever, broken it was; and Henry of Lancaster Earl of Derby, with divers other Earls and Barons, is sent into France, who won many Towns in Gascoyne, and in the Counties of Perigord and Tholouse, and then went to winter at Burdeaux. And afterward, in May following, pursuing his victories, he won many more Towns; and amongst others, the great Town of Reoll. After this again, he took Montpesut, Mauore, Villefranche, and many other Towns; and at last the great City of Angoulesme, and then came to winter again at Burdeaux.

Of his Acts together with the Prince.

KING Philip informed of so many great losses, assembles a mighty Army, no less then a hundred thousand men, with which he recovers Miremont, and Villefranche, and then proceeded to besiege Angoulesme; whom the Earl Derby having not forces sufficient to encounter, King Edward (leaving for Wardens of England in his absence, the Lords Percy and Nevill) goeth himself in person with an Army (as Ercostard faith) of fourscore thousand men at Arms, and ten thousand Archers, besides those out of Wales, and Ireland; taking with him his son, the Prince of Wales, and Duke of Guyenne, being then but of the age of fifteen years. It may be thought preposterous in King Edward, to put his son to be a Soldier before he was come to be a man; but it seems he had a longing to try his sons valour in the bud, and perhaps was loath to omit any thing that might give any countenance to this battel, in which the two Kingdoms were laid as it were at stake; but howsoever, taking him along with him, him, and almost all the Lords of his Kingdom, he takes shipping, and lands at Normandy, where at the first setting his foot on ground, he took such a fall, that the blood gushed out at his nose; which the Barons took for an ill sign, but the King took it for a good: saying, it was a sign that the Land desired to have him: and indeed he presently took the Towns of Harslew, Moulbourg, Carenton, and Saint Lo, and afterward the City of Caen it self; and from thence passed to the County of Eu, sacked and pillaged it, as also the City of Gyffort, Vernon, Meulan, and Boulebourne to the City of Poissy. King Philip all this while stayed about Paris, as looking for King Edward to give him battel there; and for that purpose had planted his Camp near to Saint Germans; but King Edward deceived him: for going from Poissy, he passed into Picardie and Ponthieu, where he took and burned many Towns and Castles; and then passed the River of Somme, though not without danger: for King Philip had sent thither Gundemar de Fay with a thousand horse, and six thousand foot, to stop his passage: King Edward notwithstanding resolves to pass, or perish, and plungeth foremost into the River; crying out, They who love me will follow me: at which voyce, every man strove who should go foremost, and so the shore was presently gained by the English. Gundemar astonished with his bold adventure, astonisheth his people with his fearful countenance: so that the English encountering the French all in disorder, put them to flight. King Philip enraged with this dishonour, resolves to revenge it; and presently provokes King Edward to battel. King Edward had now encamped in a Village called Cressy, his Army consisted of thirty thousand men, which he divided into three battalies: the first was led by the young Prince of Wales, with whom were joynted the Earl of Warwick, Geoffry of Harecourt, Thomas Holland, Richard Stafford, John Chandos, Robert Neville, and many other Knights and Gentlemen, to the number of eight hundred men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a thousand Welsh. In the second were the Earls of Northampton and of Arundell, the Lords Rosse, Basset, and others, to the number of eight hundred men at Arms, and twelve hundred Archers. In the third the King was himself, having about him seven hundred men at Arms, and three thousand Archers. The battels thus ordered, mounted on a white Hobby, he rode from rank to rank to view them; encouraging every man that day to have regard to his right and honour. The French Kings Army was far greater, consisting of above sixty thousand combatants well armed; whereof the chief were Charles Duke of Alanson the Kings brother, John of Luxemburgh King of Bohemia, Charles de Blois the Kings Nephew, Ralph Duke of Lorraine, the Earls of Flanders, Nevers, Sancerre; of Barons, Knights, and Gentlemen, about three thousand. The Vaunt-guard he commits to his brother the Count de Alanson, the Reer to the Earl of Savoy, the main battel he leads himself; his heat out of confidence of victory, was so great, that it scarce permitted time for a little counsel what was fit to be done. The old King of Bohemia advised that the Army should take some repast, and that the Infantry consisting of Genoveses (which were above fifteen thousand Cross-bowes, and sure men) should make the first Front, and the Cavalry to follow; which was agreed on. But the Count of Alanson, contrary to this order, took it ill that the Genoveses were in the first rank, and in fury caused them to change place, which bred that discontentment, that it irritated them more against the Leader, then the enemy; besides, there fell at the instant, such a shoure of rain, as dissolved their strings, and made their Bowes of little use; and at the breaking up of the shoure, the Sun shone full in the face of the French (dazling their sight) and on the back of the English, as if all made for them. King Edward who had gotten to a Windmill, beholding as from a Sentinel, the countenance of the enemy, and discovering the disturbance made by the change of place; instantly sends to charge that part, without giving them time to re-accommodate themselves; whereupon the discontented Genoveses recoil, which the Count de Alanson perceiving, he comes on with the horse, and in great rage cries out, On, on, Let us make way upon the bellies of these Genoveses, who do but hinder us: and instantly pricks on with a full career through the midt of them, followed by the Earls of Lorraine and Savoy, and never staies till he came up to the English battail, where the Prince was; the fight grew hot and doubtful, in so much as the Commanders about the Prince send to King Edward to come up with his power to aid him. The King asks the messengers whether his Son were slain or hurt: who answering, No, but that he was like to be over-laid: well then (said the King) return, and tell them who sent you, that so long as my son is alive, they send no more to me what ever happen; for I will that the honour of this day be his. And so being left to try for themselves, they wrought it out with the Sword; the rather because the French King having his horse slain under him, and in danger to be trodden to death, had he not been recovered by the Lord Beaumont was to the great discouragement of his people, withdrawn out of the field: whereof notice being once taken by the English, the day was soon after theirs, and the greatest victory they ever had yet against the French, and so bloody, as there is no mention made of any one prisoner taken in the battail, but all slain our-right; only some few troops that held together, saved themselves by retiring to places near adjoining. The French King himself with a small company, got to Bray in the night, and approaching the walls, and the guard asking who goes there? he answered, the Fortune of France. By his voyce he was known, and thereupon received into the Town, with the tears and lamentations of his people. The number of the slain are certified to be thirty thousand: the chief whereof, were Charles de Alanson, John Duke of Burbon, Ralph Earl of Lorraine, Lewis Earl of Flanders, Jacques Dauphin de Viennois, son to Imbert, (who after gave Dauphin to the Crown of France) the Earls of Sancerre, Harcourt, and many other Earls, Barons, and Gentlemen, to the number of fifteen hundred. This memorable Victory happened upon the Saturday after Bartholomew day,

The King of France assembles an Army of a hundred thousand men, and with them recovers some Towns.

A in the year 1346. The next day, early in the mornings, being Sunday, he sent out 300 Lances, and 2000 Archers, to discover what was become of the enemy, who found great Troops coming from Abbeville, Saint Requir, Roan, and Beauvoies (ignorant of what had happened) led by the Archbishop of Roan, and the Prior of France: whom they likewise defeated, and slew seven thousand.

But this was not all the Victories that fell to King Edward that year; there was another of no less importance gotten in England, by the Queen and his people at home, against the Scots; who being set on by the French, to divert the war there, entered upon this Kingdom with three score thousand men, (as our writers report) assuring himself of success, in regard (as he supposed) of the main strength thereof was now gone into France; but he found it otherwise: For the Lords of the North, as Gilbert de Umphreville, the Earl of Angus, Henry Piercy, Ralph Neville, William Dayncourt, with the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, and others of the Clergy, gathered so great Forces, and so well ordered them, by the animation of the Queen, who was there in person) as fighting a great battail at Neuils Crofs in the Bishoprick of Durham, they utterly defeated this great Army, took David their King prisoner, with the Earls of Fife, Monteth, Murray, Sutherland, the Lord Douglas, the Archbishop of Saint Andrews, and others; and put to the sword fifteen thousand Scots. This victory also fell upon a Saturday, six weeks after that of Cressy. He that took King David prisoner, was one John Copland, an Esquire of Northumberland, whom King Edward rewarded with five hundred pound land a year, and made him a Bannerer. And as if all concurred to make this year Triumphant, the aids sent to the Countess of Montford in Brittain, led by Thomas Dagworth a valiant Knight, overthrew and took prisoner, Charles de Blois, Pretender to that Duchy, and with him Monsieur la Vall, the Lords Rochford, Beaumont, Loyacque; with many other Barons, Knights and Esquires: Where were slain the Lord de la Vall, Father to him that was taken, Vicomte Roban, Monsieur de Chasteau, Bryan de Malestrois, de Quintin, de Direvell, besides many other Knights and Esquires to the number of seven hundred. And now King Edward without meddling with the great Cities of Amiens and Abbeville, marched on directly, and sits down before Callice, a Town of more importance for England, and the Gate to all the rest: Wherein John de Viennes Marshall of France, and the Lord de Andreghen, (a great man in his time) commanded: The King being to make it a Winter siege, erected for him and his people, so many houses and lodges, that it was named New-Callice.

D All that Winter King Edward lay without any molestation by the French King, who was busied at home in his own State about raising of money; wherewith supplied at last, he raiseth an Army and approacheth Callice, but finds no way open to come to relieve it. The King of England was both Master of the Haven, and possit all other waies that were passable; and the Flemings his friends had besieged Aire; to oppose whom, John Duke of Normandy is sent for out of Guyenne: who departing, leaves Henry of Lancaster Earl of Derby, Master of the Field, and he having an Army consisting of twelve hundred men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and three thousand other Foot, takes in most of the Towns of Xaintoigne, and Poiston; and in the end besieged and sacked Poitiers, and then returns to Bordeaux, with more pillage then his people could well bear: Thus the English prosper every where, and the French suffer. During this siege of Callice, (in which some think King Edward first used Guns) the Flemings send to King Edward, to make a marriage between his Daughter Isabell and their Lord, the young Count Lewis; to which the King consented, but the Duke of Brabant gets the King of France, to make the match for a Daughter of his; The Flemings prefs their Lord with the match of England; but he absolutely refuseth it, saying, he would never marry a Daughter of him, that had killed his Father, though he would give him half his Kingdom. This answer so incensed the Flemings, that they put their Lord in Prison, till with long durance he at last consented; and thereupon King Edward and his Queen, with their Daughter Isabell, come over to Berghes, and there the young Earl is affianced to her; but returning afterwards into Flanders, as soon as he found opportunity, he went to King Philip, and left his affianced Lady unmarried; and married afterwards a Daughter of the Duke of Brabant. But all this while the siege of Callice was continued; and King Philip not being able to come to relieve it, solicits King Edward to appoint some place of battail, and he would meet him. But King Edward returns answer, that if he would make his own way, to come thither to him, there he should find him, but from thence he would not part; having lain there so long to his great labour and expence, and being now so near the point of gaining the place. Two Cardinals are sent from the Pope, to mediate a Peace, but could effect nothing, so as the French King was forced to break up his Army and retire to Paris, leaving Callice to the mercy of the Besieger: which when the Town understood, they sent to desire Parle, had it granted, and therein received this final answer, that fix of the chief Burgeses should be sent to the King bare-headed, and bare-footed, in their shirts, with halsters about their necks, the keys of the Town and Cattle in their hands, and submit themselves to the Kings will; the rest he was content to take to mercy. This seemed a hard condition and much difficult; who should be those six: but one rising up, and out of love to his Countrey offering himself to be one, the six were soon made up; for now by his example every one strove to be of the number: who presenting themselves before the King, he commanded them instantly to be put to death. Great supplication was made by his Lords for their lives, but the King would not be drawn to alter his sentence, till the Queen, great with childe, fell on her knees, and with tears obtained pardon for them; which done, she caused them to be clothed, and besides a good repast, gives to every one of them six Nobles a piece. But though the King in this sentence shewed severity, yet in an Act before he had shewed mercy; For when Victuals began to fail in the Town, and all unuseful persons, as old men, women, and children, were put out of the Gates; he forced them not back again as he might have done, thereby the sooner to consume their store; but suffered them to pass through his Army, gave them to eat, and two pence a piece to all of them. And thus was that strong Town of Calice gotten, the third day of August, in the year 1347. after eleven months siege, and continued afterward in possession of the English two hundred and ten years. All the Inhabitants are turned out, but only one Priest, and two old men, to inform of the Orders of the Town: and a Colony of English, amongst which seven and thirty good Families out of London, is sent to inhabit it; the King and Queen enter the Town triumphantly, and make their abode there, till the Queen was brought a bed of her Daughter Margaret. The King made Governour of the Town Amery of Pavia a Lombard, whom he had brought up from his Infancy, and then with his Queen returns into England; at which time the Princes Electours send to signify, that they had chosen him King of the Romans, but the King refused to accept it, as being an honour out of his way, and scarce comparable with his State at home.

After this, Truces were made by mediation, from one time to another, for the space of two years, in which time, Geoffry de Charmy Captain of Saint Omers, agreed with Amery of Pavia, whom King Edward had left Governour of Calice, to render it up for twenty thousand Crowns: which King Edward hearing of, sent to Amery, and charged him with this perfidiousness, whereupon Amery comes to the King, and humbly desiring pardon, promiseth to handle the matter so as shall be to the Kings advantage; and thereupon is sent back to Calice. The King, the night before the time of agreement arrives with three hundred men at Arms, and six hundred Archers: Monsieur de Charmy sets out likewise the same night with Saint Omers with his forces, and sent a hundred men before with the Crowns to Amery: the men are let in at a Potern Gate, the Crowns received; and assured to be all weight: which done, the Gates of the Town are opened, and out marches the King before day, to encounter Monsieur de Charmy: who perceiving himself betrayed, defended himself the best he could, and put King Edward to a hard bickering, who for that he would not be known there in person, put himself and the Prince under the Colours of the Lord Walter Manny, and was twice beaten down on his knees by Monsieur de Riboumont, a hardy Knight, (with whom he fought hand to hand) and yet recovered, and in the end took Riboumont prisoner. Charmy was likewise taken, and all his Forces defeated. King Edward the night after (which was the first of the new year) feasted with the Prisoners, and gave Riboumont in honour of his valour, a rich Chaplet of Pearl, which himself wore on his head (for a new years gift) forgave him his ransom, and set him at liberty. But the English not long after, in the like practise, had better success, and got the Castle of Guynes, (a piece of great importance near Calice) for a sum of money, given to one Beaconroy a French man. Of which Castle when the French King demanded restitution in regard of the Truce, King Edward returns answer, that for things bought and sold between their people, there was no exception; and so held it.

About this time Philip King of France died, leaving his Son John to succeed him; in the beginning of whose reign, Humbert Prince of Dauphin, dying without Issue, made him his Heir, and thereupon Charles King John's Son was created the first Dauphin of France: from whence it grew to be a custom, that the King of France his Heir should always be called Dauphin of France. About this time also the Duke of Lancaster was to perform a combat, upon a challenge with a Prince of Bohemia; but when they were entered the Lists, and had taken their Oaths, King John interposed and made them friends. And now when after many means of mediation, no peace could be concluded between the two Kings; the Prince of Wales being now grown a man, is appointed by Parliament to go into Gascony with a thousand men at Arms, two thousand Archers, and a great number of Welshmen, and in June following he sets forth with three hundred Sail, attended with the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, and Oxford, the Lord Chandos, the Lord James Audley, Sir Robert Knolles, Sir Francis Hall, with many others. About Michaelmas following, the King himself passeth over to Calice with another Army, taking with him two of his Sons, Lionel of Antwerp, now Earl of Ulster, in right of his Wife, and John of Gaunt Earl of Richmond. There met him at Calice of Mercenaries out of Germany, Flanders, and Brabant, a thousand men at Arms, so that his Army consisted of three thousand men at Arms, and two thousand Archers on horse-back, besides Archers on foot. The City of London sent three hundred men at Arms, and five hundred Archers, all in one livery, at their own charge; but all this great Army effected nothing at that time, by reason the King of France would not be drawn to any Encounter, and had so disturnished the Countrey of all provisions, that the King of England was forced to return. King Edward solicited by the King of Navarre to aid him against the King of France, sends over the Duke of Lancaster with four thousand men at Arms, who wins many Towns; and the Prince enters Guienne, passeth over Languedoc to Toulouse, Narbonne, Burges, without any Encounter, sacks, spoils, and destroys where he goes, and laden with booties returns to Bordeaux. The French King thus assailed on all sides, gathers all the power he possibly could, and first makes against his enemies in Normandy, recovers many of his lost Towns, and was likely to have there prevailed, but that he was drawn of force to oppose this fresh Invader, the Prince of Wales, who was come up into Tourayne, against whom he brings his whole Army,

A Army, consisting of above threescore thousand: whereupon the Prince, whose Forces were not likely to be able to encounter him (being six for one) was advised to retire again to Bordeaux. But the French King to prevent this course follows; and within two Leagues of Poitiers, harries him at a great advantage: at which instant two Cardinals came from the Pope to mediate a Peace. But the French King supposing he had his enemy now in his mercy, would accept of no other conditions, but that the Prince should deliver him four Hostages, and as vanquished, render himself and his Army to his discretion. The Prince was content to restore unto him what he had gained upon him, but without prejudice of his honour, wherein he said he stood accountable to his Father, and to his Countrey. But the French King would abate nothing of his demands, as making himself sure of victory: and thereupon was instantly ready to set upon the Prince: who seeing himself reduced to this straight, takes what advantage he could of the ground, and providently got the benefit of Vines, Shrubs, and Bushes, on that part he was like to be assailed, to impeter and intangle the French Horse, which he saw were to come furiously upon him. The success answered his expectation, for the Cavalry of his Enemies upon their first assault were so wrapped and encumbered amongst the Vines, that his Archers galled and annoyed them at their pleasure. For the French King to give the honour of the day to his Cavalry, employed them only without his Infantry; so as they being disordered and put to rout, his whole Army came utterly to be defeated. In this battle were taken prisoners King John himself, with his youngest Son Philip, by Dennis de Morbecque, a Knight of Artois; Jacques de Bourbon, Conte de Ponthieu; the Archbishop of Sens; John de Artois; Conte de Eu; Charles de Artois; his brother Conte de Longueville; John de Melun; Count de Tankerville; the Counts of Vendosme, Vaudemont, Estampes, Salisburg, Dampmartin and La Roche; also John de Ceintrey, accounted (as Froissard saith) the best Knight of France, with many other Lords, besides two thousand Knights and Gentlemen; inasmuch as the Conquerours holding it not safe to retain so many, let many of them go. The French who can give best account of their own losses, report there died in this battle, a thousand seven hundred Gentlemen, amongst which were fifty two Bannerets: the most eminent Peter de Bourbon, the Duke of Ardenne, Countable of France, Jehan de Clermont Marthal, Geoffry de Charmy, high Chamberlain; the Bishop of Chulms, the Lord of Landas, of Pons, and of Chamblay. There escaped from this battle three of the French Kings Sons, (for he brought them all thither) Charles Prince Dauphin; Louis after Duke of Anjou; and John Duke of Berry; all great actors in the time following. The special great men of the English in this fight, were the Earls of Warwick, Suffolk, Salisbury, Oxford, Stafford; the Lords Cobham, Spenser, Barkley, Basset: of Gascony, Le Capital de Beuff; the Lords, Pymper, Chamouin, and others. The Lord James Audley won honour both by his valour, and his bounty; for having vowed to be foremost in this fight, he performed his word, and sealed it with many wounds: for which the Prince having rewarded him with the gift of five hundred Marks Fee-simple in England, he presently gave it to four of his Esquires; whereupon the Prince demanding whether he accepted not his gift? he answered, that these men had deserved the same as well as himself, and had more need of it: with which reply the Prince was so well pleased, that he gave him five hundred Marks more in the same kind. A rare example, where desert in the Subject, and reward in the Prince, strive which should be the greater.

E But here great strife arose between many, who should be the man that took King John prisoner; but the Prince commanded them to forbear their claims, till they came into England; where the matter being heard, it was adjudged by King John's own testimony, that one Sir Dennis Morbecque of Saint Omers had taken him prisoner: for which service the Prince rewarded him with a thousand Marks.

And now, though King John had the misfortune to fall into the hands of his enemy, yet he had the happiness to fall into the hands of a Noble enemy; for Prince Edward used him with such respect and observance, that he could not find much difference between his captivity and liberty. After the battle, which was fought the nineteenth day of September, in the year 1357. Prince Edward leads King John and the captive Lords, to Bordeaux, where he retains them till the Spring following; but sends present news of this victory to his Father: who thereupon causeth a general thanksgiving all England over eight dayes together: and in May following, King John being brought over with the Prince, then brought over by him, is lodged at the Savoy, a Palace belonging to Henry Duke of Lancaster, and the fairest at that time about London. And King Edward, as though he thought it honour enough to have one King his Prisoner at once, at the suit of his Sister Queen Joan, sets her Husband David King of Scots at liberty, after he had been prisoner in England eleven years, but not without paying a ranfome, which was a hundred thousand Marks to be paid in ten years.

After this, by mediation of Cardinals sent by the Pope, a Truce for two years is concluded between the two Kingdoms of England and France, and in the time of this Truce, Articles of Peace between the two Kings are propounded: King Edward requires the Duchies of Normandy and Guyenne, the Counties of Poitou, Touraine, Maine, and Anjou, with all their appurtenances as large as King Richard the first held them, and many other Provinces besides, and to hold them all without Homage or any other service; to which Articles King John (weary of imprisonment) assents and seals, but the Dauphin and Council of France utterly reject it: whereupon King Edward in great displeasure resolves to make an end of this work with the sword, and to take possession of the Kingdom of France; and leaving his younger Son Thomas Governour of his Kingdom at home, with a Fleet of eleven hundred sail, and taking all the great Lords of the Realm with him, he passeth over to Calles, dividing his Army into three battles, whereof one he commits to the Prince of Wales, another to the Duke of Lancaster, and the third he leads himself; and first marching through Picardy, where he takes in many Towns; he plants his liege afterward before Rheims; but having spent there six or seven weeks without effecting any thing, he passeth thence, and taketh in the Cities of Sens and Nevers; the Duchy of Burgoyne redeems it self from spoil, with paying two hundred thousand Florens of gold: then he marcheth up to Paris, and plants his Camp within two small Leagues of the Town, where he honoured 400. Esquires and Gentlemen with the order of Knighthood: but when Sir Walter de Manny had made a Bravado before the Gates of the City, and the King saw that the Dauphin would by no provocations be drawn out to battel; he raiseth his siege, and returns into Britain to refresh his Army, from thence he marcheth towards Charvres with a purpose to besiege that City, and though great offers were made him by the French, and Commissioners from the Pope solicited him with all earnestness to accept them, yet neither they, nor the Duke of Lancaster's persuasions could prevail with him, till a terrible storm of hail with Thunder and Lightning fell upon his Army, which so terrified him, being a warning, as it were from Heaven, that he presently vowed to make Peace with the French King upon any reasonable conditions, as shortly after he did at a Treaty of Brignay near to Chartres, upon these Articles: that the Feifs of Thouars, and Belleville, the Duchy of Guyenne, comprising Gascoyne, Poitou, Saintonge, Limousin, Perigord, Quercy, Rhodes, Angoulême, and Rochell, together with the Counties of Guynes and Callice, and some other places with the Homages of the Lords within those Territories, should be to the King of England, who besides was to have three millions of Crowns of gold; whereof six hundred thousand in hand, four hundred thousand the year following, and the rest in two years after: and for this the King of England, and his Son the Prince of Wales, for them and their Successors for ever, should renounce all their right pretended to the Crown of France, the Duchy of Normandy, the Countries of Touraine, Anjou, Mayne, the Homage and Sovereignty of Brittain, and the Earldom of Flanders; and within three weeks King John to be rendred at Callice, at the charge of the King of England, except the expences of his house: For assurance of which accord, should be given into his hand five and twenty of the greatest Dukes and Lords of France for Hostages. The Scots not to be aided by the French King, nor the Flemings by the English. This accord and final Peace signed by both Kings, was ratified by their two eldest Sons, Edward and Charles, and sworn unto by the Nobility of both Kingdoms. The Hostages are delivered to King Edward, who brought them into England; and thereupon King John is honourably conducted to Callice, after he had remained prisoner in England near about five years: but being come to Callice, he was detained there above three monthes, till the money which he was to pay in hand, could be provided: and for providing the rest he was put to hard shifts, being fain to give the Jews leave to dwell in France for twenty years; paying twelve Florens a man at the entry, and six every year after. At this time the Prince by dispensation, marries the Countess of Kent, daughter to Edmund, brother to Edward the second; and his Father investing him with the Duchy of Aquitain, he was now Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitain, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester and Kent: and not long after, with the Princess his wife, he passeth over into France, and keeps his Court at Burdeaux.

This was now the year 1362. and the fiftieth year of King Edward's age, wherein for a Jubilee, he shews himself extraordinarily gracious to his people; freely pardoning many offences, releasing prisoners, revoking exiles; with many other expressions of his love and bounty. The year following was famous for three Kings coming into England: John King of France, Peter King of Cyprus, and David King of Scots. The King of Cyprus came to solicit King Edward to joyn with other Princes in the Holy War, but receives only royal entertainment and excuses. The King of Scots came for business and visitation, but why the King of France came is not so certain, whether it were about taking order for his Hostages, or to satisfie King Edward for breach of some Articles, or else for love to the Countess of Salisbury; or perhaps out of a desire to let England see his Majesty, being at liberty, which had been darkened before by the cloud of captivity; but whatsoever the cause of his coming was, the cause of his staying (at least, of longer staying than he meant) was a mortal sickness, whereof (having lien all the Winter at the Savoy) in March or April following he died; and his body conveyed over into France, was buried at Saint Denis with his Ancestours.

The Prince of Wales was now grown famous all the Christian world over, and the man to whom all wronged Princes seem to appeal, and to flie for succour: for which end there came at this time to his Court, James King of Majorque; and happened to come at a time when the Princess lay in; and thereupon he and Richard King of Navarre were taken to be Godfathers to his Son Richard: For the like assistance also, there came at the same time to him, Peter King of Castille, driven out of his Kingdom by the French, in favour to Peter King of Aragon: and Prince Edward, partly out of charity to succour a distressed Prince, and partly out of policy, to keep his Souldiers in exercise; undertakes the enterprize, and was so prosperous in it, that with one battel (having but 30000 against a 100000) he put King Peter in possession of his Kingdom though he was ill rewarded for his labour; for the ungrateful King would not so much as pay his Souldiers; and it is memorable which Froissard writes; that of the enemies were slain and drowned above 2000. and of the Princes party not above 40. But yet an unfortunate journey for the Prince, for though he came back with victory, yet he brought back with him such an indisposition of body, that he

A was never thoroughly well after: not perhaps by poyson, nor given him by his Brother the Duke of Lancaster, though both were suspected; but there were causes of dissembling him enough besides, the Countrey, the season, the action it self; and it may be more marvelled that his Souldiers came home so well, then that he came so ill; but howsoever, being now returned, there was presently to his indisposition of body, added discontentment of mind: for not having means to pay his Souldiers, which forced him to wink at that which he could not chuse but see, and feeling, grieve at, how they preyed upon the Countrey, and thereupon how the Countrey murmured against him; and now to stop this murmuring, his Chancellour, the Bishop of Rhodes, devised a new imposition, of leaving a Frank for every Chimney, and this to continue for five years to pay the Princes debts: but this imposition made the murmuring the more; for though some part of his Dominions, as the Poitevins, Xaintons, and Limousins in a sort consented to it, yet the Count of Armignack, the Count of Comminges, the Viscount of Carmagn, and many others so much distasted it, that they complained thereof to the King of France, as to their Supreme Lord; who upon examination finding their complaint to be just, he thereupon by advice of his Councel, summons Prince Edward to appear in person to answer the complaint: whereunto Prince Edward made answer, that if he must needs appear, he would bring three score thousand men in Arms to appear with him; and had certainly brought his Army that Summer against Paris, if he had not fallen into symphones of a Droplie which (Walsingham faith) was wrought by enchantment. But upon this answer of the Prince, King Charles sends defiance to King Edward, who thereupon prepares Arms both by Sea and Land to oppose him. The French enters upon the Territories of the Prince, and defeats divers of his Troops; in revenge whereof John Chandos the Princes Lieutenant assaults Terriers in the Province of Tholouse, and takes it. The Count of Perigord assaults Royanville in Quercy, and put all the English to the sword: in revenge whereof James Audley Seneschal of Poitou, assaults the City of Broiss, and takes it. In the mean time Robert Knols by some called Robin, and by others Arnould, or Reynould Knoll, had drawn Ferdinand de Albert to the party of the English; and thereupon went and encamped before the Fort of Darcenell in Quercy, which John Chandos understanding, went also and joyned with him in the siege; but finding they could do no good there, they removed and besieged the City of Damme: and when they could do no good there neither, they marched forward, took the Fort of Froyns, Rochevandon, and villefranche; and that done, returned to the Prince at Angoulesme. At the same time the Earls of Cambridge and Pembroke, having spent nine weeks at the siege of Boreille, at last took it; but other Captains of the English did yet more, for they scaled Belleperche in the Province of Bourbon, where the Mother of the Duke of Bourbon, and the Queen of France was, and take her prisoner.

About this time, Philippa Queen of England, King Edward's Wife died, and was buried at Westminster; but this hindered not the proceeding of the English in France; the Earl of Pembroke enters Anjou, where he takes many Towns: the Duke of Lancaster doth the like about Callice, and marching forward, plants his Camp before Harfleur, with a purpose to burn the King of France his Navy, but being watched by the Count Saint Poll, was forced to forbear that design; and so passing other waies, and spoiling all the places where he passed, he returned to Callice. Winter now was drawing on, and John Chandos desiring to recover the Abby of Saint Silyn in Poitou, which not long before had been betrayed to the French; was in the enterprize discovered, and being assaulted by greater Forces, was slain in the place, to the great grief of the Prince of Wales, and of the English Lords: but dying without issue, his Estate, which amounted to four hundred thousand Franks, came to the Prince. At this time the Dukes of Anjou and Berry, with two great Armies enter upon the Territories of the Prince of Wales; whereof the Prince advertised, affembles Forces to oppose them: but when the news was brought him of the taking of Limouges, he was so much troubled at it, by reason the Bishop of that place was his Gossp, and one in whom he specially had affiance; that he resolved to recover it at any price, and not to spare a man that had any hand in rendring it up: and thereupon taking it by force, he commanded to sack and pillage it, and would not be stayed by the cries of the people, calling themselves down at his feet; till passing through the Town, he perceived three French Captains, who themselves alone had withstood the assault of his victorious Army, and moved with the consideration of their valour, he then abated his anger; and for their sakes, granted mercy to all the Inhabitants. So much is vertue even in an enemy, respected by generous minds. In the mean time David King of Scots died without issue; and Robert Stewart his Nephew succeeded him in the Kingdom, and was Crowned at Scone. At this time Robert Knolls with a great Army is sent into France, where making many attennps, with valour enough, but with little success, he was coming home, though with no gain, yet with no loss: till Bertrand de Guisclhyn assaulting him, slew the most part of his men; and so this great Army on a sudden came to nothing. It seems Knolls his action was the less successful, by reason of some young Lords that went with him, scornful to be under his command, as being now a new man, and risen from a low estate, were refractory to his directions: And indeed what can a General do, if he have not as well reputation of person, as of place?

And now the Prince of Wales, his eldest Son Edward dying at Burdeaux, the Prince with his Wife, and other Son Richard, came over into England; at which time the valiant Knight Walter de Manny died at London, and was buried in the Monastery of the Chartreux which he had builded; leaving one only Daughter, married to John Earl of Pembroke. This Earl of Pembroke was soon after sent Governour into Aquitain, but set upon by the way by Spaniards in favour of the French, was by them taken prisoner, and carried with others into Spain: who being chained together, as the manner is, one Evans a Welsh Fugitive, who gave himself out for the right Heir of Wales, came upon him, foolishly playing upon him with scornful language, as though to insult over another mans misery, could serve for a cordial to mitigate his own. And now upon the taking of this Earl, the Princes Dominions in France, are either taken away, or fall away faster then they were gotten; Gueschlyn enters Poitou, takes Montmorillon; Chauvigny, Lusack, and Moncontour: straight after follows the countrey of Aunis, or Xantaigne, and the rest of Poitou; then Saint Maxent, Neele, Aulnai, then Benaon, Marant, Burgers, Fontency, and at last they came to Tonouras, where the most part of the Lords of Poitou, that held with the Prince were assembled; at which time King Edward, with the Prince, the Duke of Lancaster, and all the great Lords of England, set forward to their succour, but being driven back by tempest, never came to give them assistance, so as Thonouras yielded upon composition. Yet did this preparation of the King stand him in nine thousand Marks; that it may be truly said, it cost him more now to lose Towns, then it had cost him before to win them; so great odds there is between the Spring and Fall of Fortune. After this, the Duke of Lancaster is sent over with another great Army, who passed up into many parts of the Countrey, but King Charles resolved to hazard no battle; saying, They were but clouds, and would soon pass away; yet so watched him, that what with light skirmishes, and what with scarcity of victuals, his Forces were so diminished, that of thirty thousand which went out of Calice, there scarce returned six thousand home: which made King Edward say of this King Charles, that he did him more mischief sitting still, then his Predecessors had done with all their stirring. And now by this time all Poitou is lost, and all Aquitain also, but only Burdeaux and Baion: when the Archbishop of Roan and others are sent from Pope Gregory the eleventh, to mediate a Peace between the two Kings; but each of them standing upon high terms of conditions, nothing could be effected, but Truce upon Truce for two or three years together. In which time Edward Prince of Wales died, and with him we may say, the Fortune of England; for a Prince so full of virtues, that he left no place for any vice; and if he had lived in the Heroick times, might well have been numbred amongst the nine Worthies. His body was buried at Canterbury, where his Monument standeth. King Edward in his seven and fortieth year called a Parliament at Westminster, which lasted but eight daies; and to which were summoned by Writ, of Clergy men only four Bishops, and five Abbots.

Of King Edward's Acts after the death of the Prince.

IN the time of the Princes sickness, King Edward calls a Parliament at Westminster; in which when demands were made for supply of the King, demands were presently made for redress of grievances for the Subjects. It was required that the Duke of Lancaster the Lord Latimer then Lord Chamberlain, Dame Alice Pierce the Kings Concubine, and one Sir Richard Starry might be removed from Court: And this was so vehemently urged by their Speaker, Sir Peter de la Moore, that the King rather then not to be supplied, gave way unto it; and thereupon all these persons are presently put from Court: but the Prince soon after dying, they are all recalled to Court again, and restored to their former places.

About this time exemplary justice was done upon Sir John Midseforth Knight, who was drawn, hanged and quartered at Tilburn for Treason, by him committed, in defrauding Souldiers of their wages.

About this time the Duke of Lancaster, being at Burdeaux, and hearing of the death of Prince King of Castile; whom Prince Edward had vested in his Kingdom; and that he left only two daughters, the Heirs of his Kingdom, who were then at the City of Gascoine, for their safety: he sent and caused them to be brought to Burdeaux, and there himself married the elder sister Constance: in whose right he afterward took upon him the title of King of Castile and Leon: and not long after his younger brother, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, married the younger sister Isabel.

It was now the fiftieth year of Edward's Reign, and he for another Jubilee, grants another general pardon to his Subjects, only William Pickham Bishop of Winchester is excepted, being lately by procurement of the Duke of Lancaster, fallen into the Kings displeasure, and forbidden to come to the Parliament. This Parliament was called the good Parliament, though it wrought ill effects; for Sir Peter de la Moore at the suit of Alice Pierce, is committed to perpetual imprisonment at Fotheringham, though within two years after, by importunate suit of friends, he regained his liberty. This Alice Pierce presuming upon the Kings favour, grew so insolent, that she intermeddled with Courts of Justice, and other Offices; where she herself would sit, to countenance her Causes. And now the Duke of Lancaster is come to have the Regency, and to manage all the affairs of the Kingdom; but King Edward to prevent the mischiefs, which by disordering the succession, might grow in the Kingdom, providently settled the same in Parliament upon Richard of Burdeaux; creating him first Earl of Chester and Cornwall, and then Prince of Wales, and caused all the Lords of the Realm to take an Oath, to accept him for their Kings, as his lawful Heir, when himself should be dead. In this mean time a Treaty was had about a marriage between this Prince Richard, and Mary a daughter of Charles King of France: and an offer was made to King Edward, to leave him fourteen hundred Towns, and three thousand Fortresses in Aquitain, upon condition he would render Calice, and all that he held in Picardy; but before any thing could be concluded, King Edward died.

Of his Taxations.

IN the eighth year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at London, there was granted him a fifteenth of the Temporality, a twentieth of the Cities and Boroughs, and a Tenth of the Clergy. In his tenth year, in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted a tenth penny of Cities and Boroughs, a fifteenth of others, and a tenth of the Clergy. Also all such Treasure as was committed to Churches through England for the Holy War, is taken out for the Kings use, towards his Wars with France. The next year after, all the goods of three orders of Monks, Lombards, Cluniacks, and Cistercians, are likewise seized into the Kings hands: and the like subsidy as before granted at Nottingham. In his twelfth year, (and as some write, in absence of the King) in a Parliament at Northampton, is granted by the Laity, one half of their Wool, but of the Clergy the whole. The next year after a fifteenth was likewise paid in Wool by the Commonalty. In his fourteenth year, in a Parliament at London, is granted him for custome of every sack of Wool, forty shillings, for every three hundred Wool Fells forty shillings, for every Last of Leather forty shillings; and of other Merchandises according to the rate: the same to endure from that Easter to the Whitsuntide twelve Month after. Besides there was granted of Citizens and Burgeses, a ninth part of goods; of foreign Merchants and others, a fifteenth, of Husbandmen, the ninth sheaf, the ninth Fleece, the ninth Lamb for two years; also another tenth of the Clergy: and for his present supply he had Loans of divers persons; and the City of London lent twenty thousand Marks. For the Grant of which mighty Subsidy, the King (besides his pardon to divers kinds of offenders) remits all americiations for transgressions in his Forreits, Reliefs and Scutage to the first time of his going into Flanders, besides all aids for the marriage of his sons and daughters during his Reign; pardoning and remitting all ancient debts and arrearages, both of his Farmers and others, till the tenth year of his Reign; and likewise confirms the great Charter of Magna Charta. In his eighteenth year in a Parliament at London, a tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity; Besides a Commission is sent into every Shire to enquire of mens abilities, and all of five pounds to ten of Lay Fee, were appointed to find an Archer on horseback; of twenty five, a Demy lance; and so ratably above. There had formerly been made a certain coin of Gold called the Floren, of base alloy for the Kings benefit, towards his wars in France, but this was now called in, and Nobles of finer metal coined, to the great contentment of the people. In his nine and twentieth year, he hath by Parliament granted unto him fifty shillings upon every Sack of wool, for six years next ensuing; by which Imposition, it was thought, the King might dispend a thousand Marks Sterling a day, the vent of Wool was so great in that time; but that which exceeded all his Taxations, was the Ransome he had in his four and thirtieth year, of the King of France, three millions of crowns of gold. In his twelfth year, he had taken from the Priors Aliens, their Houses, Lands, and Tenements, for the maintenance of his French Wars, which he kept twenty years in his hands, and then restored them again. In his six and thirtieth year was granted twenty six shillings eight pence, for transportation of every sack of Wool for three years. In the five and fortieth year of his Reign, in a Parliament at Westminster, the Clergy granted him fifty thousand pounds to be paid the same year, and the Laity as much; which was levied by setting a certain rate of five pounds fifteen shillings upon every Parish, which were found in the thirty seven Shires to be eight thousand and six hundred, and so came in the whole to fifty thousand, one hundred eighty one pounds and eight pence: but 181 li. was abated to the Shires of Suffolk and Devonshire, in regard of their poverty. In his eight and fortieth year, in a Parliament, is granted him a tenth of the Clergy, and a fifteenth of the Laity. In his fiftieth year a Subsidy of a new nature was demanded by the young Prince Richard, whom (being but eleven years of age) the Duke of Lancaster had brought into the Parliament of purpose to make the demand; to have two tenths to be paid in one year, or twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandises sold, for one year; and one pound of silver for every Knights Fee, and of every Fire-house, one penny; but in stead of this Subsidie, after much altercation, there was granted another of as new a nature as this, that every person, man and woman within the Kingdom, above the age of fourteen years, should pay four pence, (those who lived of Alms only excepted) the Clergy to pay twelve pence of every Parson beneficed, and of all other Religious persons four pence; a mighty aid, and such as was never granted to any King of England before.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HE instituted the Order of the Garter, upon what cause is not certain; the common opinion is, that a Garter of his own Queen, or (as some say) of the Lady Joan Countess of Salisbury, slipping off in a Dance, King Edward stooped, and took it up; whereat some of his Lords that were present, smiling, as at an amorous action, he seriously said, it should not be long ere Sovereign honour should be done to that Garter; whereupon he afterward added the French Motto, Honi soit qui maly pense; therein checking, his Lords sinister suspicion. Some conjecture that he instituted the Order of the Garter, for that in a battel wherein he was victorious, he had given the word Garter, for the word or sign: and some again are of opinion, that the institution of this order is more ancient, and begun by King Richard the first, but that this King Edward adorned it, and brought it into splendour. The number of the Knights of this Order is twenty six, whereof the King himself is alwaies one, and President; and their Feast yearly celebrated at Windfor on Saint Georges day, the Tutelar Saint of that Order. The Laws of the Order are many, whereof there is a book of purpose. In the five and thirtieth year of his Reign, he was earnestly petitioned by a Parliament then holden, that the great Charter of Liberties, and the Charter of Forests might be duly observed; and that the great Officers of the Kingdom should (as in former times) be elected by Parliament: to which Petition, though the King at first stood stiffe upon his own election and Prerogative; yet at last (in regard to have his present turn served, (as himself after confessed) he yielded that such Officers should receive an Oath in Parliament, to do justice to all men in their Offices, and thereupon a Statute was made and confirmed with the Kings Seal, both for that and many other Grants of his to his Subjects; which notwithstanding were for the most part shortly after revoked.

This King also caused all Pleas, which were before in French, to be made in English, that the Subject might understand the course of the Law. Also in his time an Act was passed for Purveyours, that nothing should be taken up but for ready money upon strict punishment. In the next Parliament holden the seven and thirtieth year of his Reign, certain sumptuary Laws were ordained both for apparel and diet; appointing every degree of men, the stufte and habits they should wear, prohibiting the wearing of gold and silver, silks and rich furs to all, but eminent persons. The labourer and Husbandman is appointed but one meal a day, and what meats he should eat. Also in his time at the instance of the Londoners, an Act was made that no common Where should wear any Hood, except striped with divers colours; nor Furs, but Garments reversed the wrong side outward. This King also was the first that created Dukes; of whom Henry of Bullingbrook, Earl of Lancaster, created Duke of Lancaster, in the seven and twentieth year of his reign, was the first. But afterward he erected Cornwall also into a Duchy, and conferred it upon the Prince: after which time, the Kings eldest Son used alwaies to be Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. This King also altered moneys, and abated them in weight, and yet made them to pass according to the former value. Before his time there were no other pieces but Nobles and half Nobles, with the small pieces of silver called Sterlings; but now Groats of four pence, and half Groats of two pence, equivalent to the Sterling money, are coyned, which inhaunced the prizes of things, that rise or fall, according to the plenty or scarcity of coyn; which made Servants and Labourers to raise their wages accordingly. Whereupon a Statute was made in the Parliament now held at Westminster, to reduce the same to the former rate. Also an Act was made in this Kings time, that all Wears, Mills, and other stoppages of Rivers, hindering the passage of Boats, Lighters, and other Vessels should be removed; which though it were most commodious to the Kingdom, yet it took little effect, by reason of bribing and corrupting Lords and great men, who regarded more their own private, then the publique benefit. In a Parliament holden the tenth year of his Reign, it was enacted that no Wooll growing within the Realm should be transported, but that it should be made in Cloth in England. Peter-Pence are forbidden by the King to be paid any more to Rome; but yet in many Shires of England are gathered to this day; saith Fabian. The custome of washing poor mens feet on Maundy-Tuesday, thought to have been first brought in by this King. This King also confirmed the Franchises of the City of London; and ordained that the Maior for the time being, should sit in all places of judgement, within the liberty of the same, as chief Justice, the Kings person only excepted; and that every Alderman that had been Maior, should be Justice of Peace within his own Ward. Also he granted to the Citizens of London, that they should not be constrained to go out of the City to fight or defend the Land for any need. Also that after that day the Franchises of the City should not be seized into the Kings hands, but only for Treason and Rebellion done by the whole City. Also that Southwark should be under the rule of the City, and the Maior to choose a Bayliffe there, as he liked: He also granted to the Citizens of London, that the Officers of the Maiors and Sheriffs, should from that day forward use Maces of silver parcel-gilt.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

King Edward upon some displeasure, had imprisoned divers Clergy-men; whereupon John Stratford Archbishop of Canterbury writes him a Letter, charging him with violation of the Rights of the Church, and with the breach of Magna Charta; and after much good counsel given him, threatens, that if he amend not these disorders, he must and will exercise his Ecclesiastical authority, and proceed to Excommunication of his Officers, though not of himself, Queen, or children. The King answers, and sends his Letter to the Bishop of London, charging the Archbishop to be the cause of all this disturbance, having been the man that first set him upon the war with France; assuring him he should want no money, and now had been the hinderance, that moneys given him by Parliament, were not duly levied: and after many remonstrances to such purpose, concludes, that if he desisted not from his rebellious obstinacy, he would use his Temporal authority, and proceed against him as against a Rebel. But this difference between them them was not long after, upon the Archbishops submission, reconciled. And indeed the great account which this King made of Clergy-men, may appear by his employing almost none but Clergy-men in all his Offices of account; Simon Langham Archbishop of Canterbury, was Chancellor of England; William Wickham Archdeacon of Lincoln, Keeper of the Privy Seal; David Wiler Parson of Somersham, Master of the Rolls; ten Beneficed Priests, Civilians, Masters of the Chancery; William Mulse Dean of Saint Martins le Grand, chief Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Receiver and Keeper of the Kings Treasure and Jewels; William Auby Archdeacon of Northampton, Chancellor of the Exchequer; William Dighton Prebendary of Saint Martin, Clerk of the Privy Seal; Richard Chesterfield Prebend of Saint Stephens, Treasurer of the Kings House; Henry Snatch Parson of Oundell, Master of the Kings Wardrobe; John Nennham Parson of Fenny-stanton, one of the Chamberlains of the Exchequer; John Rousby Parson of Harwick, Surveyor and Comptroller of the Kings works; Thomas Brittingham Parson of Asby, Treasurer to the King, for the part of Guineas, and the Marches of Calice; John Troy a Priest, Treasurer of Ireland.

In the sevenyenth year of his Reign, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, complaint is made of the great inconvenience, that came by the Popes Collation of Benefices in England; conferring them upon strangers: who understood not the Language; and therefore not fit to be Pastours over a flock they could not feed; and hereupon Sir John Shurdich is sent to Pope Clement the sixth, to require him to forbear such Collations, and to signify his consent therein: but this Message was so unwelcome to the Pope, that the Messenger came back unheard, at least unanswered; and the King taking his silence for consent, or perhaps not much caring whether he consented or no, proceeded to a prohibition of all such Collations within his Realm, on pain of imprisonment, or death, to whomsoever should in time to come, preferre or admit any such person, who by the Pope were so preferred to the prejudice of the Kings Prerogative. These were Disturbances in matter of Discipline; but towards the end of his reign there fell a disturbance in matter of Doctrine, for a certain Divine named John Wickliffe, inveighed in his Sermons, and other acts in the Schools, against the abuses of Churchmen, Monks, and other Religious Orders; and had by his Doctrine won many Disciples unto him, (who after were called Lollards) professing poverty, going bare-foot, and poorly clad in Rustler; amongst other his Doctrines, he taught that neither King, nor other secular Lord, could give any thing in perpetuity unto Church-men, and that temporal Lords, if they needed, might lawfully take the goods of religious persons to relieve them in their necessities, by the example of William Rufus; and others. This man, the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Henry Percy Marshal, much favour and cherish, extolling him for his learning and integrity of life; which made him so faire to presume, that daily in one Church or other he published his Opinions; whereupon at length he is cited to answer before the Archbishop; the Bishop of London, and others in Pauls. At the day appointed, the Duke of Lancaster, and the Lord Marshal go to conduct him; when they were come to our Ladies Chappel, the Duke and Barons with the Bishops sitting down, John Wickliffe was by the Lord Marshal willed to sit down, in regard (he said) the man had much to answer, and needed a convenient seat. The Bishop of London told him; It was against all Law and Reason, that he who was there cited, before his Ordinary should sit. Hereupon contumelious words arose between the Lord Marshal and the Bishop; the Duke takes the Marshals part, and sharply reprehended the Bishop; the Bishop returns the like to the Duke; who in a great rage swore he would pull down the pride of him, and of all the Bishops of England; and whispering in his ear, told him he had rather pull him out of the Church by the hair of the head, then to suffer such indignities; which words the Londoners over-hearing, swore with a loud voice they would rather lose their lives then suffer their Bishop to be thus injuriously used. Their fury was the more against the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament (whereof he was President) it was required in the Kings name; that from thenceforth there should be no more a Maior of London, but a Captain appointed for the Government of the City, and that the Lord Marshal of England should arrest offenders within the Liberties, as in other places. The morrow after the Citizens assembling to consult of this business, it happened the Lord Fitz-water, and Guido Bryan, came into the City; which the people seeing, furiously ran upon them, and were like to beat them down for coming at that time. The Lord Fitz-water protested, he came to no other end, but to offer his service to the City, being by inheritance their Standard-bearer, and was to the injuries offered to them, as to himself; and therefore willed them, to look to their defence. Whereupon they presently take Arms, assail the Marshals Inn, break open the Gates, brought forth a prisoner in his Givens, and set him at liberty, but found not the Lord Marshal, who with the Duke, was that day to dine with one John de Tyres. Then this furious multitude ran to assail the Savoy; which a Knight of the Dukes seeing, hatts to the place where his Lord dined, and acquaints him with this uproar in the City: The Duke upon hearing it, leaps from the Table so hastily, that he hurt both his shins on the founn; and with Sir Henry Percy alone takes boat; and goes to Kennington near Lambeth, where the Princess with the young Prince lay: to whom he complains of this Riot, and the violence offered him. In the mean time the multitude coming to the Savoy, a Priest inquisitive to know the business, was answered, they went to take the Duke, and the Lord Marshal, and compel them to deliver Sir Peter de la Mare, unjustly kept in prison. The Priest replied, that Sir Peter was a Traytor to the King, and worthy to be hanged: At which words they all cried out, This is Piercy, This is the Traytor of England, his speech bewrayes him, though his apparel be disguised, and presently they ran upon him, and wounded him to death. The Bishop of London hearing of this outrage, leaves his dinner, hastes to the Savoy, admonisheth them of the holy time being Lent: assuring them all should be fairly ended for the good of the City: with whole persuasions they were somewhat pacified; but yet they took the Dukes Arms, and hung them up reversed, in sign of Treason; in all the principal streets of the City. Upon the Princesses advice, the chief Citizens send to the sick King, to excuse this tumult; saying it was not in their power to suppress it, the Commonalty being in commotion; upon an information that their Liberties should be taken from them by Parliament. The King told them, it never was in his thought to infringe their Liberties, but he rather desired to enlarge them. But this affront of the Citizens would not dowrt with the Duke, till he had pulled down some of the principal of them; for he caused the Maior and Aldermen to be displaced, and other put in their rooms: a revenge he had better been without, for he never had the love of the City after: and to want their love is a kind of banishment. Wickliffe himself, censured by the Bishops to abjure his Opinions, chose rather to leave his Country then his Doctrine, and going over into Bohemia, was there much honoured while he lived, and hath been more since he dyed; at least, a great part of his Doctrine continues in veneration amongst that people to this day.

Works of Piety done by him, or by others in his time.

HIS works of Piety were great and many, as the founding of East-Minster, an Abbey (of the Cîteaux Order) near the Tower. An Abbey for Nuns at Dorsetford in Kent: The Kings Hall in Cambridge for poor Scholars. An Hospital for the poor at Callice. He conferred upon the University of Oxford, where he had himself been trained up, under the learned Walter Burley, the chief rule of the City, subordinating the Maior and Citizens to the Chancellour of the University. He built Saint Stephens Chappel at Westminster, with the endowment of 300. pound per annum. He augmented the Chappel at Windfore, and made provisions there for Church-men, and four and twenty poor Knights. These were his publick works; But besides these, his private buildings were, the Castle of Windfore, which he re-edified and enlarged, the Castle at Quinborough, Fortifications at Callice and other places. His Queen Philippa founded Queens Colledge in Oxford: and Mary Countess of Pembroke, the Colledge called Pembroke Hall in Cambridge. In this Kings time Sir John Poulney, Maior of London, built the Colledge in London called Saint Lawrence Poulney, and little Abballons, a Parish Church in Thames-street, and also the Carmelite Fryers Church in Coventry. Henry Earl of Lancaster and Leicester, founded the Hospital by the Castle of Leicester, wherein a hundred poor impotent people were provided for with all things necessary. William Elsing Mercer of London, made a new Hospital of an old House of Nuns by Cripplegate, and placing Canons regular there, he became the first Prior thereof. Walter Stapleton Bishop of Excester, founded Excester Colledge, and Hart Hall in Oxford. William Cateman Bishop of Norwich, builded Trinity Hall in Cambridge. Simon Islip Archbishop of Canterbury, founded Canterbury Colledge in Oxford. William Edendon Treasurer of England, founded the Monastery of Edendon: the religious brethren whereof were called Bonhommes. Sir Walter de Manny, born in Cambray, purchased a piece of ground called Spittle-croft, containing thirteen Acres, without the bars of West-Smithfield, and caused the same to be enclosed, where he built a Chappel, and after founded the same to be a house of Charter-house Monks. Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford and Essex, re-edified the Augustine Fryers Church in London, and was buried in the Quire thereof. In the two and thirtieth year of this Kings Reign, John Stody Maior of London, gave unto the Vintners of London all the Quadrant where Vintners Hall now standeth, with the Tenements round about, from the lane to this day called Stodys-lane; where are founded thirteen houses for thirteen poor people, which are there kept of charity. Also in this Kings time Sir John Cobham founded the Colledge of Cobham in Kent. John Lokken four times Maior of London, builded at Kingstone upon Thames, where he was born, a Chappel called Magdalens, to the which he joynd an Hospital, wherein was a Master, two Priests, and certain poor men: and for that the Parish Church of Saint Michael by Crooked-lane, where he dwelled, was a very homely thing, and the ground thereabout a filthy plot, by reason of the Butchers in Eastcheap, who made the same their lay-stall; he on the same ground builded the fair new Parish Church of Saint Michael now standing, and was buried there in the middle of the Quire, under a fair Tomb of stone. He also founded a Colledge to the same Church, near thereunto adjoining, John Barns Maior of London, gave a Chest with three locks, and a thousand Marks to be lent to young men upon security, so that it passed not one hundred Marks; and for the occupying thereof, if he were learned, to say at his pleasure, De Profundis, for the soul of John Barns; if he were not learned, to say Pater Noster: but howsoever the money is lent, the Chest at this day standeth in the Chamber of London, without money or pledges. Thomas of Woodstock, the youngest son of King Edward, founded a Colledge at Playffe in Essex, where in his life he had provided a sumptuous Tombe, where he was first laid, but translated afterward to Westminster.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN the two and twentieth year of his reign, a contagious pestilence arose in the East and South parts of the world, and spread it self over all Christendome; and coming at last into England, it so wasted the people, that scarce the tenth person of all sorts were left alive. There died in London, (some say in Northwich) between the first of January and the first of July, 57374. persons. In Tarmouth, in one year, 7052. men and women: before which time, the Parlonage there was worth 700 Marks a year, and afterwards was scarce worth forty pounds a year. This plague began in London about Abballontide, in the year 1348. and continued till the year 1357. Where it was observed, that those who were born after the beginning of this mortallity, had but twenty eight teeth, where before they had two and thirty. In the twelfth year of his reign, a sudden inundation of water, at New-Castle upon Tyne, bare down a piece of the Town wall, and six pearches in length, near to a place called Walkeney; where a hundred and twenty men and women were drowned. In the five and thirtieth year of his reign, another pestilence happened in England, which was called the second pestilence, in which died Henry Duke of Lancaster, also Reginald Lord Cobham, and Walter Fitz-Warren, two famous men; and five Bishops, of Worcester, of London, of Ely, of Lincoln, and of Chichester. In this Kings time, a solemn Jousting or Tournament was holden at Lodon in Cheside, betwix the great Cross and the great Conduit, nigh Soper-lane, which lasted three daies; where the Queen Philippa, with many Ladies fell from a Stage, set up for them to behold the Jousting; and though they were not hurt at all, yet the King threatened to punish the Carpenters for their negligence, till the Queen intreated pardon for them upon her knees; as indeed she was alwaies ready to do all good offices of mercy to all people. In the eleventh year of his reign was so great plenty, that a quarter of wheat was sold at London for two shillings; a fat Oxe for a Noble, a fat Sheep for six pence, and six Pigeons for a penny, a fat Goose for two pence, a Pig for a penny, and other things after that rate. But in his twenty seventh year there was a great scarcity, by reason there fell no rain, or very little, from the end of March, to the end of July; and was therefore called the dry summer.

Of his Wife and Children.

He married Philippa the daughter of William Earl of Hainault at York: a match made up in haste by Queen Isabel his mother, for her own ends, although a better could never have been made upon deliberation for King Edward's ends: for though her Parentage was not great, and her portion less; yet she made amends for both, in virtue; for never King had a better Wife. By her King Edward had seven sons and five daughters: his eldest son Edward Prince of Wales, and commonly called the Black Prince, (but why so called uncertain; for to say, of his dreadful acts, as Speed saith, hath little probability: and indeed Frassford, who hath written the reign of King Edward the third, more particularly than any other, and lived in his time, never calls Prince Edward the Black Prince, nor any where makes mention, that he was so called) was born at Woodstock, in the third year of his Fathers reign; he married Joan, the daughter of Edmund Earl of Kent, brother by the Fathers side to King Edward the second. She had been twice married before; first to the valiant Earl of Salisbury, from whom she was divorced: next to the Lord Thomas Holland; after whose decease, this Prince passionately loving her, married her; by her he had issue two sons, Edward the eldest, born at Angouleme, who died at seven years of age; and Richard born at Burdeaux, who after his Father, was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather King of England. This Prince had also natural issue, Sir John Souther, and Roger Clarendon Knights; the latter being attainted in the reign of King Henry the fourth, is thought to have been Ancestor to the house of Smiths in Essex. He died at Canterbury in the six and fortieth year of his age, and of his Fathers reign, the nine and fortieth, and was buried at Christ Church there. His second son William was born at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, who deceased in his childhood, and was buried at York. His third son Lyonel was born at Antwerp, in the twelfth year of his Fathers reign; he married first Elizabeth, the daughter and Heir of William Burgh, Earl of Ulster in Ireland; in whose right he was first created Earl of Ulster: and because he had with her, the honour of Clare, in the County of Tonmoud, he was in a Parliament, created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the country about the town and honour of Clare; from which Duchy, the name of Clarentineux (being the title of the King of Armes, for the South parts of England) is derived. This Duke had issue by her one only daughter, named Philippa, afterward wife of Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, mother of Earl Roger, Father of Anne Countess of Cambridge, the mother of Richard Duke of York, Father of King Edward the fourth. The second Marriage of this Duke was at Millain in Lombardy, with the Lady Violanta, daughter of Galeacio, the second Duke thereof; but through intemperance he lived not long after. King Edward's fourth son named John, was born at Gower, in the fourteenth year of his Fathers reign; he had three wives, the first was Blanch, daughter and co-heir, and in the end, the sole Heir of Henry Duke of Lancaster, son of Edmund, surnamed Crouch-back; by whom whom he had issue, Henry of Bullingbrooke Earl of Derby, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crown in the house of Lancaster. By her also John of Gaunt had two daughters, Philip wife of John the first, King of Portugal, and Elizabeth married first to John Holland, Earl of Huntingdon, and after him, to Sir John Cornwall, Baron of Fanbroke. John of Gaunt's second wife was Constance, the eldest daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right, for the time, he intitled himself King of both those Realms: by her he had issue one only daughter named Katherine, married to Henry the third, son of King John, in possession before, and in her right, after King of both the said Realms. John of Gaunt's third wife was Katherine, the Widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Lincolnshire, eldest daughter and co-heir of Pain Roet, a Gascoyne, called Guien King of Arms for that country; his younger daughter being married to Sir Geoffry Chawcer, our Laureat Poet. By her he had issue born before Matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament in the twentieth year of King Richard the second; John Earl of Somerset, Thomas Duke of Excester, Henry Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinal, and Ioan (who was first married to Robert Ferrers Baron of Wenmore, and Ousey, in the counties of Salop and Warwick.) and secondly, to Ralph Nevill, the first Earl of Westmorland. She and all her brethren were surnamed Beauchamp, of a Cattle which the Duke had in France, where they were all born; and in regard thereof, bare the Portcullis of a Castle for the cognizance of their Family. This Duke in the thirteenth year of his Nephew King Richard was created Duke of Aquitain, but in the sixteenth year, he was called home, and this title recalled; and the third year after, in the sixtieth of his age, he died at Ely-houfe in Holbourn, and lieth honourably Entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul. King Edward's fifth son Edmund, surnamed of Langley, was first in the year 1362. created Earl of Cambridge, and afterward in the year 1386. made Duke of York; he married Isabella daughter and co-heir to Peter, King of Castile and Leon; his son Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, took to wife Anne Mortimer, Heir of the forsaid Lionell, elder brother to Edmund of Langley. King Edward's sixth son William, surnamed of Windsor, where he was born, died young, and is buried at Westminster. King Edward's youngest son Thomas, surnamed of Woodstock, where he was born, was first Earl of Buckingham, and after made Duke of Gloucester by his Nephew King Richard the second. He was a man of valour and wisdom, but the King surmizing him to be too severe an observer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, how to make him away: whom Mowbray unawares surprizing, conveyed secretly to Callice, where he was strangled the twentieth year of King Richard's reign. He had issue one son, Humphrey Earl of Buckingham, who died, at Chester of the Pestilence, in the year 1400. and two daughters, Anne married first to Edmund Earl of Stafford, by whom she had Humphrey Duke of Buckingham; secondly to William Bourchier Earl of Ewe, by whom she had Henry Earl of Essex; and Ioan married to Gilbert, Lord Talbot, and had issue by him a daughter, who died young. Of King Edwards daughters, the eldest named Isabella, was married at Windsor to Ingelram of Guyens, Lord of Concy, Earl of Soissons, and after Archduke of Austria; created also by King Edward Earl of Bedford; by whom she was mother of two daughters; Mary married to Henry Duke of Barre, and Philip married to Robert de Vere Earl of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, and Marquess of Dublin. This Robert in the height of his fortunes forsook his Lady Philip, and married one Lancerona a Joyner's daughter (as was said) which came with King Richard the second's wife out of Bohemia; and being for abusing the Kings ear, driven out of the land by the Lords, he died at Lozan in extrem poverty in the year 1392. Isabella his wives mother, was buried in the Church of Friars Minorities near Algate in London. King Edwards second daughter Ioan was married by Proxie to Alphonsus, King of Castile and Leon; but passing into Spain, died by the way, and King Alphonsus met her in stead of consummating his Espousal, to solemnize her Funeral. His third daughter Blanch died young. His fourth named Mary was married to John Montford Duke of Britain. His youngest named Margaret, born in Callice, was the first wife of John de Hastings, Earl of Pembroke, but died without issue.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of stature indifferent tall, of sparkling eyes, of a comely and manly countenance, in his later time somewhat bald; and concerning his conditions, no man was more gentle, where there was submission; where opposition, no man more stern. He was a Prince no less of his passions, then of his people; for he was never so loving, as to be fond; nor ever so angry, as to be inexorable; but this must be understood of the time while he was a man, for in his old age, when he came to be a child again, he was Prince of neither. He was no less fortunate then valiant, and his fortunateness was the greater by a kind of Antiperistasis, as coming between two unfortunate Princes; Successour to one, and predecessour to another. He was of so warlike a disposition, that his very sports were warlike; for no delights were so frequent with him as Jests and Turnaments. To shew his devotion, one example may be sufficient, for when neither Cardinals nor Counsellours could move him to make peace with France, a tempest from Heaven did it; to which may be added, that he never won great battel, of which he was many, but he presently gave the glory of it to God by publick Thanksgiving. He outlived the best wife, and the best son that ever King had; and to say the truth, he outlived the best of himself, for his latter years were not answerable to his former.

Of his Death and Burial.

KING Edward besides his being old, and worn with the labours of war, had other causes that hastened his end: his grief for the loss of so worthy a son, dead but remembrance before; his grief for the loss of all benefit of his conquests in France, of all which he had little now left, but only Callice, and oppressed thus in body and minde, he was drawing his last breath, when his Concubine Alice Pierce packing away what she could catch, even to the rings of his fingers, left him, and by her example, other of his attendants, feiling on what they could come by, shift away; and all his Counsellours and others forsook him, when he most needed them, leaving his Chamber quite empty; which a poor Priest in the house seeing, he approached to the Kings Bed-side, and finding him yet breathing call upon him to remember his Saviour, and to ask mercy for his offences, which none about him before would do: but now moved by the voyce of this Priest, he shews all signs of contrition, and at last breath he expresth the name of Jesus. Thus dyed this victorious King at his Manor at Sheene, (now Richmond) the 21. day of June, in the year 1377. in the 64. year of his age, having reigned fifty years, four months and odd days. His body was conveyed from Sheene by his four sons and other Lords, and solemnly interred within Westminster Church, where he hath his Monument, and where it is said the Sword he used in battel, is yet to be seen, being eight pound in weight, and seven foot in length.

Of Men of Note in his time.

MARTIAL men were never more plentiful then in this Kings reign: whether it were that this stars have an influence to produce such men at one time more then another: or whether it were that Regis ad exemplum, the Kings example made his subjects like himself: or lastly, that his continual exercise of arms put them as it were into a mould of fortitude. The first of this kind is worthily Edward the black Prince, and so worthily the first, that Longe est a primo quisque secundus erit. Next him Henry Earl of Lancaster, the Princes right hand, in all his great achievements: then William the valiant Earl of Salisbury, then John Bare, Ancestor to the L. Eures that now lieth; then follow the Lord John Chandos, Sir James Audley, Sir Walter de Manny, Sir Robert Knolls, then Sir John Hawkwood born in Essex; who though not much honoured at home, having been a Taylour, yet in foreign parts; and specially in Italy so famous; that his Statue was erected in publick, for a Monument to testifie his valour to posterity. And here must not be forgotten Robert Penile, Knight, a Norfolk man, who when the Scots and English were ready to give battel, a certain stout Champion of great stature, commonly called Tourney coming out of the Scots Army, and challenging any English man to meet him in a single combat; this Robert Penile accepteth the challenge, and marching towards the Champion, and meeting by the way a certain black Mastiffe Dog which waited on the Champion, he suddenly with his sword cut him off at the loyns, and afterwards did more to the Champion himself, cutting his head from off his shoulders. And as there was this great plenty of Martial men, so there was no less plenty of learned men; John Baconthorpe born in Norfolk, a Carmelite Frier, who wrote divers excellent Treatises in Divinity; Nicholas Trivet born also in Norfolk, a black Frier, who wrote two Histories, and a Book of Annals: Richard Stradley, born in the Marches of Wales, a Monk and a Divine, who wrote divers excellent Treatises of the Scriptures; William Herbert a Welsh man, and a Frier Minor, who wrote many good Treatises in Divinity: Tho. Vallies a Dominican Fryer, and a writer of many excellent Books: John Everden a Monk of Bury in Suffolke, an Historiographer: Walter Burley a Doctor of Divinity, brought up in Merton Colledge in Oxford, who wrote divers excellent Treatises in Natural and Moral Philosophy, which remain in estimation to this day; and who for the great fame of his learning, had the honour to be one of the great Instructours of Edward the black Prince: Roger of Chesham, Monk of that City, and an Historiographer: John Burgh a Monk, who wrote a History, and also divers homilies: Richard Amgrevill Bishop of Durham, and Lord Chancellor of England, born in Suffolke: Richard Hominford an Historiographer: Richard Chichester a Monk of Westminster, who wrote an excellent Chronicle from the year 449. to the year 1348. Richard Rolle alias Hamptone, who wrote many excellent Treatises in Divinity: Robert Holcot, a black Frier, born in Northampton, a learned Schoolman, who wrote many Books in Arguments of Divinity: Thomas Bradwardine born near Chichester in Suffolke, Archbishop of Canterbury, and who wrote against the Pelagians, and for his depth of learning, had the Title of Doctor Profundus: Richard Fitz-Ralph, Archbishop of Armagh in Ireland, a learned writer: William Gryffant, named Anglion, a notable Physician, whose son came to be Pope, and was called Urban the fifth: John Killingworth an excellent Philosopher, Astronomer, and Physician: Ranph Higdon a Monk of Chester, an Historiographer: Bartholomew Glanville, descended of thole Glanvilles that were sometimes Earls of Suffolke: Simon Islip Archbishop of Ely, and founder of Canterbury Colledge in Oxford, who wrote many Treatises: Matthew Paris a Frenchman, who wrote the Book called Flores Historiarum: William Fleet an Hermite, who wrote sundry Treatises, extolling England to repentance: Henry Knighton, who wrote a History intitled De gestis Anglorum; and lastly two other, worth perhaps to have been placed first; John Mandevill the great traveller, a Doctor of Physick, and Sir John Hawkwood a Taylour, so famous in Italy, that his Statue is there erected. Robert Penile his Valour.

Thomas Bradwardine a learned Doctor Profundus.

Matthew of Westminster lived in this time.

John Mandevill the great traveller, and

Sir Geoffry
Chawcer lived

and a Knight, who dyed at Liege, in the year 1372. and Sir Geoffry Chawcer, the Homer of our Nation; and who found as sweet a Muse in the Groves of Woodstock, as the Ancients did upon the banks of Helicon.

THE REIGN OF KING RICHARD THE SECOND.

Anno Dom.
1377.

King Richard
the Second Crowned.

Claims of Office at his Coronation.

RICHARD, called of Burdeanx, because born there, the only Son of Edward the black Prince, was by his Grandfather in his life time, declared to be his Heir and lawful successor; and accordingly after his death was crowned King of England, at Westminster, the sixteenth day of July, in the year 1377. by Simon Sudbury Archbishop of Canterbury: And for the more solemnity of his Coronation, he then made nine Knights, and created four Earls: Thomas of Woodstock King Edward the third's youngest son, was created Earl of Buckingham and Northampton; Thomas Mowbray, younger brother of John L. Mowbray, Earl of Nottingham; Gifford Angoulesme a Gifford, was made Earl of Huntington; and Henry Percy son of Henry Lord Percy, was created Earl of Northumberland. At the time of the Coronation, the Duke of Lancaster, by the name of John King of Castile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, put in his claim as Earl of Leicester to have the place of Earl Marshal of England; as Duke of Lancaster, to carry the sword called Curatana; as Earl of Lincoln, to be carver that day; all which to be executed by himself, or by his sufficient Deputy; which with the Fees thereunto belonging, were confirmed unto him. As likewise, divers others made their claims: Robert de Vere, Earl of Oxford, to have the Office of Chamberlain, and to powre out water for the King to wash: John Wiltshire Citizen of London by reason of a moiety of the Manour of Heydon, holden in Sergeanty, claimed to hold a Towel for the King to wipe with when he went to meat: Thomas Beauchampe Earl of Warwick, to bear the third Sword before the King; and also to exercise the office of Pantler: Sir John Argentine, by reason of his Manour of Wimondsey in the County of Hartford, to serve the King at his cup: William L. Furnival, for his Manour of Fernham, to support the Kings right arm when he held the Royal Scepter; Anne late wife of John de Hastings Earl of Pembroke, for his Manour of Athele in Norfolk, to have the Office of Naperer; which he was admitted to do by her Deputy Sir Thomas Blunt: Richard Earl of Arundell, for his Manour of B. in Kent, was admitted to be chief Butler: The L. Maior of London, to attend in his own person, as chief Cup-waiter: Sir John Dimmock, for his Manour of Scribolvie; and Sir Baldwin Frevile, for his Castle of Tamworth, in the county of Warwick, contended for the Office of being the Kings Champion, but adjudged to Dimmock: William de Latimer, and John the son and heir of John Mowbray of Acholm, jointly petitioned to have the Office of Almoner; but adjudged to Latimer: Richard Lion, as Tenant of the Manour of L. held by the service of making wafers for the King at his Coronation, was thereunto admitted: The Barons of the Cinque-Ports were admitted to bear the Kings Canopy, upon four slaves of silver, over the Kings head; and also to sit at meat in the Hall, at the highest Table on the Kings right hand: John Pitt-John, by reason of his Manour of S. in Norfolk, was admitted to be chief Larderer: Richard Herring, for the Manour of the C. in the County of Surrey, claimed to be Usher of the Kings Chamber; but because that claim did no way concern the Coronation, he was left to pursue his Right some other time. The Coronation it self was performed with great solemnity: After a Sermon, the King took his Oath; and then the Archbishop blessed the King; which done, he tore off his garments, and stripped him into his shift; then he anointed

tion.

A anointed his hands, head, breast, shoulders, and the joyntes of his arms, with the sacred Oyle; & after certain Prayers, he then clad him, first with the Coat of S. Edward, and after with his Mantle: after which, the Archbishop delivered him the Sword, saying, Accipe Gladium; with which two Earls girded him: Then he gave him Bracelets, saying, Accipe Armillas. After this, he put upon him an uper veiture called a Pall, saying, Accipe Pallium. In the mean time, while the Archbishop blessed the Crown, he to whose office it pertained, put spurs on his heels; after, the Crown was blessed, the Archb. set it on his head, saying, Coronet te Deus; then he delivered him a Ring, saying, Accipe Annulum. Immediately herewith came the L. Furnival, by virtue of his Office, offering him a red Glove with the Archb. blessed, & putting it on his hand, delivered him a Scepter, saying, Accipe Sceptrum; and after that, into his other hand, delivered him a Rod, on the top whereof stood a Dove, saying, Accipe Virgam Virtutis; & then blessed the King, saying, Benedicat te Deus; which done, the King kissed the Bishops and Abbots, by whom he was afterward led to his seat; and so ended the solemnity.

The tender years of the King, being but eleven years of age, required a Protector; but being perhaps thought dangerous to commit that Authority to only one, who might rather seek to get it for himself, than to keep it for another, it was thought fit to commit it to many; and thereupon John Duke of Lancaster, Edmund Earl of Cambridge, the Kings Uncles, with some other Lords and Bishops, were joyned in Commission to manage the State; and Gifford de Angoulesme appointed to be his School-master. And now the Kings Minority made forain Princes conceive, that this would be a time of advantage for any that had quarrel to England: which the French and Scots took presently hold of; For, the French came now, and burnt the Town of Rye; and soon after, entering the Isle of Wight, burnt divers Towns there; and though they were repelled from the Cattle by the valiant Sir Hugh Tyrrel Captain there, yet they constrained the men of the Isle to give them a thousand Marks, to spare the residue of their houses and goods: and departing thence, they set on land where they saw advantage, burning sundry Towns near to the shore; as Portsmouth, Dorchester, and Plimmouth; and then sailing towards Dover, they burnt Hastings, assaulted Winchelsey; but being valiantly defended by the Abbot of Battell, were forced to retire: After this, they landed not far from the Abbey of Levis, at a place called Rottingham, where the Prior of Levis, with Sir Thomas Cheyney, and Sir John Fallesley, encountering them, were overthrow, and taken Prisoners. And now lets then the French, were the Scots also now busie; for coming one morning by stealth, they won the Castle of Berwick; but shortly after, upon knowledge thereof had, they were driven out again by the Barls of Northumberland and Nottingham; and all the Scots they found in it, except Alexander Ramsay their Captain, put to the sword. About Michaelmas, as Parliament was held at Westminster, wherein Alice Pierce, the late Kings Concubine, was banished the Realm, and all her goods confiscate; and two Tenths of the Clergie, and two Fifteenths of the Temporality were granted; but so, as that two Citizens of London, William Walworth, and John Philpot, should receive and keep it, to set it bestowed for defence of the Realm. In this time, Sir Hugh Calverley, Deputy of Callice, burnt six and twenty French ships in the Haven of Bollogne; and at the same time a great Navie set out, under the guiding of the Earl of Buckingham, the Duke of Brittain, the Lord Latimer, Sir Robert Knolls and others, with a purpose to intercept the Spanish Fleet; E but through tempest was twice driven back: when in the mean time, one Mercer a Scottish Pirate, came to Scarborough, took there divers ships, and committed many out-rages: and no order being taken to repel him, a Citizen of London, named John Philpot, at his own charges set forth a Fleet, and in his own person encountering them, took the said Mercer, and all his ships: and returning home, in stead of being rewarded for his service, he was called in question for presuming to raise a Navie without advice of the Kings Council: but he gave such reasons for that he had done, that not only he came off then with credit, but lives in reputation for it to this day. Indeed reasons of State, though they may be secretly censured, yet they must not openly be controlled; for this were to bring authority into contempt, and instead of errors to bring in confusion; but yet when wrongs be offered that are publick, every particular person seems to have an interest in taking revenge; and though it may be no manners not to stay the States leisure, yet it can be no offence to do their work for them.

Many actions passed at this time with the French and Scots, some prosperous, and some adverse: The Scots burn Roxborough; this was adverse: but the Earl of Northumberland entering Scotland with ten thousand men, spoileth the Lands of the Earl of March, the chief Incendiary; this was prosperous: but when the Northern men would needs make a Road into Scotland, and were encountered by the Scots, and put to flight, this was adverse. Anon after Midsummer, the Duke of Lancaster, with the Earls of Buckingham, Warwick, Stafford, and others of the Nobility, with a strong power took the Sea, and landing in Brittain, besieged the Town of S. Malo; but finding strong opposition, is forced to raise his siege, and return home: this was adverse. And now again, the Scots by night entred secretly into the Castle of Berwick, and flew Sir Robert Baynton, that was Constable there: this also was adverse. But when the Earl of Northumberland, being advertised thereof, came with a power, assaulted the Castle, and after two days defence recovered it again; this was prosperous: William Montacute Earl of Salisbury, the Kings Lieutenant in Callice, forsogeth the Country round about, and furnisheth Callice with booties of French cattel: Sir Hugh Calverley and Sir Thomas Percy made Admirals, put to Sea, and take divers ships laden with merchandize, and one ship of war: Sir John Hurleston, Captain of Chirborough in France, issuing forth assaults a Fortrefs of the French, which was the store-houle of their provision, and with much valour takes it: these were prosperous: but when Sir Joh. Clerk lying in garison in a castle in Brittain, where where lay many English Ships in the Haven, had these Ships set upon by the French; where though he shewed incredible valour in the action, yet the Ships were taken, and himself slain: this was adverse. Also in the third year of this Kings Reign Sir John Arundell, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir Thomas Percy, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Banister, and many other Knights went to Sea, with a purpose to pass over into Britain; but were so beaten back with Tempest, that divers of their Ships were cast away; and Sir John Arundell, Sir Thomas Banister, Sir Nicholas Trampington, Sir Thomas Dale, and above a thousand others were drowned; only Sir Thomas Percy, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Elmham, and certain others escaped. It may not be impertinent to note here the sumptuousness of those times; for this Sir John Arundell was then said in his future to have two and fifty new suits of apparel of cloth of Gold and Tissue, all lost at Sea.

The French enter England and take and burn divers Towns.

The Scots also invade the borders, but with little success. Alice Pierce banished the Realm. A subsidie granted, but with condition.

They beheaded the Chancellor and the furor.

This year also, there being found inconvenience in having many Governours of the King and Kingdom; it was by Parliament decreed, That the Lord Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, should himself alone hold the place of Protector. About this time Sir John Annesley Knight accused Thomas Katrington Esquire, for betraying the Fortresses of St. Eustach to the French: which Katrington denying, at the suit of Annesley, a solemn combat is permitted to be between them; at which combat the King and all the great Lords were present: the Esquire Katrington was a man of a mighty stature, the Knight Annesley a little man; yet through the justness of his cause, after a long fight, the Knight prevailed; and Katrington the day after their combat dyed. Fabian saith, he was drawn to Tiburn, and there hanged for his false accusation. In the beginning of the fourth year of this King, Thomas of Woodstock Earl of Buckingham, the Kings Uncle, with divers Barons and Lords, and an Army of seven or eight thousand, was sent into France, to aid the Duke of Burgundy; but the King of France at that time dying, the Duke of Burgundy grew to have peace with the new King; whereupon the Earl of Buckingham came home again without doing much; but making of Knights, and foraging the Country. In this time the French and Spanish Gallies did much mischief on the Coast of England; they burnt Rye, Hastings, and Portsmouth; and at last entering the River of Thames, they came up to Gravesend, where they burnt most part of the Town, and taking many Prisoners and Booties returned into France.

At this time also, there fell out an accident of great disturbance to the Realm, for the Commons rose in divers parts, beginning at Depford in Kent; and the cause of their rising grew (as was thought) through the rude behaviour of a Collector of the Poll-money, whose coming into the house of one John Tyler, and demanding Poll-money of his wife for a daughter of hers; and the saying that her daughter was not of age to pay; the rude fellow said he would preferre to see whether she were for or no, & thereupon forcibly turned up her cloaths; whereat the mother making an out-cry, her husband being at work hard by, and hearing the noise, came in with his lathing-staff in his hand, with which he gave the Collector such a blow on the head, that his brains flew out, and he presently died. Upon this, at the complaint of Tyler amongst his neighbours, and withal a factious Clergy-man, one John Ball, taking occasion hereat to rip up the ground of this Misgovernment, and telling the people that this difference of mens Estates, where some are Potentates, and some are Bondmen, was against Christian Liberty, taking for his Theme, When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then a Gentleman? he so incited them, that the Commons in divers parts drew together; and whether beginning in Kent, or otherwise in Essex, they drew at last into their faction the Commons of Sussex, Hartfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Suffolk, Norfolk, and other Shires; and arresting all such as passed, made them swear to be true to King Richard, and to the Commons, and never to receive any King that should be called John; which they did for the envy they bore to John Duke of Lancaster. Thus their number still increased, that by that time they were come as far as Blackheath, they were esteemed to be a hundred thousand. The first thing they did when they came to London, was to send for one Richard Lyons, a grave Citizen, who had been Tylers Matter, & his head they struck off, and carried it upon a pole in Triumph before them: The next day they came to the Savoy, the Duke of Lancasters house, which they set on fire, burning all his rich Furniture, breaking in pieces all his Plate and Jewels, and throwing them into the Thames, laying they were men of Justice, and would not like Robbers enrich themselves with any mans goods; and when one of their fellows was egypted to thrust a fair silver piece into his pocket, they took him, and cast both him and the piece into the fire: Two and thirty of them were got into the Dukes Winecellar, where they stayed drinking so long, till the rafters of the house, on fire, fell upon them, and so covered them; that not able to get out, they were heard cry seven days after, and then perished. From the Savoy they went to the Temple, where they burnt the Lawyers lodgings, with their Books and writings, and all they could lay hand on: Also the House of St. Johns by Smithfield they set on fire, so that it burned for the space of seven days together. After this they came to the Tower, where the King was then lodged, and though he had at that time fix hundred Armed men, and as many Archers about him, yet he durst not but suffer them to enter; where they abused the Kings Mother, offering to kiss her in such rude manner that she fell into a swoon: and finding in the place Simon Thibald Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Chancellor; and Sir Robert Hales also Lord Treasurer; they led them to the Tower-hill, and there in most cruel manner struck off their heads, as also of divers others. Neither spared they sacred places; for breaking into the Church of the Augustine Friars, they drew forth thirteen Flemings, and beheaded them in the open streets; as also seventeen others out of other Churches. Yet after all these outrages, the King proclaimed Pardon to all such as would lay down Arms, and go quietly home; which the Essex men did; but the Kentish men continued still with their Captain

Tyler.

A Tyler, a cowardin when the King sent Sir John Newton to understand what his meaning was; Wat Tyler, offended because he came on Horse-back, told him it became him to light from his Horse in his presence, and therewith drew out his dagger to strike him: the King perceiving his Knight to be in danger, bade him alight from his Horse; but when this would not pacifie him, the Mayor of London, William Walworth, by the Kings appointment rode to him and arrested him, and gave him such a blow on the head, that he astonished him; and then other of the Kings servants drew their swords, and thrust him through divers parts of his body, so he dyed there in the place. When the Commons saw this, they cryed out, Our Captain is slain, let us revenge it. Here the King, though very young, not above fifteen years of age, yet had the courage to ride unto them, telling them, that now their Leader was dead; he would be their Leader himself; and if they would follow him into the fields, they should have whatsoever they desired. In the mean time the Lord Mayor Walworth had gone into the City, and raised a thousand armed men; and meeting Sir Robert Knolls by chance got him to be their leader; who coming into the fields where the Rebels were, so daunted them, that throwing down their weapons, they cryed for mercy; that it was a wonderful thing to see how suddenly Fear overtook Presumption; for scarce their words of insolvency were out of their mouths, when they fell to words of most servile submission. And as strange an alteration in those about the King, to see how suddenly Boldness surprized Fear; for scarce they left trembling at the sight of the Rebels, when suddenly upon sight of this aid their fingers itched to be setting upon them, but that the King would not suffer it, because some amongst them were there by compulsion; and to set upon them this mingled might as well be the death of the innocent, as of the guilty. But to pacifie them the more, the King caused his Charter of Magnamission to be sent unto them; which yet stayed them not from committing out-rages at St. Albans, and cancelling the ancient Charters of the Abbots and Monks there. Besides, the sedition was more general, then that the appealing it in one place could be final; for at the same time there were gathered together in Suffolk to the number of fifty thousand, by the setting on of one John Wray a lewd Priest: And these fell to destroy the houses of Lawyers specially; and Sir John Crowthill Lord Chief Justice of England they beheaded, and set his head upon the Pillory in St. Edmundsbury. The like commotion of the Commons was at the same time also in Cambridgeshire, in the Isle of Ely, and in Norfolk, under the guiding of one John Littlester a Dyer; and to countenance their proceeding the more, they had a purpose to have brought William Afford Earl of Suffolk into their fellowship; but he, advertised of their intention, suddenly rose from supper, and got him away; but many other Lords and Knights they compelled to be sworn to them, and to ride with them; as the Lord Scates, the Lord Morley Sir John Breche, Sir Stephen Hales, and Sir Robert Salle, who not enduring their insolencies, had his brains dashed out by a Countrey Clown that was his bondman: The rest terrified by this example, were glad to carry themselves submissively to their Chieftain, John Littlester, who named himself King of the Commons, and counted it a preferment for any to serve him at his Table, in taking the assay of his meats and drinks with kneeling humbly before him, as he sat at meat. And now these fellows, upon a consultation, send two eloquence men, namely, the Lord Morley, and Sir John Brewe, with three of their chief Commons, to the King, for their Charter of Manumillion and Enfranchising: who being on their way at Ichingham not far from Newmarket, they met with Henry Spenser Bishop of Norwich; and he examining them if there were any of the Rebels in their company, and hearing that three of the chief were there present, he presently caused their heads to be struck off; and then pursuing on towards Northwalsham in Norfolk, where the Commons stayed for an answer from the King; by that time he came thither, where he had at first but eight Lances, and a small number of Archers in his company; his number was so increased, that it came to be a complete Army, with which he set upon the Rebels, discomfited them, and took John Littlester and their other Chieftains, whom he caused all to be executed; and by this means the Countrey was quieted. After this the Mayor of London sat in Judgment upon Offenders; where many were found culpable, and lost their heads; amongst other, Jack Straw, John Kirkeby, Alane Tredrar, and John Sterling, who gloried that he was the man had slain the Archbishop: Also Sir Robert Tresilian Chief Justice, was appointed to sit in Judgment against the Offenders; before whom above fifteen hundred were found guilty; and in sundry places put to death: amongst others John Ball Priest, their Incendiary; of whom it is not impertinent to relate a Letter he wrote to the Rebel-rabble of Essex; by which we may see how fit an Orator he was for such an Auditory, and what strength of persuasion there was in Non-sense.

John Sheep St. Mary Priest of York, and now of Colchester, greeteth well John Namble, and John the Miller, and John Carter; and biddeth them that they beware of guile in Borough, and stand together in Gods name: and biddeth Piers Plowman go to his work and chastise well Hob the Robber, and take with you John Trenman and all his fellows, and no more. John the Miller ye ground small, small, small; the Kings Son of Heaven shall pay for all. Beware or ye be woe: Know your friend from your foe: Have enough and say Ho; and do well and better: Flee sin, and seek peace, and hold you therein: and so biddeth John Trenman and all his fellows;

Neither is it impertinent to declare the Confession of Jack Straw at his execution: "When we were assembled (said he) upon Blackheath, and had sent to the King to come to us, our purpose was to have slain all Knights and Gentlemen that should be about him: and as for the King, we would have kept him amongst us, to the end the people might more boldly have repaired

"repared to us, and when we had gotten power enough, we would have slain all Noblemen, and specially the Knights of the Rhodes, and lastly, we would have killed the King, and all men of possessions, with Bishops, Monks, Parsons of Churches, only Friars Mendicants we would have spared, for administration of the Sacraments: Then we would have devised Laws according to which the people should have lived; for we would have created Kings, as Wat Tyler in Kent, and others in other Countries: and the same evening that Wat Tyler was killed, we were determined to set fire in four corners of the City, and to have divided the spoil amongst us: and this was our purpose, as God may help me now at my last end. For his service done in this felonious business, the King knighted the Maier William Walworth, and gave him a hundred pounds a year in Fee; also he knighted five Aldermen his brethren, girding them about the waist with the girdle of Knighthood, which was the manner of graduating in those days; but as Stow saith, the manner of Knighthood was rather thus; to cause him to put a halberd on his head, and then the King with a sword in both his hands, to strike him strongly on the neck. And to do the City itself honour, the King at this time granted there should be a dagger added to the Arms of the City; for till this time the City bore only the Cross without the dagger.

A Truce is concluded between England and France.

And now all parts being quiet, the King by Proclamation revoked, and made void his former Charters of Infranchising the Bondmen of the Realm; and that they should stand in the same condition they were before. In the time of this edition, the Duke of Lancaster had been sent into Scotland, to keep the Scots quiet, who so carried the matter; that before the Scots heard of the edition, a Truce was concluded for two or three years. But the Duke coming back to Berwick, was denied by the Captain Sir Matthew Redman, to enter the Town, because of a Coma mandement given him by the Earl of Northumberland, Lord Warden of the Marches, not to suffer any person to enter the same; which the King indeed had appointed to be done, forgetting the Duke of Lancaster that was then in Scotland; but howsoever, this bred such a spleen in the Duke against the Earl, that at his coming home he laid many things to the Earls charge, and the Earl as stoutly answered his objections; and so far it proceeded, that both of them came to the Parliament which was then beginning, with great numbers of armed men, and themselves in Armour, to the great terror of the people: but the King wisely taking the matter into his own hands, made them friends. At which time, the Lady Anne, sister to the Emperor Vincennes, and affianced Wife to the King, was come to Calice; whereupon the Parliament was prorogued: the Lady was brought to London, joyned in marriage to the King, and Crowned Queen at Westminster by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with great solemnity. After the marriage, the Parliament began again; in which William Ufford Earl of Suffolk being chosen by the Knights of the Shires to deliver in behalf of the Common-wealth, certain matters concerning the same, the very day and hour in which he should have done the business, as he went up the stairs towards the upper House, he suddenly fell down and dyed, having been merry and well before, to all mens judgments. About this time the Lord Scrope was deposed from the Chancellourship, for refusing to seal some Grants which the King had made: and the King receiving the Great Seal at his hands, kept it a certain time, and sealed with it such Grants and Writings as he pleased; till at length it was delivered to Robert Brailbrooke Bishop of London, who was made Lord Chancellour.

Henry Spenser Bishop of Norwich, had lately with the Kings leave, raised an Army, and was gone into France, in behalf of Pope Urban, against the Anti-Pope Clement; and entering first into Flanders, he took and sacked many Towns; at last beliedged Tpres; till by an Army of French (greater then was thought could have been raised in France) he was forced to raise his siege; and then passing divers places, he came to Graveling; from whence he writ to King Richard, that if ever he meant to try battel with the French, now was the time. The King was at that time at Dayntrie in Northamptonshire; and being at supper, when the word was brought him, he instantly rose from the Table, got to Horseback, and rode in Post with such speed that he came to St. Albans about midnight; where making no stay, but while he borrowed the Abbots Gelding, he baited forth till he came to Westminster, as though he had meant never to rest till he had given battel to the French-men: but after he had taken counsel of his Pillow, his mind was altered, and he thought it better to employ some other, than to go himself: so the Duke of Lancaster is thought the fittest man; but he protracted the time so long in making preparation, that before he could be gone, the Bishop was come away: And this indeed is the condition of many, to spend so much time in preparing, that they utterly lose all opportunity of acting; like to men that are putting on their cloaths so long, till it be time to put them off again. Shortly after a Truce was concluded between England and France, to endure till the Feast of Saint Michael, which should be in the year 1384.

Of Acts done after he came of Age.

THE Scots in this mean time, had made Roads into England, and taken and burnt divers Towns upon the Borders: whereupon the Duke of Lancaster, with his Brother the Earl of Buckingham, is sent with a mighty Army to repress them; but having entred Scotland, and not able to draw the Scots to a battel, they only burnt certain Towns, and then returned.

About

About this time an Irish Fryer of the order of the Carmelites, charged the Duke of Lancaster with heinous crimes; as that he intended to destroy the King, and usurp the Crown; shewing the time, the place, and other circumstances of the whole plot. But the Duke called to his answer, so cleared himself, at least gave such colours of clearing, that the accuser was committed to the custody of John Holland the Kings half-brother, till a day appointed for further trial: The night before which day, the said Lord Holland and Sir Henry Green are said to have come to this Fryer, and putting a cord about his neck, eyed the other end about his privy members, and after hanging him up from the ground, laid a stone upon his belly, with the weight whereof his very back-bone burst asunder; thereby putting him to a most tormenting death: An act not more inhumane then unadvised; for though it took away the Accuser, yet it made the accusation more suspicious.

A Fryer accusing the Duke of Lancaster with treason, is secretly put to a miserable death.

At this time, though a Truce had been made with the Scots, yet they would not be quiet; but entred and won the Castle of Berwick; whereof the Earl of Northumberland was Captain, but had committed the keeping of it to another; for which being blamed, he went not against them with an Army, but took an easier course, for with the sum of two thousand Marks he bought them out, and had the Castle surrendered into his hands again. The King upon some new displeasure, being now incensed against the Duke of Lancaster, had a purpose to have him arrested and arraigned of certain points of Treason, before Sir Robert Tresilian Chief Justice, though he ought to be tried by his Peers: but the Duke having intimation hereof, got him to his Castle of Ponfret, and stood upon his guard; till the Kings Mother, (notwithstanding her indisposition of body, by reason of her corpulency) riding to and fro betwixt them, pacified the King, and made them friends.

The Scots win Berwick, but are bought out with money.

In the ninth year of King Richard's Reign, the French King sent the Admiral of France into Scotland, with a thousand men of Arms, besides Cross-bows and others, to aid the Scots against the English; with which aid the Scots encouraged, enter the English borders: whereof King Richard advertised, himself with a mighty Army enters Scotland, and coming to Edenborough, and finding all the people fled, he set fire on the houses, burnt the Church of S. Giles, only Holy-Rood house was spared at the Duke of Lancaster's suit, in remembrance of the friendship he had formerly received in that house. The Scots by no means could be drawn to any battel; but to divert the Kings Army, they entered Cumberland, and besieged Carlisle, where by the valour of Sir Lewis Clifford and Sir Thomas Musgrave they were repelled; and hearing of the Kings Army coming towards them, and fearing to be inclosed, they drew back into Scotland, and the King returned into England. But in this mean while, the English of Calice took many prizes of French Ships at Sea, and many booties also by land, at one time four thousand Sheep, and three hundred head of great Cattel.

King Richard with a mighty Army enters Scotland, burns some Towns, and returns.

This year the King called a Parliament at Westminster, where he created two Dukes, one Marquess and five Earls: Edmund of Langley Earl of Cambridge, the Kings Uncle was created Duke of York: Thomas of Woodstock, Earl of Buckingham, his other Uncle, Duke of Gloucester: Robert Vere Earl of Oxford, was made Marquess of Dublin: Henry of Bullingbrooke Son of John of Gaunt, was created Earl of Darby: Edward Plantagenet Son to the Duke of York, was made Earl of Rutland: Michael de la Poole Chancellour of England, was created Earl of Suffolk: and Thomas Monbray Earl of Nottingham, was made Earl Marshal. Also by authority of this Parliament Roger Mortimer Earl of March, Son and Heir of Edmund Mortimer, and of the Lady Philip, eldest Daughter and Heir to Lionell Duke of Clarence, third Son to King Edward the third, was established Heir apparent to the Crown of the Realm, and shortly after so proclaimed: but going into Ireland to his Lordship of Ulster, was there by the wilde Irish slain. This Roger Earl of March had Issue, Edmund, Roger, Anne, Alice, and Eleanor, which Eleanor was made a Nun: The two Sons died without Issue: Anne his eldest Daughter was married to Richard Earl of Cambridge, Son to Edmund of Langley; which Richard had Issue by the said Anne, a Son called Richard, that was after Duke of York, and Father to King Edward the fourth; also a Daughter named Isabel, married to the Lord Bourchier. Also this year Henry of Bullingbrooke Earl of Darby, married the Daughter and Heir of Humphrey Bohun Earl of Hereford, in whose right he was afterwards made Duke of Hereford.

This year also King Richard holding his Christmas at Eltham, Leo King of Armenia came thither to him, who in fear to have his Kingdom conquered by the Turks was come into Christendome to seek for aid: but his chief Errand into England was to have procured a Peace between the two Kings of England and France; but their spleens were so great against one another, that it was not in the power of his Physick to cure them.

At this time, the Duke of Lancaster, taking with him his wife the Lady Constance, and a Daughter he had by her named Katherine, and two other Daughters which he had by his former Wife, failed into Spain: he was attended in his journey with the Lord Lucie, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Basset, Willoughby, Fitz-water, Poynings, Bradson; and many other Lords and Knights, to the number of fifteen hundred men of Arms; whereof a thousand at the least were Knights & Esquires. The King at his taking leave gave him a Crown of Gold, and commanded he should be called King of Spain; and the Queen likewise gave another Crown of Gold to the Dutches. He landed first at Brest, and freed that Cattle from the French; from thence he sayled, and arrived at the Groyne in Spain, where he remained a moneth, and then went to Compostella, where he stayed a while: In which time his Constable Sir John Holland won divers Towns. The King takes the Government upon himself.

A plot to murder the Duke of Gloucester, and others that opposed the King. But stopped by Richard Exton Maier.

King of Portugal and the Duke of Lancaster met; where a marriage was concluded between the said King of Portugal and the Lady Philip Daughter to the Duke; which marriage shortly after was consummated, and the Lady sent into Portugal honourably accompanied. The Duke continued at Compostella all the winter: At March the King of Portugal and he entered the Confines of Castile where they took many Towns; and passing over the River of Duero entered into the Country De Campo; But the Spaniards not willing to come to a battle, but meaning to weary them out with delays; the English not used to such hot air, fell daily into many diseases: which the Duke seeing, accorded to a Truce. There died in this action, the Lord Philip water, Sir Richard Burley, a Knight of the Garter, the Lord Roynings, and Sir Henry Percy Count German to the Earl of Northumberland, also the Lord Talbot, and in all, twelve great Lords, fourscore Knights, two hundred Esquires, and of the meaner sort above five hundred. When the Army was broken up, the Duke of Lancaster, and the Dutchess his Wife went into Portugal; and after some stay there, they failed to Bayon, in the Marches of Gascoigne, where he reited a long time after: In which mean while there were offers made for a Marriage to be had between the Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French King, and the Lady Katherine Daughter to the Duke of Lancaster: which the King of Spain understanding, he began to doubt, lest if that marriage went forward, it might turn to his disadvantage; and thereupon by earnest suit, at length concluded a peace with the Duke of Lancaster, on this wise, That his eldest Son Henry should marry the Lady Katherine, the Duke of Lancaster's Daughter, and be intitled Prince of Asturias; and in consideration of this marriage, and that all claims should cease, which the Duke in right of his Wife might challenge or pretend, It was agreed, that the said Duke should receive yearly the sum of ten thousand Marks, during the lives of him and his Dutchess; and to have in hand the sum of two hundred thousand Nobles.

At this time, the French had a purpose to invade England, with no less a hope then to make a Conquest: and to that end, they prepared a mighty Navy: so as in the month of September, there were numbred about Sluis, Dam, and Blankerke, 1287 Ships, besides those which were rigged in Britain by the Constable, who had caused an Inclosure of a Field to be made of Timber, that when they were landed in England, they might therewith inclose their Field, and so lodge at more surety: but it so fortune that the Lord William Beauchamp Captain of Callice, took too of their Ships, whereof one was laden with a piece of the said Inclosure; and after that, another Ship laden with Guns, Gunpowder, and other Instruments of war; and after that again, two Ships more, laden with parcels of the said Inclosure, which King Richard caused to be reared and set up about Winchelsey Town: at last the foresaid Army came into Flanders, and arrived at Sluis, where, after some stay, they were so distressed for victuals, that in the End of November, they were glad to be gone, and return into France.

At this time, in a Parliament, Robert Vere Earl of Oxford and Marquess of Dublin, was created Duke of Ireland; and Michael de la Poole a Merchants Son, had lately before been created Earl of Suffolk, and made Chancellor of England. And now begins King Richard to enter, I may say, upon the confines of his Destiny: His gracing of undeserving men, and disgracing of men deserving, if they were not the causes, they were at least the occasions of his own disgracing, and destruction in the end. He was now come to be of full age to do all himself; which was indeed to be of full age to undo himself: for the faults of his younger years might have the excuse to be but Errors; but the faults of the age he was now at, were peremptory against him, and admitted no defence. And to hasten the pace of his destiny the faster, the ill counsel which before was but whispered in his ear, was now scarce forbore to be given him aloud: It is told him, that he is under tuition no longer, and therefore not to be controll'd, as in former times he had been; That to be crost of his will by his subjects, was to be their subject; It is no Sovereignty, if it be not absolute. At the instigation of which Counsel, the King in a Parliament now assembled, fell to expostulate with his Lords, asking them what years they thought him to be of? who answering, that he was somewhat more then one and twenty; Well, then (said he) I am out of your Wardship, and therefore look to enjoy my Kingdom as freely, as your selves at the like years enjoy your Patrimonies. But his flattering Favourites should have remembered, that though the King may not be controlled, where he can command, yet he may be opposed, where he can but demand; as now indeed he was: for when he came to demand a Subsidy towards his wars, he was answered, That he needed no Subsidy from his subjects, if he would but call in the debts which the Chancellor owed him: and if he were so tender of him, that he could not find in his heart to do it himself, they would do that work for him: and thereupon charged him with such crimes, that all his goods were confiscate, and himself adjudged to die, if the King so pleased: though some write, his sentence was only to pay a Fine of twenty thousand Marks, and a thousand pounds yearly beside. Upon this provocation, the opposite side seek present revenge: It is devised, that the Duke of Gloucester, as principal, and other Lords that crossed the Kings courses, should be invited to a supper in London, and there be murdered. In the execution of which plot the former Lord Maier, Sir Nicholas Brember, had a special hand: but the present Maier Richard Exton, moved to it by the King, would by no means consent; and thereupon the plot proceeded not. But for all these harsh strains, and many such other that passed this Parliament, a Subsidy was at length granted to the King, of half a Tenth, and half a Fifteenth; but with condition, that it should not be issued, but by order from the Lords, and the Earl of Arundel was appointed to receive it. But before this time; both Houses had directly agreed, that unless

A unless the Chancellor were removed, they would meddle no further in the Parliament. The King advertised hereof, sent to the Commons, that they should send unto Eltham (where he then lay) forty of their House to declare their mindes unto him: but upon conference of both Houses, it was agreed, that the Duke of Gloucester, and Thomas Arundel Bishop of Ely, should in the name of the Parliament go, unto him: who coming to the King, declared, That by an old Statute; the King once a year might lawfully summon his Court of Parliament, for reformation of all corruptions and enormities within the Realm: and further declared, That by an old Ordinance also it was Enacted, That if the King should absent himself forty days, not being sick, the Houses might lawfully break up, and return home. At this the King is said to say, Well, we perceive our people go about to rise against us, and therefore we think we cannot do better then to ask aid of our Cousin the King of France, and rather submit us to him then to our own Subjects. To which the Lords answered, they wondred at this opinion of his Majesty, seeing the French King was the ancient Enemy of the Kingdom; and he might remember what mischiefs were brought upon the Realm in King John's time, by such a course. By these and the like persuasions, the King was induced to come to the Parliament: and soon after John Northam Bishop of Durham is discharged of his Office of Lord Treasurer, and in his place was appointed John Gilbert Bishop of Hereford; a Frier of the order of Preachers: Also Michael de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, is discharged of his Office of Chancellor, and Thomas Arundel Bishop of Ely, by consent of Parliament, placed in his room. Also by Order of Parliament, thirteen Lords were chosen to have oversight, under the King, of the whole Government of the Realm: of which thirteen there were three of the New Officers named; as the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of Hereford Lord Treasurer, and Nicholas Abbot of Waltham Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal: The other ten were, William Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander Archbishop of York, Edmund of Langley Duke of York, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, William Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Exeter, Richard Earl of Arundel, Richard Lord Scrope, and John Lord Drevieux. But this participation of the Government being found inconvenient, held not long. Also in this Parliament, it was granted, that Robert de Vere, lately before created Duke of Ireland, should have and receive to his own use 30000 Marks which the French men were to give for the Heirs of the Lord Charles de Blois: but it was granted upon this condition, That before the next Easter he should pass over into Ireland, to recover such Lands as the King had there given him: so desirous the Lords and Commons were to have him removed from the Kings presence. But though the King gave way to this torrent of the Parliament for the present, yet as soon as the Parliament was dissolved, he dissolved also all that had been done, either against the Lord Chancellor, or against the Duke of Ireland, or against Alexander Nevil, Archbishop of York, and received them into more favour then ever he had done before.

In his tenth year, about the beginning of March, Richard Earl of Arundel, appointed Admiral, and Thomas Mowbray Earl of Nottingham, the Earl of Devonshire, and the Bishop of Nornich, went to Sea, with a warlike power of men and Arms, to watch for the Fleet of Flanders, that was ready to come from Rochel with wines; and meeting with them, they set upon them: and took of them to the number of a hundred Vessels, all fraught with wines; so as wine grew so plentiful, that it was sold for thirteen shillings four pence the Tun; and the best and choicest for twenty shillings. Besides this, they landed in Flanders, where they relieved and fortified Bress; and demolished two Forts which the Enemy had built against it. But this happy service of the Earl of Arundel, the Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Richard Sturrey, who continued still about the King, seemed rather to envy, then to commend: insomuch that when the Earl of Nottingham, that had ever been the playfellow, and of equal age to him, came to the Court, he was neither received by the Duke of Ireland with any good welcome, nor by the King with any good countenance: and therefore indeed, not by the King with any good countenance, because not by the Duke of Ireland with any good welcome.

About this time the Duke of Ireland fought to be divorced from his lawful Wife, Daughter to the Lady Isabel, one of King Edward the third's Daughters; and took to Wife one Lancaster, a Vintners daughter of Bohemia, one of the Queens maids: at which indignity, the Duke of Gloucester, that was Uncle to the Lady thus forsaken, took great displeasure; which the Duke of Ireland understanding, studied how by some means he might dispatch the Duke of Gloucester out of the way: Easter was now past, the time appointed for the Duke of Ireland's going over into Ireland; when the King with a shew to bring him to the waters side, went with him into Wales; and in his company Michael de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian, Lord Chief Justice, and divers others; who there consulted how they might dispatch the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, Derby, Nottingham, with divers other of that Faction: but when the King had remained in those parts a good while, he returned, and brought back the Duke of Ireland with him; and so his voyage into Ireland was clean forgotten. About the same time, Robert Tresilian Chief Justice came to Coventry, where he indicted two thousand persons. The King and the Queen came to Groby, and thither came by his Commandment, the Justices of the Realm, Robert Belknap Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, John Holt, Roger Fulthorpe, and William Borough, Knights: to whom it was propounded, to answer to these Questions following:

First, Whether the new Statute and Commission made in the last Parliament, were against the Kings Prerogative, or no? To which they all answered, It was.

The Parliament requires to have the Chancellor removed.

If the King absent himself from the Parliament forty days, it may lawfully break up.

The Lord Treasurer, and Lord Chancellor are discharged of their Offices. Thirteen Lords appointed to govern the Realm.

As soon as the Parliament was dissolved; all they had done, was presently again undone.

The Duke of Ireland puts away his lawful wife, near a kin to the Duke of Gloucester; and marries a Bohemian maid. Which the Duke of Gloucester offended at, it is plotted to dispatch him out of the way.

Questions propounded by the King, to the Judges, against the Lords: who all answer as the King would have them.

Secondly,

Secondly, How they ought to be punished, that procured the said Statute and Commission to be made? They answered with one assent, that they deserved death; except the King would pardon them.

Thirdly, How they ought to be punished who moved the King to consent to the making of the said Statute and Commission? They answered, they ought to lose their lives, unless the King would pardon them.

Fourthly, How they ought to be punished, that compelled the King to the making of that Statute? They answered, they ought to suffer as Traitors.

Fifthly, Whether the King might cause the Parliament to proceed upon Articles by him limited, before they proceed to any other? They answered, That in this the King should over-rule, and if any presumed to do contrary, he was to be punished as a Traitor.

Sixthly, Whether the King might not at his pleasure dissolve the Parliament, and command the Lords and Commons to depart? They all answered, He might.

Seventhly, Whether the Lords and Commons might, without the Kings will, impeach Officers and Justices, upon their Offences, in Parliament, or no? It was answered They might not; and he that attempted contrary, was to suffer as a Traitor.

Eighthly, How he is to be punished, who moved in the Parliament, that the Statute wherein Edward the Second was indicted in Parliament, might be sent for; by inspection of which Statute, the present Statute was devised? It was answered, That as well he that moved it, as he that brought the Statute into the House, were to be punished as Traitors.

Ninthly, Whether the Judgment given in Parliament against Michael de la Poole were erroneous and revocable? They answered, It was erroneous and revocable: and that if the Judgment were now to be given, the Justices would not give the same.

In witness of the Premises, the Justices aforesaid, to these Presents have set their Seals; in the presence of Alexander Archbishop of York, Robert Archbishop of Dublin, John Bishop of Durham, Thomas Bishop of Chester, John Bishop of Bangor, Robert Duke of Ireland, Michael Earl of Suffolk, John Ripon Clerk, and John Blake.

At this time the Londoners incurred much obloquie; For, having before been pardoned by the King of some crimes laid to their charge, they were now ready to comply with the King in his desires; and thereupon being impanelled, they indicted some Lords of many crimes informed against them. But not only the Justices aforesaid, but all other Justices and Sheriffs of the Realm were called at this time to Nottingham: the chief cause was, to understand what power of men they could assure the King of, to serve him against the Lords: and further, that where he meant shortly to call a Parliament, they should use the matter, that no Knight or Burges should be chosen, but such as the King and his Council should name. To which the Sheriffs made answer, that it lay not in their power to assemble any forces against the Lords, who were so well beloved: And as for choosing Knights and Burgeses, the Commons would undoubtedly look to enjoy their ancient liberties, and could not be hindered. But yet the King and the Duke of Ireland and Gloucester being advertised, he came secretly to conference with the Earls of Arundel, Warwick, and Derby; who upon consultation determined to talk with the King, with their Forces about them, and the King, on the other part, took advice how he might apprehend them apart; and thereupon, sent the Earl of Northumberland, and others, to the Castle of Rydd, to take the Earl of Arundel, who lay there at that time: but howsoever it fortuned, they failed of their purpose.

After this, he sent others to apprehend him: but he being warned by a Messenger from the Duke of Gloucester, conveyed himself away by night; and by morning was come to Harvington Park, where he found the Duke of Gloucester and the Earl of Warwick with a great power of men about them: The King hearing of this Assembly at Harvington Park, called his Council, to hear their opinion what was fit to be done: Some were of opinion, that the King should assemble his friends, and joining them with the Londoners, give them battle; the chiefest of this mind was the Archbishop of York: Others thought best, the King should seek to appease the Lords with fair promises, till a fitter opportunity to suppress them: But the King not yet resolved what course to take, caused only order to be taken, that no Citizen of London should sell to the Duke of Gloucester, the Earl of Arundel, or to any other of the Lords, any Armour or furniture of war, under a great pain. But for all this, the Lords proceeded in their course, and sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord John Lovell, the Lord Cobham, and the Lord John Devereux, requiring to have delivered to them such as were about the King, that were Traitors and Seducers both of him and the Realm: and further to declare, that their assembling was for the honour and wealth both of him and the Kingdom: The Duke of Ireland, the Earl of Suffolk, and two or three other about the King, persuaded him to offer Callice to the King of France, to have his assistance against the Lords. Wherein, the King sent to the Mayor of London, requiring to know how many able men the City could make? To which the Mayor answered, that he thought it could make fifty thousand men at an hours warning: Well then (said the King) go and prove what will be done. But when the Mayor went about it, he was answered, They would never fight against the Kings friends, and defenders of the Realm: At the same time the Earl of Northumberland said to the King: Sir, there is no doubt but these Lords have always been, and still are your true

No man to be gotten to serve against the Lords.

The King would have no Burgeses chosen to the Parliament, but such as he should name, but this could not be.

The King seeks to apprehend the Duke of Gloucester, and others.

The Lords require to have some about the King delivered to them.

What power the City could make upon a sudden.

A and faithful subjects, though now dissembler'd by certain persons about you, that seek to oppress them: therefore my advice is, that you send to them, to come before your presence in some public place; and I verily believe, they will show such reasons of their doings, that you will hold them excused. The Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely Lord Chancellor, and other of the Bishops there present, moved all of the Earls advise; whereupon the King sent the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely to the Lords, requiring them to come to him to Westminster, on Sunday then next following: which, upon Oath given by the Archbishop and the Chancellor, that no fraud nor evil practise should be used against them, they were content to do. But when the Lords were ready to come at the day appointed, they heard of an Ambush laid to entrap them at the Mews, and thereupon stayed, so as they came not at the time appointed:

B Whereupon, the King asking why they came not according to their promise? It was answered, Because he kept not his promise; there being an Ambush of a Thousand armed men laid to surprize them at the Mews. The King hearing this, was astonished, and swore he knew of no such thing, and commanded presently the place should be searched: but it was true; an ambush was laid, but not at the Mews, but in a place about Westminster, where Sir Thomas Tryvet, and Sir Nicholas Brember had assembled them. This one action might have made the King sensible of his favourites abusing his authority; but that where affection makes the construction, all things are taken in a good sense. Or was it perhaps they had a Warrant dormant, to prosecute the Kings ends without the Kings knowledge? Yet the Lords after this, receiving a false conduct from the King, came to Westminster; of whose coming when the King heard, he apparelled himself in his Royal Robes, and with his Scepter in his hand, came into the great Hall, before whom, the Lords upon their knees presented themselves, the King bidding them welcome, and taking each of them by the hand. Then the Lord Chancellor making a speech, wherein he blamed them for raising of Arms, and requiring to know the cause; they answered, They had done it for the good of the King and Kingdom, and to take away the Traitors about the King. Upon this the King himself spake, asking them whether they thought to compel him by strong hand: Have not I (saith he) sufficient men to bear you down? In this behalf I make no more account of you then of the basest skulion in my Kitchen. Yet after these great words, he lifted up the Duke of Gloucester, who all this while was kneeling, and commanded the rest also to rise, and then led them courteously to his chamber, where they sat and drank together: And finally it was concluded they should all meet again, as well these Lords, as those they accused, at the next Parliament; which the King promised to call speedily, and each party to receive there according to Justice, & in the mean time all parties to be in the Kings protection. But when the Favorite Lords heard this, they told the King plainly, they neither durst nor would put themselves to the hazard of such a meeting, and therefore the Duke of Ireland, and the rest of that faction left the Court to be out of the way: But the King not enduring their absence, appointed Thomas Molleneux Constable of the Castle of Chester, to raise an Army, & to safe conduct the Duke of Ireland to him; but they being come as far as Ruloeat-bridge, were encountered by the Earl of Derby; & the Duke of Ireland, not daring to joyn battle with him, fled, and being to pass a River, cast away his gantlers and sword (to be the more nimble) and giving his Horse the spur, leapt into the river, and so escaped; but when these things were afterward found, it was verily thought that he had been drowned, till news came he was got into Holland, where being no very welcome guest, he went from thence into the Bishoprick of Utrecht, & after two or three years scrambling about in manner of a fugitive, at Lovain in Brabant he ended his life.

C man of many good parts, and worthy enough of his Princes favour, if with that favour he had not grown proud, and in that pride, injurious and insulting over others no less deserving then himself. He was valiant enough against any man but the Earl of Derby, and of him indeed both the Genius of the Duke of Ireland, and of King Richard himself seemed to stand in fear, for neither of them durst meet him in the field, though encouraged to it by those about them.

D About this time the Duke of Suffolk doubting some plots laid to surprize him, fled over to Callice in disguise, shaving his beard, and counterfeiting himself a Poulterer, to sell certain fowl which he had gotten; but being come to Callice, was by the Lord William Beauchampe, Deputy of the Town, sent back into England, whom the King notwithstanding permitted to go at large, to make it be thought he was more afraid then hurt, more suspicious then he needed. By this time the Lords had gotten matter enough against the King, at least to justify their Arms, and thereupon with an Army of Forty thousand men, they came to London, where after some debate, they were received; and then the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Derby and Nottingham went to the King in the Tower to whom, after humble salutations, they shewed the Letter which he had written to the Duke of Ireland, to levy an Army for their destruction: likewise the Letters which the French King had written to him, containing a safe conduct for him to come into France, there to do acts to his own disonour and the Kingdoms.

E This done, upon the Kings promise that he would come the next day to Westminster to treat further of these matters, the Lords departed, only the Earls of Nottingham and Derby, at the Kings instance, stayed all night; but before the King went to bed his mind was clean altered for keeping his promise to meet the Lords the next day at Westminster, which the Lords understanding, they sent peremptorily to him, that if he came not according to his promise, they would choose another King, that should hearken to the faithful counsel of his Lords. This touched the King so to the quick, that the next morning he went and met the Lords; who there declared to him, how F They threaten to choose a new King.

The King requires the Lords, to come unto him; but they hearing of an ambush laid for them, forbore.

But upon safe conduct from the King they came, and the King received them in show kindly.

1388. It is concluded that at the next Parliament all parties should be heard.

The Duke of Ireland flies into Holland, and after two or three years dyed at Lovain.

The Earl of Derby a traitor both to the Duke of Ireland, and to the King himself.

The Lords with an Army of Forty thousand, came to the King at London, & shew their grievances.

Hereupon the King removes or puts in prison all those whom the Lords required.

The Parliament, that wrought wonders. Where all the Judges but one are arrested and sent to the Tower.

All the Judges banished the Realm. The King bound by Oath, to stand to such order as the Lords should take.

how much it concerned the good of the Kingdom, that those Traitors so often spoken of, A should be removed from the Court: To which the King, though much against his will, yet at last condescended: And thereupon presently Alexander Nevill Archbishop of York, and Thomas Ruffoke Bishop of Chichester, and Confeſſour to the King, were expelled the Court, who not willing to come to after-reckonings, fled no man knew whither. They expelled also John Fordham, Bishop of Durham, Lord Treasurer; the Lord Zouch of Haringworth, the Lord Burwell, the Lord Beaumont, Albery de Vere, Baldwin de Bereford, Richard Alderbury, John Worth, Thomas Clifford, and John Lovel, Knights: but constrained to put in sureties to appear at the next Parliament. Also certain Ladies were expelled the Court; as the Lady Poyning, the Lady Moulting, and others, bound to appear at the next Parliament. There were also arrested, and committed to several Prisons, Sir Simon Burley, William Elmham, John Beauchamp, Steward of the Kings House, Sir John Sarr, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Bernays, Sir Nicholas Digworth, and Sir Nicholas Brember, Knights. Also Richard Clifford, John Lincoln, Richard Mitford, the Kings Chaplains; Nicholas Selake, Dean of the Kings Chappel, and John Blake a Lawyer.

Shortly after, the Parliament began, (called afterward, The Parliament that wrought wonders:) On the first day whereof, were arrested as they fate in their places, all the Justices (but only Sir William Shipwith:) as Sir Roger Fasthorpe, Sir Robert Belknappe, Sir John Cary, Sir John Holt, Sir William Brork, and John Alackon the Kings Serjeant at Law; and were all sent to the Tower for doing contrary to an Agreement made the last Parliament. Also in the beginning of this Parliament, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevill Archbishop of York, Michael de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Tresilian Lord Chief Justice of England, were openly called to answer Thomas of Woodstock Duke of Gloucester, Richard Earl of Arundel, Henry Earl of Derby, and Thomas Earl of Nottingham, upon certain Articles of high Treason: and because none of them appeared, it was ordained by whole consent of Parliament, that they should be banished for ever, and all their lands and goods seized into the Kings hands (their intailed lands only excepted.) Shortly after, the Lord Chief Justice Robert Tresilian, was found in an Apothecaries house in Westminster; where being taken, he was brought to the Duke of Gloucester, who caused him the same day to be had to the Tower, and from thence drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged. On the morrow after, Sir Nicholas Brember was brought to his Answer; who being found guilty, was beheaded with an Axe which himself had caused to be made for beheading of others. After this Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Bernays, lusty young men, were drawn and hanged; as also John Beauchamp Lord Steward of the Kings House, John Blake Esquire: and lastly, Sir Simon Burley, Son to the great Sir John Burley Knight of the Garter, was beheaded on Tower-hill; whose death the King took more heavily and more painfully than all the rest. Also all the Justices were condemned to die, but by the Queens intercession, they were only banished the Realm, and all their Lands and Goods confiscate, only a small portion of money was assigned them for their sustentation. Finally, in this Parliament an Oath was required and obtained of the King, that he should stand unto, and abide such Rule and Order as the Lords should take: and this Oath was required also of all the Inhabitants of the Realm.

In the latter end of the Kings eleventh year, the Earl of Arundel was sent to Sea, with a great Navy of Ships and Men of War; with whom went the Earls of Nottingham and Devonshire, Sir Thomas Piercy, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Camois, Sir William Elmham, &c divers other Knights, to aid the Duke of Britain against the King of France: but before they came, the Duke of Britain, was reconciled to the King of France; and so needing not their aid, all this great Fleet returned with doing nothing. And it was indeed a year of doing nothing, unless we reckon some petty Inroads of the Scots: and that Sir Thomas Trivet dyed with a fall off his Horse: and that Sir John Holland, the Kings Brother by the Mother, was made Earl of Huntington: and that there was contention in Oxford, between the Northern and the Southern Scholars; which was pacified by the Duke of Gloucester.

In his twelfth year, Commissioners were appointed to meet at Balingham, betwixt Callice and Bulloign, to treat of a Peace between the Realms of England, France, and Scotland: and after long debating, a Truce was at last concluded, to begin at Midsummer next, and to last three years. But now the King, to shew his plenary authority of being at full age, removed the Archbishop of York from being Lord Chancellor, and put in his place William Wickham Bishop of Winchester: also he removed the Bishop of Hereford from being Treasurer, and put another in his place: The Earl of Arundel likewise unto whom the Government of the Parliament was committed, and the Admiralty of the Sea; was removed, and the Earl of Huntington put in his room.

About this time, the Lord John Hastings Earl of Pembroke, as he was practising to learn to Joust, was stricken about the privy parts, by a Knight called Sir John St. John; of which hurt he soon after dyed: In whose Family, it is memorable, that for many generations together, no son ever saw his father, (the father being always dead before the son was born.) The Original of this Family was from Hastings the Dane, who in the reign of King Alured, long before the Conquest, about the year 890. came with Rollo into England. But howsoever, in this John Hastings ended the then honourable Titles of the Hastings; for this man dying without issue, his Inheritances were dispersed to divers persons: The honour of Pembroke came to Francis at Court; by the Kings gift the Barons of Hastings and Welford came to Reynold Gray of Ruthin: the Barony of Aburgavenny was granted to William Beauchamp of Bedford.

About

A About this time, John Duke of Lancaster was created Duke of Aquitaine, receiving at the Kings hands the Rod and the Cap, as investitures of that Duchy. Also the Duke of York's Son and Heir was created Earl of Richmond.

In his thirteenth year, a Royal Juſts was Proclaimed to be holden within Smithfield in London, to begin on Sunday next after the Feast of S. Michael: which being published, not only in England, but in Scotland, in Alsaigne, in Flanders, in Brabant, and in France, many strangers came hither; amongst others Valeran Earl of S. Poll, that had married King Richards Sister; and William the young Earl of Oſervant, Son to Albert de Bayere Earl of Holland and Hainault. At the day appointed there issued forth of the Tower, about three a clock in the afternoon, sixty Courſers apparelled for the Juſts; and upon every one an Esquire of honour, riding a soft pace: After them came forth four and thirty Ladies of honour, (Froystard faith, threeſcore) mounted on Palfries, and every Lady led a Knight with a Chain of Gold: These Knights being on the Kings part, had their Armour and apparel garnished with white Harts, and Crowns of gold about their necks; and so they came riding through the streets of London, unto Smithfield: the Juſts lasted divers daies; Fabian faith, four and twenty: All which time the King and Queen lay at the Bishops Palace by Pauls Church, and kept open house for all comers.

In his fifteenth year, the Duke of Lancaster went into France, having in his train a thousand horse; and met the King of France at Amiens, to treat of a peace between the two Kingdoms: but after long debate, a Truce only was concluded for a year.

About this time also, the King required the Londoners to lend him a thousand pounds: which they refused to do; and not only so, but they abused an Italian Merchant, for offering to lend it. This moved the King to some indignation: to which was added the complaint of a Riot committed by the Citizens, against the servants of the Bishop of Salisbury Lord Treasurer; for that, where one of the Bishops servants, named Walter Roman, had taken a horse-loaf out of a Bakers Basket, as he passed in the streets, and ran with it into his Lords house; the Citizens thereupon assailed the house, and would not be quiet, till the Mayor and Aldermen were fain to come, and with much ado appeased them. Upon complaint hereof, urged against the Citizens, by the Bishop of Salisbury Lord Treasurer, and Thomas Arundell Archbishop of York Lord Chancellor, the Mayor and Aldermen, and divers other substantial Citizens are arrested: the Mayor is committed to the Castle of Windsor, and the other to other Castles; the liberties of the City are seized into the Kings hands, and the authority of the Mayor utterly ceased; the King appointing a Warden to govern the City, first Sir Edmund Derlington, and afterward Sir Baldwin Radington; still at length, by special suit of the Duke of Gloucester, the King was contented to come to London, to so great joy of the Citizens, that they received him with four hundred on horse-back, clad all in one Livery, and presented the King and Queen with many rich gifts: yet all gave not satisfaction, to have their liberties restored, till they afterwards paid ten thousand pounds. This it is to provoke a Lion: It may be fortune enough to us, if by any means we can but keep him quiet; for if once we provoke him to lay his paw upon us, it will be hard getting from him, and not be torn in pieces.

In his sixteenth year, the Dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester are once again sent into France, to treat of a peace: but when they could not agree with the French Commissioners upon Articles propounded, there was only a Truce concluded for four years; though perhaps a further agreement had then been made, but that the King of France fell newly again into his old fit of Frenlie, which called away the French Commissioners from further Treaty.

In his eighteenth year, a Proclamation was set forth, That all Irish men should avoid this Realm, and return home: The occasion was, because so many Irish were come over, that Ireland in a manner was left unpeopled: infomuch, that where King Edward the third had received from thence yearly the sum of thirty thousand pounds, the King now laid forth as much to repel Rebels. Whereupon at Michaelmas King Richard went himself into Ireland, attended with the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of March, Nottingham, and Rutland, the Lord Thomas Piercy Lord Steward, and divers others of the English Nobility; to whom came in the great Oseale King of Meth, Bryan of Thomond King of Thomond, Arthur Macmur King of Leynster, and Conhur King of Cheveny and Darpe: and these King Richard stayed all that Winter, and after Christmas called a Parliament; at which time also the Duke of York, Lord Warden of England, in the Kings name called a Parliament at Westminster: to the which was sent forth of Ireland the Duke of Gloucester, that he might declare to the Commons the Kings great occasions for supply of money; whose words so far prevailed, that a whole tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity.

In his twentieth year was a famous Enterview between the two Kings of England and France: where was set up for King Richard a rich Pavilion, a little beyond Gwyntes, within the English pales; and another the like for the French King, on this side Arge: The Distance betwixt the two Tents was beſer on either side with Knights armed with their swords in their hands, four hundred English on one side, and four hundred French on the other: the two Kings before their meeting took a solemn oath for assurance of their faithful and true meaning, to observe the sacred laws of amity one toward another, in this enterview. After the two Kings were come together, it was accorded, that in the same place where they met, there should be builded at both their costs a Chappel for a perpetual memory, which should be called, The Chappel of our Lady of Peace. On Simon and Judes day, the Kings talked together of Articles concerning the Peace; and having concluded them, they received either of them an Oath, upon the holy Evangelists, to observe and keep them. This done, the French King brought his Daughter Isabel, and delivered her to King Richard, who

A famous Enterview between the two Kings of England & France, and the manner of it.

King Richard marries Isabel the King of France's daughter, being but eight years of age.

The Duke of Lancasters issue by Katherine Swinford, legitimated by Parliament.

The Duke of Gloucester with unadvised words, moves the King to anger.

The Duke of Gloucester and other Lords conspire to seize upon King Richard, but are discovered.

The King by a wife, seizeth upon the Duke of Gloucester, and sends him presently to Calice, where soon after he lost his life.
Divers other Lords committed to the Tower.

who shortly after at Calice married her, and upon the 17 of January following, she was Crowned Queen at Westminster. A match of great honour, but of little conveniency, and less profit; for the Lady being but eight years of age, there could be no hope of Issue for a long time, which was King Richard's greatest want; and as little supply of his wants otherwise, her Portion perhaps scarce paying the charges of his journey to fetch her, who cost him three hundred thousand Marks.

The Duke of Lancasters, in the thirteenth year of King Richard's reign, had been created Duke of Aquitaine; but when the Gascoigners would not receive him, shewing reasons why that Duke-dome ought not to be separated from the Crown of England, his Grant was revoked, and so it remained still in Demefn of the Crown.

At this time, in a Parliament, the Duke of Lancasters caused to be legitimated the Issue he had by Katherine Swinford, before he married her; of whom Thomas Beaufort was created Earl of Somerset.

This year also, the King receiving the money back, which had been lent to the Duke of Brittany, upon Brest, delivered up the Town unto him; and thereupon, the English souldiers that were there in Garrison, were all discharged and sent home; who, at a Feast which the King kept at Westminster, coming in companies together into the Hall; as soon as the King had dined, and was entering into his Chamber, the Duke of Gloucester asked him, if he did mark those men that stood in such troops in the Hall: yes marry (said the King) who were they? They were (said the Duke) those Souldiers, who by your rendering up of Brest have been sent home, and now must either starve or steal; and therewithal, very unadvisedly in words, taxed the King with unadvisedness of his or deed: To whom the King in great anger replied, Why Unkle, do you think me a Mergle, or a Fool, to sell my land? By S. John Baptists No: But could I refuse to render the Town, when tender was made upon the money lent, upon it? Indeed nothing could more discover the Duke of Gloucesters, either weakness if he knew not that Brest was but only a Mortgage; or in justice, if knowing it, he would have had the King, though the money were rendered, to have kept it still: but such is the course of many, to take part with the Politicks against the Ethicks; work their ends by doing unjustly, when doing justly ought to be their chiefest end. However it was, the multiplying of words about this matter, kindled in the King such a displeasure against the Duke, that it could never afterwards be quenched, but by his blood. And first he complained to his other two uncles, the Dukes of Lancasters and York, of his undutiful behaviour towards him; who told the King, their Brother perhaps might let fall some unadvised words, but they knew his heart to be true and faithful. Yet doubting how far the King might press upon them to answer for their brothers faithfulness, they retired from Court: which gave the Dukes enemies time to incense the King farther against him.

It happened that the Duke of Gloucester had with him one day at his house, the Abbot of S. Albans, that was his Godfather, and the Prior of Westminster: and after dinner falling in talk with them, amongst other communications the Duke required the Prior to tell truth, whether he had any Vision the night before? To which the Prior was loth at first to make a direct Answer; but at last, being earnestly requested, as well by the Abbot as the Duke, he confessed that he had a Vision indeed, which was, that the Realm of England should be destroyed through the misgovernance of King Richard. By the Virgin Mary (said the Abbot) I had the very same Vision. Whereupon the Duke presently disclosed to them all the secrets of his mind, and by their devices contrived an assembly of divers great Lords of the Realm, to meet at Arundell Castle that day fortnight; at which time he appointed to be there himself, with the Earls of Darby, Arundell, Marshall, and Warwick; also the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Abbot of S. Albans, the Prior of Westminster, with divers others: And accordingly all these met at Arundell Castle, at the day appointed: where receiving first the Sacrament, by the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be assistant each to other, in all such matters as they should determine; they resolved to seize upon King Richard, and upon the Dukes of Lancasters and York, and commit them to prison; and all the other Lords of the Kings Council, they determined should be drawn and hanged. But the Earl Marshall, that was Deputy of Calice, and had married the Earl of Arundell's daughter, discovered all their counsel to the King; who thereupon, by a plot devised by his Council, took his Brother the Earl of Huntingdon with him, and rising from supper, rode that night to the Duke of Gloucesters house at Plashey in Essex. When the King came thither, the Duke was a-bed; but informed of it, cast his Cloak about his shoulders, and came down, bidding the Kings grace, with all reverence, welcome. The King courteously requested him to go and make himself ready, for that he must needs ride with him a little way, to confer of some business. The Duke presently made him ready and came down; and as soon as the King and his Company was gone a little way from the house, and the Duke with him, the Earl Marshall arrested the Duke, as he had been appointed to do by the King, who immediately was sent to Calice, where after some time he was dispatched of his life, either strangled, or else smothered with Pillows, as some write.

At the very same time was the Earl of Arundell apprehended by the Earls of Rutland and Kent: the Earl of Warwick also, when the King had invited him to dinner, and shewed him very good countenance, was taken and arrested in the place: as likewise at the same time were apprehended, and committed to the Tower, the Lord John Cobham, and Sir John Cheyny. Shortly after, the King procured them to be indicted at Nottingham, forbearing such as should appeal them in Parliament; namely, Edward Earl of Rutland, Thomas Mowbray Earl Marshall, Thomas Holland Earl of Kent, John Hekland Earl of Huntingdon, Thomas Beaufort Earl of Somerset, John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spenser, and the Lord William Scroope Lord Chamberlain: and in the mean

A mean time, the King sent for a power of Cheshire men, to keep Watch and Ward about his Person.

On the 17. of September, a Parliament began at Westminster; wherein the King complained as well of many things done by the Lords in his Minority, as also of the hard dealing which they had used towards the Queen, who was three hours at one time on her knees, before the Earl of Arundell, for one of her Esquires, named John Calverley, who nevertheless had his head smitten from his shoulders; and all the answer she could get, was this: Madam, pray for your self and your Husband, and let this suit alone. Those that set forth the Kings grievances in this Parliament, were John Bushie, William Bagot, and Thomas Green. The cause of assembling the Parliament was shewed, that the King had called it for reformation of divers transgressions against the peace of this Land, by the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundell, Warwick, and others. Then Sir John Bushie, Speaker of the Parliament, made request on behalf of the Commonalty, that they might be punished according to their deservings; and specially the Archbishop of Canterbury, who then late next the King, whom he accused of high Treason. When the Archbishop began to answer, Sir John Bushie besought the King, that he might not be admitted to answer, lest by his great wit and cunning he might lead him away to believe him. And here Sir John Bushie in all his talk did not attribute to the King titles of honour due and accustomed, but such as were fitter for the Majesty of God than for any earthly Prince. And when the Archbishop was constrained to keep silence, Sir John Bushie proceeded; requiring on the behalf of the Commons, that the Charters of Pardon, granted to the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earls of Arundell and Warwick, should be revoked.

The King for his part protested that they were drawn from him by compulsion, and therefore besought them to deliver their opinions, what they thought thereof: whereupon, the Bishops first gave their sentence, that the said Pardons were revokable, and might be called in; but pretending a scrupulosity, as if they might not with safe consciences be present where Judgment of blood should pass, they appointed a Lay-man to be their Prolocutor for that turn. The temporal Lords likewise gave their sentence, that the Pardons were revokable: only the Judges and Lawyers were not of this opinion. But howsoever the Archbishop of Canterbury is hereupon condemned to perpetual Exile, and appointed to avoid the Realm within six weeks. Also the Earl of Arundell is by the Duke of Lancasters, who fate that day as High Steward, condemned of Treason, and on the Tower-hill beheaded. There went to see the execution, divers Lords, amongst whom was the Earl of Nottingham, that had married his Daughter, and the Earl of Kent, that was his Daughters Son: to whom, at the place of his execution he said, Truly it would have befemed you rather to be absent, then here at this business; but the time will come ere long, that as many shall marvel at your misfortune, as they do now at mine. After his death, a fame went, that his head was grown to his body again: whereupon, the tenth day after his burial, his body by the Kings appointment was taken up, and then found to be a Fable. After this, the Lord Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Warwick was brought forth, and charged with the like Treasons; but by the intercession of the Duke of Lancasters and other Lords, after confession of his fault, was only confin'd into the Isle of Man. Likewise the Lord Cobham, and Sir John Cheyny were only banished, or (as Fabian saith) condemned to perpetual Prison. The Parliament after this was held at Shrewsbury; where, for the love the King bore to the Gentlemen and Commons of the Shire of Cheshire, he caused it to be Ordained, that from thenceforth it should be called and known by the name of the Principality of Cheshire; and herewith intituled himself Prince of Cheshire. At this Parliament also, called the Great Parliament, he created five Dukes, and a Dutches; one Marquess, and four Earls. The Earl of Darby was created Duke of Hereford; the Earl of Nottingham, Duke of Norfolk; the Earl of Rutland Duke of Albermanle; the Earl of Kent, Duke of Surrey; the Earl of Huntingdon, Duke of Excester; and the Lady Margaret Marshall Countess of Norfolk, was created Dutches of Norfolk. The Earl of Somerset was created Marquess of Dorset; the Lord Spenser was made Earl of Gloucester; the Lord Nevill, Earl of Westmerland; the Lord Scroope, Earl of Wiltshire; and the Lord Thomas Piercy Lord Steward of the Kings house, was made Earl of Worcester: and for the better maintenance of their estate, he divided amongst them a great part of those lands that belonged to the Duke of Gloucester, the Earls of Arundell and Warwick. Also in this Parliament, the Judges gave their opinions, That when Articles are propounded by the King to be handled in Parliament, if other Articles be handled before those be first determined, that it is Treason in them that do it. And in this Parliament, the King brought it so about, that he obtained the whole power of the Parliament to be conferred upon certain persons, namely, John Duke of Lancasters, Edmund Duke of York, Edmund Duke of Aumerle, Thomas Duke of Surrey, John Duke of Excester, John Marquess Dorset, Roger Earl of March, John Earl of Salisbury, and divers others, or to any seven or eight of them: and these, by virtue of this Grant, proceeded to conclude upon many things, which concerned generally the things of the whole Parliament, to the great prejudice of the State, and a dangerous example in time to come. A general pardon was also granted far all offences, to all the Kings subjects, but only to fifty, whose names he would not express, but reserved them to his own knowledge, that when any of the Nobility offended him, he might at his pleasure name him to be one of the number excepted; and so keep them still within his danger. And for the more strengthening the Acts of this Parliament, the King purchased the Popes Bulls, containing grievous censures and curses to them that should break them. And now the heads of the opposite Faction having lost their heads, and all things as well settled as could be desired, the King was secure, as thinking himself safe; and he had indeed been safe, if Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, and Henry Duke of Hereford, accused each other. Whereupon a Combat is agreed upon between them, and in what manner.

But the King interposeh and banisheth the Duke of Norfolk for ever; the Duke of Hereford for six years.

The delinquencies of great men punished only with banishment; and the danger of it.

The Duke of Hereford is solicited to return into England.

He lands with three ships at Ravenspurre in Yorkshire. He pretends his coming to be only to claim the inheritance descended upon him from his Father.

Time and Fortune were not Actors in Revenge, as well as men; or rather, if a superiour power did not enterpose, whose ways are as secret as himself is invincible.

It now fell out, (though writers differ what it was fell out) for some write, that Thomas Mowbray accused the Duke of Hereford; others, that Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, for speaking words founding highly to the Kings dishonour; to which the Duke of Norfolk, being called to answer, charged the Duke of Hereford before the King, that he lyed falsely. Whereupon a Combat was agreed upon between them: the King laboured to make them friends; but not prevailing, he gave way to proceed in Combat, and the place to be at Conventry: where at the day and hour appointed, the Duke of Hereford, mounted on a white Courser, barded with green and blew Velvet, imbrodered sumptuously with Swains and Antilopes of Goldsmiths work, approached the Lifts; Of whom the Marshal, being the Duke of Suffrey, demanding who he was? he answered; I am Henry of Lancaster, Duke of Hereford, that am come hither to do my endeavor against Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, as a Traytor, untrue to God, the King, his Realm, and me: Then incontinently he threw upon the holy Evangelists, that his quarrel was true and just, and thereupon required to enter the Lifts, where in a Chair of green Velvet he fate down and reposed himself. Then came the Duke of Norfolk, his Horse barded with Crimfon Velvet, imbrodered richly with Lyons of Silver, and Mulberry-trees, & when he had taken his Oath before the Constable the Duke of Aumerle, that his quarrel was just, he entered the Lifts, and fate him down in his Chair of Crimfon Velvet, curtained about with white and red Damask. Then the Marshal viewed their Spears, to see that they were of equal length; and the Heralds proclaimed, on the Kings behalf, they should mount on Horseback, and address themselves to the Combat. But when they were far forward, and had their Spears in their Rests, the King cast down his Warder, and the Heralds cryed Stay, Stay. Then the King caused their Spears to be taken from them, and deliberated with his Counsel, what was fit to be done in so weighty a cause. After two long hours it was at last concluded, that Henry Duke of Hereford should within fifteen days depart out of the Realm, and not return before ten years were expired, upon pain of death; And that Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, should likewise avoid the Realm, and never return into England, upon the like pain. It is observable, that this Censure was passed against the Duke of Norfolk, the very same day twelve months, in which he had taken order to put the Duke of Glocester to death at Callice, whereof he was then Governor. When these Judgments were once read, the King called before him both the Dukes, and made them swear, that the one should never come in place where the other was. After this, the Duke of Norfolk went into Almain, and from thence to Venice, where after some time he dyed with sorrow. The Duke of Hereford, at the taking his leave of the King, had four years of his Banishment released; and then went to Callice, and from thence to Paris, where, of the French King he was so kindly received, that by his favour he had obtained in marriage the only daughter of the Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French King, if King Richard by messengers had not hindered him. The Duke might have made his banishment, in manner of a visitation, if he had gone into Spain, for there he had two sisters married, the one to the King of Portingale, the other to the King of Spain; to whom his coming would have been most welcome, but he chose rather to make his stay in France, as the place where he might soonest have intelligence out of England: and indeed before a year came about, he heard of the death of his father, the Duke of Lancaster; and heard withal that King Richard had seized into his hands, all the lands descended upon him, contrary to his promise.

It was a Custom in those dayes, to punish the delinquencies of great men by banishment out of the Realm; a Custom not more grievous to the Subject, then dangerous to the Prince; for by this course, they had means to work so closely in their mines of Revenge, that the Fabrick of a Kingdom was in danger to be blown up before their working could be perceived. An example whereof was never more plainly seen then at this time, in the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Hereford: For they in their banishment meeting often together, and aggravating the grievances of King Richard's government, fell at last to consult by what means he might best be removed, seeing there was no hope he could ever be reclaimed. In the time of their consultation about it, as if Fortune her self meant to do their work for them, Solicitations came from many parts of England, to move the Duke of Hereford to come now and take the Government upon him, wherein they would be ready to assist him. The Duke heared before by the Archbishops instigation, and now set on fire by this solicitation, gives Fortune no leisure to alter her minde, by delaying the time, but without further deliberation prepares to be going: and taking with him the Archbishop, the Lord Cobham, Sir Thomas Erpington, and Sir Thomas Beaufort Knights; John Norbury, Robert Waterton, and Francis Coynt Esquires, and about some three score other persons, as many as he could readily get; in three ships which the Duke of Brittain lent him, he put to Sea; where hovering about the coast a while, to mark the countenance of the shores, he landed at last, about the beginning of July, at Ravenpurre in Yorkshire: which no sooner was known, but there repaired to him the Lords, Willoughby, Ross, Darcy, and Baumont; and shortly after, at Doncaster, the Earl of Northumberland, and his son Sir Henry Percy, with the Earl of Westmerland, and great numbers of the Gentry and common sort; of whom though some had invited him to come to take the Government of the Realm upon him, yet he forsooke to pretend that, for any cause of his coming, but made a solemn protestation that he came only to take possession of the inheritances descended upon him from his father, which King Richard most unjustly, King Richard being in Ireland, had no notice in six weeks of the Dukes arrival in England. Hearing it, he prepares presently to return; but is otherwise counselled by the Duke of Aumerle. He sends the Earl of Salisbury before, and promitteth to come himself within six days.

ly, and contrary to his promise, had seized into his hands: for this was a reason had no objection: the other he reserved, till his power should not need to regard objections. And indeed, no show-bat ever gathered greatness so fast by rolling, as his Forces increased by marching forward; for by that time he came to Berkeley, he had got a mighty Army; and within three days after, all the Kings Castles in those parts were surrendered to him. The Duke of York left Governor of the Kingdom, used his best means to raise Forces to resist him, but found few willing to bear Arms against him: whereupon, and perhaps hearing withal that the Dukes coming was but only to take possession of his Inheritance, he thought good to go to Berkeley to him, to have there some communication about it. At Berkeley at that time was arrested the Bishop of Norwich, Sir William Elmham, and Sir Walter Burleigh Knights; Lawrence Dren, and John Golefer Esquires. From Berkeley the two Dukes went forward toward Briflow; where in the Castle were the Lord William Scroope Earl of Wiltshire and Treasurer of England, Sir Henry Green, and Sir Henry Bussie, who were taken, and brought forth bound before the Duke of Lancaster, and the day after arraigned before the Constable and Marshal, found guilty of Treason for misgoverning the King and the Realm; and presently had their heads smitten off. Sir John Russell also was taken there; but he feigning himself to be out of his wits, escaped for that time.

All this while King Richard was in Ireland, where he performed Acts in repressing the Rebels there, not unworthy of him; and having with him amongst other of the Great Lords, the Duke of Lancaster's son Henry, he there for his towardsness in service, knighted him; by which it appeared that he had no great fear of the Father, when he graced the Son; and indeed he needed not have feared him, if his own absence out of England had not given him advantage. Six weeks were now passed after the Dukes arrival in England; in all which time King Richard had no notice of it, by reason the windes were contrary to come forth of England: But as soon as he heard it, and in what hostile manner he proceeded, he then determined to return instantly into England; and had done it, but that the Duke of Aumerle his principal Counsellour (whether out of a good meaning, but grounded upon errors, or out of an ill meaning, but shadowed with colours) by all means perswaded him to stay so long till things fitting for his journey might be made ready. It was King Richard's ill luck to hearken to this ill counsel: but yet he presently sent the Earl of Salisbury into England, to provide him an Army out of Wales and Cheshire, against his own coming; which he promised faithfully should be within six days at the most. The Earl landed at Conway in Wales, and had soon gotten to the number of forty thousand men: but the six days passed, and no news of the King: which made the souldiers suspect that he was dead, and thereupon were ready to disband; but at the Earl of Salisbury's perswasion, they were contented to stay for some days longer, and when the King came not in that time neither, they then would stay no longer, but departed and went home. At length, about eighteen days after that the King had sent away the Earl of Salisbury, he took shipping, together with the Dukes of Aumerle, Exeter, and Surrey, and divers others of the Nobility; with the Bishops of London, Lincoln, and Carlisle; and landed at Barklow in Wales. He had about him some Cheshire men, and was at first in no great doubt of prevailing: but when he heard that all the Castles from the borders of Scotland unto Briflow, were delivered to the Duke of Lancaster, and that the greatest part of the Nobility and Commons took part with him, and specially that his principal Counsellours had lost their heads at Briflow; then, solvuntur frigore mentis, he fell so utterly to despair, that calling his Army together, he licensed every man to be gone, and so shift for himself. The souldiers beought him to be of good cheer, swearing they would stand with him to the death: But this encouraged him not at all; so as the next night he stole from his Army, and with the Dukes of Exeter and Surrey, the Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Stephen Scroope, and some half a score others, he got him to the Castle of Conway, where he found the Earl of Salisbury determining there to stay, till he might see the world at some better stay. Here the Earl of Worcester Steward of the Kings house, broke his white staffe, and without delay went to the Duke of Lancaster; who understanding that King Richard was returned out of Ireland, he left the Duke of York at Briflow, and came back with his power to Berkeley, and from thence the next day came to Glocester, and then to Rosse, after to Hereford, where came to him the Bishop of Hereford, and Sir Edmund Mortimer: on the Sunday following he went to Lymster, and there the Lord Carleton came to him: from thence he went to Ludlow, and the next day to Shrewsbury, and thither came to him Sir Robert Leigh, and Sir John Leigh, and many other, being sent from Chester, to offer their service; thither also came to him the Lord Scales, and the Lord Bardolphe, forth of Ireland: From Shrewsbury he went to Chester, and from thence sent for his son and heir, and likewise for the Duke of Glocester's son and heir (whom King Richard had left in custody in Ireland) with all speed to come into England; but the Duke of Glocester's son through misfortune perished at Sea, or as some write, dyed of the Plague; the sorrow whereof caused, shortly after, his mothers death. After this, the Duke sent the Earl of Northumberland to the King; who upon safe conduct coming to him, declared, that if it might please his Grace to undertake, that there should be a Parliament assembled, in which Justice might be had, and herewith pardon the Duke of Lancaster of all things wherein he had offended, the Duke would be ready to come to him on his knees, and as a humble subject obey him in all dutiful services. Yet upon this conference with the Earl, some say the King required only, that himself and eight more, whom he would name, might have honourable allowance, with assurance of a private quiet life, and that then he he would resign his Crown; and that upon the Earls Oath, that this should be performed, the King agreed to go with the Earl to meet the Duke: but after four miles riding, coming to the place where they laid an Ambush, the King was enclosed, and constrained to go with the Earl of Rutland, where they dined, and from thence to Flint to bed. The King had very few of his friends about him, but only the Earl of Salisbury, the Bishop of Carlisle, the Lord Scroop, Sir Nicholas Fereby, and James D'Artois a Gascon, who still wore a white Heart, the Cognizance of his Mother King Richard, and neither for Promises nor Threats would be drawn to leave it off.

The King being in the Castle of Flint, and Duke Henry with his Army approaching near the Town, the Archbishop of Canterbury, with the Duke of Aumerle and the Earl of Worcester, went before to the King; whom the King spying from the walls where he stood, went down to meet, and finding they did their due reverence to him on their knees, he took them up, and taking the Archbishop aside, talked with him a good while; and as it was reported, the Archbishop willed him to be of good comfort, for he should be assured not to have any hurt as touching his person. After this, the Duke of Lancaster came to the Castle himself, all armed; and being within the first gate, he there stayed, till the King, accompanied with the Bishop of Carlisle, the Earl of Salisbury, and Sir Stephen Scroope, who bore the sword before him, came forth, and sat down in a place prepared for him. As soon as the Duke saw him, he came towards him bowing his knee; and coming forward, did so the second time, and the third, till the King took him by the hand, and lift him up, saying, Dear Cousin, you are welcome. The Duke humbly thanking him, said, My Sovereign Lord and King, the cause of my coming at this present, is (your Honour saved) to have restitution of my person, my Lands, and Heritage: whereto the King answered, Dear Confin, I am ready to accomplish your will, so that you may enjoy all that is yours without exception. After this, coming fourth of the Castle, the King called for Wine; and after they had drunk, they mounted on Horseback, and rode to Chester, the next day to Nantwich, then to Newcastle, from thence to Stafford, and then to Lichfield, and there rested Sunday: after that they rode forthward, and lodged first at Coventry, then at Dayntree, then at Northampton, next day at Dunstable, then at S. Albans, and so came to London: In all which journey they suffered not the King to change his apparel, but made him ride still in one suit of rayment, and that but a simple one, though he in his time, was exceeding sumptuous in Apparel, having one Coat which was valued at Thirty thousand Marks: And in this sort he was brought the next way to Westminster, and at Thirty thousand Marks to the Tower, and committed to safe Custody. After this, a Parliament was called by the Duke of Lancaster, but in the name of King Richard; in which many heinous points of Misgovernment were laid to his charge, and were ingrossed up in three and thirty Articles, the chief were these:

That he had wastfully spent the Treasure of the Realm.

That without Law or Justice, he had caused the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earl of Arundel to be put to death.

That he had borrowed great sums of money, and given his Letters Patents to repay the same, and yet not one penny ever paid.

That he had said, The Laws of the Realm were in his head, and in his breast: by reason of which fantastical opinion, he destroyed Noble-men, and impoverished the Commons.

That he changed Knights and Burgesses of the Parliament at his pleasure.

That most Tyrannously he said, That the lives and goods of all his subjects were in his hands, and at his disposition.

That whereas divers Lords were by the Court of Parliament appointed to treat of matters concerning the state of the Kingdom; they being busied about the same Commission, he went about to apprehend them of high Treason.

That by force and threats, he enforced the Judges of the Realm, at Shrewsbury, to condescend to his way, for the destruction of divers of the Lords.

That he caused his fathers own brother, the Duke of Gloucester, without Law to be attached and sent to Callice, and there without reason, secretly murdered.

That notwithstanding the Earl of Arundel at his arraignment pleaded his Charter of Pardon, yet he could not be heard, but was shamefully and suddenly put to death.

That he assembled certain Lancashire and Cheshire men, to make war upon his Lords; and suffered them to rob and spoil, without prohibition.

That though he had made Proclamation that the Lords were not attached for any crime of Treason, yet afterward in the Parliament he laid Treason to their charge.

That notwithstanding his Pardon granted to them, he enforced divers of the Lords purveyors, to be again intolerably fined, to their utter undoing.

That without the assent of the Peers, he carried the Jewels and Plate of this Kingdom into Ireland.

Upon these, and some other Articles, he was by Parliament adjudged to be deposed from all Kingly honour, and Princely Government: And thereupon, the King being advised by his own servants, rather voluntarily to resign the Crown, then by compulsion to be forced to it; on the Monday before the nine and twentieth day of September, in the year 1399. he made a solemn resignation, before divers Lords and others, sent to him for that purpose: and an instrument of his resignation being made, he would needs read it before them all himself, and then subscribed it; and withal, made it his suit, that the Duke of Lancaster might be his successor, and King after him; and for a sign of his desire hereof, he took his signet Ring of Gold from his finger, and

The Dukes reverence to the King in coming to him.

But yet is basely carried away and committed to the Tower.

Articles delivered to the Parliament against King Richard.

He is by Parliament deposed.

and put it upon the Duke of Lancaster; that never man who had used a Kingdom with such violence, gave it over with such patience, or rather such willingness, that he seemed rather to affect it, then that he was any way forced to it. This resignation of King Richard being shewed to the Parliament, both Houses gave their assent; and then Commissioners were appointed to pronounce openly the fenecement of his deposing, which was done by the Bishop of Asaph, and all Allegiance renounced to him.

And now it is able to be observed, what a wonderful concurrence of fortunes, in behalf of the Duke of Lancaster, and against King Richard, happened together, whereof if any one had been missing, he had never been turned out of his Throne in such manner as he was: For first, if it had not happened that King Richard had been in Ireland at the time when the Duke began his attempt, it had not been possible for him to compass his design as he did: And then if King Richard being in Ireland, he had not by misfortune of weather been kept six weeks from hearing of the Dukes arrival, he had not given him so large a time for raising of Forces; and so more easily might have resisted him: Or after King Richard heard of the Dukes arrival, if he had followed the Earl of Salisbury, and not stayed so many daies longer, then he promised, he had found an Army ready to receive him, sufficient at least to have given a stop to the Dukes proceedings: Or when at last he came over, and found his Army to fail him, if withal his own courage had not failed him, but that he had manfully put it to the hazard of a Battle, as his followers themselves would have had him to do, he could not chuse but have made a better end of his business then now he did. But when all is done, there is notwithstanding the blows of Fortune; or to say better, No resisting the Decree of Heaven; but seeing that Decree is an Abyssus to us, and may perhaps be conditional; we shall manifestly be Traitors to our selves, if we use not our utmost endeavours to divert it: that it may truly be said, King Richard lost his Crown, more by his own Treason, then by the Treason of any other.

Of his Taxations.

IN his second year, in a Parliament held at Glocester, was granted to be paid by the Merchants, upon every sack of Wool a Mark, for this present year; and for every pounds-worth of Wares, brought from beyond Sea, and sold here, six pence of the buyer. In his third year, in a Parliament at Westminster, a Subsidy was granted to be levied of the great men of the Realm, to the end the Commons might be spared: The Dukes of Lancaster and Britain paid twenty Marks; every Earl six Marks; Bishops and Abbots with Miter, as much: every Monk, three shillings four pence: also every Justice, Sheriffe, Knight, Esquire, Parson and Vicar, were charged after a certain rate; but no Commons of the Laity. Also this year, in another Parliament, was granted a Tenth by the Clergy, and a Fifteenth by the Laity; but with this condition, That from thenceforth, which was in March, 1380. till the Feast of S. Michael, which should be in the year 1381. there should be no more Parliaments: but yet was not observed. In his fourth year, in a Parliament at Northampton, a new kind of Subsidie was granted; of every Priest Secular or Regular, six shillings eight pence; and as much of every Nun; and of every man or woman, married or not married, being sixteen years of age, (beggars only excepted) four pence. In his fifth year, a Subsidy was granted by the Merchants, of certain Customs of their Wools which they bought and sold, called a Malercot, to endure for four years. In his seventh year was granted him one Moity of a Fifteenth by the Laity; and shortly after, a Moity of a Tenth by the Clergy. In his ninth year, half of a Tenth, and half of a Fifteenth by the Laity. In his eleventh year, there was granted him a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity. In his twelfth year at a Parliament, was granted of every sack of Wool, forty shillings, whereof, ten shillings to be applied presently to the Kings use; the other thirty to remain in the hands of Treasurers, towards the charges of wars, if any should happen. Also there was a Subsidy granted, of six pence in the pound; whereof, four pence to the use last mentioned; the other two pence to be at the Kings pleasure. In his fifteenth year, at a Parliament, was granted a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity, towards the charges of John Duke of Lancaster, sent into France. In his eighteenth year, a Tenth was granted by the Clergy, and a fifteenth by the Laity, towards his own journey into Ireland. In his twentieth year, the Clergy granted him a Tenth, to be paid that year. In his one and twentieth year, upon pretence of having aided the Duke of Glocester, and the Earls of Arundell and Warwick against him, he caused blank Charters to be made, which he compelled both Citizens and Gentlemen in the Country to seal, whereby he might charge them afterward to pay whatsoever he required. In his two and twentieth year, a Fifteenth and a half was granted; and for the Customs of Wools, fifty shillings upon every sack, of English men born, and three pounds of Strangers.

Of Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

IN his second year, in a Parliament at Glocester, it was enacted, That Merchant-Strangers might buy and sell in Grofs, or by Retail, within this Realm. In his third year, in a Parliament at Westminster, it was Ordained, that the Priviledges and Immunities of the Abby of Westminster should remain inviolate; but with this Proviso, against those that took Sanctuary with purpose to defraud their Creditors. That their lands and goods should be liable to their debts. In his sixth year, a Parliament was holden, in which the Mayor of London, upon suggestion that the Fishmongers used great deceit in uttering of their Fish, obtained to have it Enacted, That from thence thenceforth, none of that Company, nor of the Vintners, Grocers, Butchers, or other that sold any provision of Victuals should be admitted Maioir of the City: but in the Parliament next following, were restored to their liberty again, saving that they might not keep Courts among themselves, but that all transgressions of their Customes should be tried at the Maiors Court. In his eleventh year, King Richard created John Beauchamp of Holt, Baron of Kederminster, by his Letters Patents; the first that was so made; for before this time, Barons were always made by calling them to Parliaments by the Kings Writ. Till this time, women used to ride astride as men do.

A Subsidie granted where the Commons are spared.

A Malercot what it was.

Blank Charters committed to be sealed by Gentlemen, that he might charge them afterward at his pleasure.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN the second year of this Kings reign, there came messengers from the new elected Pope Urban, to require the Kings aid against such Cardinals as he named Schismatics, that had elected another Pope, whom they named Clement: which Cardinals sent Messengers likewise to crave his aid for them, but through perswasion of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Urban's request was granted, and Clement rejected. In his fourth year, John Wickliffe set forth his opinion touching the Sacrament of the Altar, denying the Doctrine of Transubstantiation, in such sort as the Church of Rome did then teach. In his sixth year, Henry Spenser Bishop of Norwich received Bulls from Pope Urban, to grant all privileges of the Crusado to all such as would come over and assist him against the Anti-Pope Clement; which being debated in Parliament, it was after much opposition, agreed, that it should go forward; and thereupon the Bishop not only gathered much money from such as would contribute to the expedition, but drew many great Captains to go themselves in person; as namely, Sir Hugh Calverley, Sir William Ferington, the Lord Henry Beaumont, Sir William Elmham, Sir Thomas Tryvet, and divers others. The money raised by contribution, came to 25000 Franks, and the Army to 3000 Horse, and 15000 Foot; with which Forces, the Bishop passing over into Flanders, won the Towns of Graveling, Dunkirke, and Newport; but at last encountered by a mighty Army of the French, he was put to the worst, and returned into England. In the twelfth year of this Kings reign, an Act was made that none should pass the Seas to purchase promotions or provisions (as they termed them) in any Church or Churches. Also in this year Thomas the late Earl of Lancaster, by reason of miracles reported to be done by him, was Canonized for a Saint. At this time also the Wickliffe marvellously increased, Preaching against Pilgrimages and Images, whose greatest opposer was the Bishop of Norwich. In his thirteenth year Proclamation was made, that all beneficed men abiding in the Court of Rome, should return into England by a certain day, under pain of forfeiting their Benefices; and all other not Beneficed, under a certain pain likewise. Also about this time a Statute was made, that no Ecclesiastical person should possess Manours, Houses, Lands, Revenues, or Rents whatsoever at the Fee of the King, without the Kings License and the chief Lords. In his eighteenth year, the Wickliffes were persecuted, and excommunication pronounced against them by the Archbishop of Canterbury. In this Schism of the two Popes, the French Clergy wrote in behalf of Clement their Pope, and sent it into England; the Clergy of England on the contrary wrote in behalf of Pope Urban, and so nothing was agreed.

Works of Piety in his time.

IN the twentieth year of this Kings reign, William Bateman Bishop of Norwich builded Trinity Hall in Cambridge. In the third year of his reign, John Philpot Maioir of London, gave to the City certain Tenements, for the which the Chamberlain payeth yearly to thirteen poor people, to every of them seven pence the week for ever; and as any of those thirteen persons dieth, the Maioir appointeth one to succeed, and the Recorder another. In the one and twentieth year of his reign, King Richard caused the great Hall at Westminster to be repaired, both the Walls, Windows, and Roof. In his time, Simon Archbishop of Canterbury, slain by the Rebels upon Tower-hill, built the West-gate of Canterbury, and from thence to the North-gate, commonly called the long Wall. Thomas Fitz-Alan, or Arundell, being Bishop of Ely, built the great Garth-house of Ely house in Halburn; and being after Bishop of Canterbury, he built a fair Spire Steeple at the West-end of his Church there, called to this day, Arundell Steeple, and bestowed a tunable ring of five Bells upon the same.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

IN his third year, so great a mortality afflicted the North parts of England, that the Country became almost desolate. In his sixth year, on the 24 day of May, there happened so great an Earth-quake, or (as some write) a Water-shake, that it made Ships in the Havens to beat one against the other. In July, in the year 1389, whilst the King was at Shrewsbury, there swarmed in his Court such multitudes of Flies and Gnats, skirmishing with one another; that in the end they were swept away with brooms by heaps, and bushels were filled with them. In his twelfth year, in March, first there were terrible Winds; afterward followed a great mortality, and after that a great dearth, that a bushel of Wheat was sold for thirteen pence, which was then thought a great price; for the years before it was sold for six pence, and Wool was sold for two shillings a stone. In his fourteenth year, on Christmas day, a Dolphin was taken at London-bridge, being ten foot long, and a monstrous grown Fish. In his eighteenth year, an Exhalation, in likeness of fire appeared in the night in many places of England; which when a man went alope, went as he went,

Also in a Parliament time, there was a certain Image of Wax made by Necromancy (as was said) which at an hour appointed, uttered these words:

The Head shall be cut off; the Head shall be lift up aloft; the feet shall be lift up above the Head; and then spake no more. This happened in the Parliament called the Marvellous Parliament; not long before the Parliament that wrought wonders. In his one and thirtieth year, a River not far from Bedford, suddenly ceased his course, so as the channel remained dry by the space of three miles; which was adjudged to signify the revolting of the Subjects from their natural Prince. In his two and twentieth year, almost through all England, all Bay-trees withered, and afterwards grew green again; which was supposed to import some strange event. About the year 1280, the making of Guns was found by a German, which may well be reckoned amongst casualties, seeing it was found by casualty; for this German having beaten brimstone in a Morter to powder, and covered it with a stone; it happened, that as he struck fire, a spark chanced to fall into the powder; which caused such a flame out of the Morter, that it raised a stone a great height; which after he perceived, he made a Pipe of Iron, and tempered the powder with some other ingredients, and so finished that deadly Engine. The first that used it were the Venetians against the Inhabitants of Genoa.

Of his Wives.

C King Richard in his time had two Wives, the first was Anne Daughter to the Emperour Charles the Fourth, and Sister to the Emperour Wenceslaus; who lived his Wife ten years, and dyed without Issue at Sheem in Surry, in the year 1392. whole death King Richard took too heavily, that he caused the buildings of that Palace to be thrown down and defaced, as though to revenge himself upon the place, could ease his mind, and mitigate his sorrow. His second Wife was Isabel Daughter to Charles the sixth King of France; she was married to him at eight years of age, and therefore never co-habited. After King Richard's death she was sent home, and married afterward to Charles Son and Heir to the Duke of Orleans.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

D HE was the goodliest personage of all the Kings that had been since the Conquest; tall of stature, of stouthead and strong limbs, fair and amiable of countenance; and such a one as might well be the Son of a most beautiful Mother. Concerning his conditions, there was more to be blamed in his Education, then in his Nature; for there appeared in him many good inclinations, which would have grown to be abilities, if they had not been perverted by corrupt flatterers in his youth. He was of a credulous disposition, apt to believe, and therefore easie to be abused. His greatest transgression was, that he went with his friends ultra vias; where he should have gone but usque ad aras. His greatest imbecility, that he could not distinguish between a flatterer and a friend. He seemed to have in him both a French nature and an English; violent at the first apprehension, calm upon deliberation; He never shewed himself more worthy of the Government, then when he was deposed as unworthy to govern; for it appeared, that his Regality was not so dear unto him, as a private quiet life; which if he might he have enjoyed, he would never have complained that Fortune had done him wrong.

Of his Death and Burial.

K King Richard shortly after his Relinquishment, was conveyed to the Castle of Leeds in Kent, and from thence to Pomfret; where the common fame is, that he was served with costly meat, like a King, but not suffered once to touch it, and so died of forced famine. But Thomas Walsingham referreth it altogether to a voluntary pining of himself, through grief of his misfortunes. But one Writer, well acquainted with King Richard's doings, saith, that King Henry sitting one day at his Table, said sighing, Have I no faithful friend that will deliver me of him who will be my death? This speech was specially noted by one Sir Piers of Exton; who presently with eight persons in his company went to Pomfret, commanding the Esquire that took the Assay before King Richard, to do so no more, saying, Let him eat now, for he shall not eat long. King Richard sitting down to dinner, was served without Assay, whereat marvelling, he demanded of his Esquire, why he did not his duty? Sir (said he) I am otherwise commanded by Sir Piers of Exton, who is newly come from King Henry. When King Richard heard that word, he took the Carving knife in his hand, and stroke the Squire on the head, saying, The Devil take Henry of Lancaster and thee together: And with that word Sir Piers entered the chamber, with eight armed men, every of them having a Bill in his hand. King Richard perceiving this, put the Table from him, and stepping to the foremost man, wrung the Bill out of his hands, and flew four of those that thus came to assail him; but in conclusion, was felled with a stroke of a Poll-axe, which Sir Piers gave him upon the head, with which blow he fell down dead: Though it be scarce credible, that a man upon his bare word, and without shewing any warrant, should be admitted to do such a fact. Sir Piers having thus slain him, wept bitterly: a poor amends for so heinous a trespass. King Richard thus dead his body was embalmed, and covered with lead, all save the face, & then brought to London, where it lay at Paul's three days together, that all men might behold it, to see he was dead: The Corps was after had to Langley in Buckinghamshire, and there buried in the Church of the Friars Preachers:

Preachers : but afterward by King Henry the Fifth, it was removed to Westminster, and there honourably entombed, with Queen Anne his Wife ; and that beautiful picture of a King, sitting Crowned in a Chair of State, at the upper end of the Quire in St. Peter's at Westminster, is said to be of him : although the Scots untruly write, that he escaped out of Prison, and led a solitary and virtuous life in Scotland, and there dyed, and is buried (as they hold) in the Black-Fryers at Strling. He lived three and thirty years, reigned two and twenty and three moneths.

Men of Note in this Kings time.

Men of Valour in his time were so many, that to reckon them all would be a hard task ; and to leave out any would be an injury : yet to give an instance in one, we may take John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, whose valour was no less seen abroad than at home : In France, in Germany, in Spain ; in all which places, he left Trophies of his Victories. But of learned men, we may name these : William Thorne an Augustine Fryer of Canterbury, an Historiographer : Adam Merimouth, a Canon of Pauls Church in London, who wrote two Historical Treatises ; one intitled Chronicon 40. annorum ; another, Chronicon 60. annorum. William Packington sometimes Secretary to the Black Prince, an excellent Historiographer : William Badbye a Carmelite Fryer, Bishop of Worcester, and Confessor to the Duke of Lancaster : John Bourge, Chancellour of the University of Cambridge : William Solade, a Monk of Buckfast Abbey in Devonshire : John Thoribye, Archbishop of York, Lord Chancellour of England, and a Cardinal : William Berton Chancellour of Oxford, an Adversary to Wickliffe : Philip Pepington Abbot of Leicester, a Defender of Wickliffe : Walter Brit, a Scholar of Wickliffe, a Writer both in Divinity and other Arguments : John Sharp, a great adversary to Wickliffe, who wrote many Treatises : Peter Pateshall, a great favourer of Wickliffe : Marcel Ingelmo, an excellent Divine, one of the first Teachers in the University of Heidelberg : Richard Wishee a learned Priest, and an earnest follower of Wickliffe : John Swafham Bishop of Bangor, a great adversary to the Wickliffe : Adam Efton, a great Linguist, and a Cardinal : John Trevisa, a Cornish man, and a secular Priest, who translated the Bible ; Bartholomew De Proprietatibus Rerum ; Polichronicon of Ranulph Higden, and divers other Treatises, John Mow, an English man, but a Student in Paris ; who compiled in the French Tongue, The Romant of the Rose ; translated into English by Geoffrey Chaucer, and divers others.

THE REIGN OF KING HENRY THE FOURTH.

Of his coming to the Crown.

After the Resignation of King Richard, and the sentence of his Deposing, openly read in Parliament ; Henry Duke of Lancaster riseth up from his seat ; and first, making the Sign of the Cross upon his forehead and breast, he said, In the Name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost : I Henry of Lancaster claim the Crown of England, as descended by right line from King Henry the third. And having thus spoken, he sat down again. Upon this, the Archbishop conferred with the Lords ; and having heard their opinions, he turned to the Commons, asking them, if they would joyn with the Lords, in choosing Henry of Lancaster for their King : who all with one voice cried, Yea, Yea : whereupon going to the Duke, he bowed his knee, and taking him by the hand led him to the Royal Seat ; and then began a Sermon, taking for his Text, out of the first Book of the Kings, cap. 9. Vir dominabitur in populo : wherein he declared what a happiness it is to a Nation to have a King of Wisdom and Valour, and shewed the Duke of Lancaster to be such a one ; and as much the defects in both, of the late King Richard. The Sermon ended, the King thanked them all for his Election ; and testified to them, that he meant not to take advantage against any mans estate, as coming in by Conquest ; but that every one should freely enjoy his own, as in times of lawful succession. And now a time was appointed for his Coronation ; and accordingly, upon the 13 day of October following, the very day wherein the year before had been banished, he was Crowned at Westminster, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rights and Ceremonies accustomed. At his Coronation he was anointed with an Oyl which a religious man had given to Henry the first Duke of Lancaster, together with this Prophecie, That the Kings anointed with this Oyl, should be the Champions of the Church. This Oyl coming to the hands of King Richard, as he was looking amongst his jewels, going then into Ireland, he was desirous to be anointed with it, but that the Archbishop of Canterbury told him, it was not lawful to be anointed twice : whereupon putting it up again, at his coming afterwards to Flint, the Archbishop got it of him, and kept it till the Coronation of King Henry, who was the first King of the Realm that was anointed with it. The day before the Coronation, the King in the Tower made one and forty, some say but twelve Knights of the Bath, whereof four were his own Sons, Henry, Thomas, John, and Humphrey, all then alive ; and with them, three Earls, and five Barons. Upon the Feast-day, many claimed Offices, as belonging to their Tenures, to which, upon shewing their right, they were admitted. And now the King made divers new Officers : The Earl of Northumberland he made Conitable of England ; the Earl of Westmerland was made Lord Marshal ; Sir John Serle, Chancellor ; John Newbery Esquire, Treasurer ; and Sir Richard Clifford was made Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal : The Lord Henry his eldest Son, being then about thirteen years of age, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester, and soon after also Duke of Aquitain : and the Crown was by Parliament Entailed A to King Henry, and the Heirs of his body lawfully begotten.

After this a Parliament is holden, in which the Acts made in the eleventh year of King Richard were revived, and the Acts made in his one and twentieth year were wholly repealed ; and they who by that Parliament were attainted, were restored to their Lands and Honours ; whereupon Richard Earl of Warwick was delivered out of Prison, and the Earl of Arundel was recovered his Inheritance, and many other also that were banished, or imprisoned by King Richard, were then fully restored to their liberty and estates. Also the King gave to the Earl of Westmerland the County of Richmond ; and to the Earl of Northumberland the Isle of Man, to be holden of him by bearing the sword wherewith he entered into England. And now was the time for shewing of spleens : Sir John Bagot then prisoner in the Tower, accused the Earl of Armerle for speaking words against the Duke of Lancaster, now King : also the Lord Fitzwater accused him for the death of the Duke of Gloucester : The Lord Morley, appealed the Earl of Salisbury of Treason : and one Hall accused the Duke of Excester, for conspiring the death of John of Gaunt the Kings Father : but King Henry having entered the Throne in a storm, was willing now to have a calm ; and therefore laying aside the ones Accusations, he accepted of the others Excuses, and received the Duke of Armerle, and the Duke of Excester into as much favour, as if they had never been accused.

Accusations against many, but coarived at by the King.

King Henry acquaints foreign Princes by what Title he came to the Crown.

And to qualify the hard opinion which foreign Princes might conceive of King Richard, depoling, he sent Ambassadors into divers Countreys, to make it known by what title, and by what favour of the people he came to the Kingdom. To the Court of Rome he sent John Tiptot, C vant Bishop of Hereford, Sir John Cheyny Knight, and John Cheyny Esquire. Into France he sent Walter Sherlow Bishop of Durham, and Thomas Piercy Earl of Worcester : Into Spain he sent John Trevor Bishop of Asaph, and Sir William Perre : and into Germany he sent the Bishop of Bangor, and certain others. Most of these Princes seemed either not to regard what was done, or were easily perswaded that all was done well : only Charles King of France was so discontented with this indignity offered to his son in Law King Richard, that by violence of his passion he fell into his old pangs of Frensie ; but somewhat recovered, he resolved to revenge it ; wherein many Lords of France shewed themselves forward, but specially the Earl of St. Paul, who had married King Richard's half sister : yet having prepared an Army in readines, when afterward they heard of King Richards death, they dissolved it again, as considering the time was then past. The Aquitains also, and specially the Citizens of Bourdeaux, as being the place where King Richard was born, were mightily incensed : but Sir Robert Knolls Lieutenant of Guyen, and afterward Thomas Piercy Earl of Worcester, being sent to them by the King, so perswaded them, that with much adoee they continued in obedience.

It was about this time moved in Parliament, what should be done with King Richard, (for he was not as yet murdered) : whereupon Thomas Aderke Bishop of Carlisle, a learned man and wife, and who had never given allowance to the depoling of King Richard ; now that he was in place of freedom of speech, he rose up, and said :

"My Lords, The matter now propounded is of marvellous weight and consequence ; wherefore there are two points chiefly to be considered : the first, Whether King Richard be sufficient, B "put out of his Throne : the second, Whether the Duke of Lancaster be lawfully taken in. "For the first, how can that be sufficiently done, when there is no power sufficient to do it. "The Parliament cannot, for of the Parliament the King is the head ; and can the body put down the Head ? You will say, But the Head may bow it self down ; and so may the King resign. "It is true ; but what force is in that which is done by force ? and who knows not that King Richards Resignation was no other ? But suppose he be sufficiently out, yet how comes the Duke of Lancaster to be lawfully in ? If you say by Conquest, you speak Treason ; for what Conquest without Arms ? and can a Subject take Arms against his lawful Sovereign, and not be Treasoner ? If you say, by Election of the State, you speak not reason ; for what power hath the State to elect, while any is living that hath right to Succeed ? but such a Successour is not the Earl of Lancaster, as descended from Edmund Crouchback, the elder son of King Henry the Third, though put by the Crown for deformity of his body ; For who knows not the falseness of this allegation ? seeing it is a thing notorious, that this Edmund was neither the elder brother, nor yet crook-backed, (though called so for some other reason) but a goodly personage, and without any deformity. And your selves cannot forget a thing so lately done, who it was that in the fourth year of King Richard was declared by Parliament to be Heir to the Crown, in case King Richard should die without Issue. But why then is not that calm made ? because Silent leges inter arma ; what disputing of Titles against the stream of Power ? But howsoever it is extreme injustice, that King Richard should be condemned, without being heard, or once allowed to make his defence. And now, my Lords, I have spoken thus at this time ; that you may consider of it before it be too late ; for as yet it is in your power to undo that justly, which you have unjustly done.

Much to this purpose was the Bishops speech ; but to as little purpose as if he had gone about to call back Yesterday : The matter was too far gone ; and scarce a person there present, that had not a hope of either a private or a publick benefit by that which was done. Yet against this speech of the Bishop there was neither Protesting nor Excepting ; It passed in the House as but one mans opinion : And as for the King, it was neither fit he should use much severity against any Member

The Bishop of Carlisle's bold speech in behalf of King Richard, and against King Henry.

A Member of that Parliament which had so lately shewed so much indulgence towards him ; nor indeed safe, to be too hot in his Punishment, when he was yet scarce warm in his Government. Yet for a warning to use their liberty of speech with more moderation hereafter, the Bishop was arrested by the Marshal, and committed to prison in the Abbey of S. Albans, but afterward without further censure set at liberty, till upon a conspiracy of Lords, wherein he was a party, he was condemned to dye, though through extremity of grief he prevented execution. But as for King Richard, and Edward Mortimer Earl of March, enough was spoken by the Bishop in both their behalfs to undo them both : and indeed King Richard was soon after made away : the Earl secured himself by retiring far off, to his Lordship of Wigmore ; avoiding the danger of Contention, by not entering the Lists of Aspiring : But although the Divine Providence, for causes hidden from humane knowledge, gave way at this time to the advancement of the younger, the House of Lancaster ; yet in the third Generation after, the elder, the House of Clarence recovered its right in King Edward the Fourth ; that we may know it is but staying the leisure of Heaven, for every one to have his Right, either in Person, or by Proxie.

But did King Richard more hurt then good.

But whether incited by this speech of the Bishop, or otherwise out of the rancour of envy in some, and malice in others ; it was not long after, before there grew in the minds of many both Lords and other, a malignant inclination towards King Henry ; and came first to be a Conspiracy in the House of the Abbot of Westminster. This Abbot was a kind of a Book-statemans, but better read in the Politicks of Aristotle then of Solomon ; who remembering some words of King Henry, which he had spoken long before, when he was but Earl of Derby ; That Princes had too little, and Religious men too much, and fearing, lest being now King, he should reduce his words into act, he thought it better to use preventing Physick beforehand, then to stand to the hazard of a curing afterward ; and thereupon invited to his house the discontented Lords ; as namely, John Holland Duke of Excester, Thomas Holland his brothers son, Duke of Surrey, Edward Duke of Armerle, John Montacute Earl of Salisbury, Hugh Spenser Earl of Gloucester, John Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Thomas Blunt, and Maundlin one of King Richards Chappell ; who after dinner conferring together, and communicating their spleens against King Henry one with another, they resolved at last, both to take away the Kings life, and of the way how to do it. The devise was this : They would publish a solemn Jufts to be holden at Oxford, at a day appointed, and invite the King to honour it with his presence ; and there, in the time of acting the Jufts, when all mens intentions should be otherwise busied, they would have him be murdered. This devise was resolved on : Oaths for secrecy were taken ; and Indentures sextipartite for performing conditions agreed upon between them : sealed and delivered : The Jufts are proclaimed, the King is invited, and promiteth to come ; secrecy of all hands kept most firmly to the very day : But though all other kept counsel, yet Fortune would not, but the discovered all ; For it fortuned, that as the Duke of Armerle was riding to the Lords at Oxford, against the day appointed, he took it in the way to go visit his Father the Duke of York ; and having in his bosome the Indenture of Confederacy, his Father as they sat at dinner chanced to spy it, and asked what it was ? to whom his son answering, It was nothing that any way concerned him ; By S. George faith his Father, but I will see it ; and therewithal snatching it from him, read it ; and finding the Contents, and reviling his son for being now the second time a Traitor, before to King Richard, and now to King Henry, he commanded his Horses to be instantly made ready, and with all the speed he could make, rode to Windsor, where the King then lay : but the younger years of his son out-rid him, and came to the Court before him ; where locking the Gates, and taking the Keys from the Porter, pretending some special reason, he went up to the King, and falling on his knees, asked his Pardon, The King demanding, for what offence ? he then discovered the whole Plot : which he had scarce done, when his Father came rapping at the Court-gates, and coming to the King, shewed him the Indenture of Confederacy which he had taken from his son. This, though it amazed the King, yet it informed him of the truth of the matter, whereof he was before doubtful ; and thereupon lays aside his journey to see the Justings of others in jest, and takes care that he be not justled in earnest out of his Throne himself. In the mean time the confederate Lords being ready at Oxford, and hearing nothing of the Duke of Armerle, nor seeing any preparation for the Kings coming, were certainly perswaded that their Treason was discovered : Whereupon falling into consideration of the case they were in, they found there was no place left for them of Mercy, and therefore were to stand upon their Guard, and provide the best they could for their safety ; To which purpose, the first thing they did was to apparel Magdalen in Princely Robes, a man as like to King Richard in countenance and personage, as one man lightly can be to another ; and to give forth that he was King Richard escaped out of Prison, thereby to countenance their proceedings : The next thing was to dispatch messengers to the King of France, and require his assistance. This done, they set forward in Battel-array towards Windsor, against King Henry ; but finding him gone to London before they came, they then deliberate what course to take : Some advised to set King Richard at liberty before their counterfeit Richard should be discovered : Others thought best to follow the King to London, and set upon him unprovided, and before he had gathered Forces. In this division of Advices, when they could not do both, they did neither ; but as men amazed, marched on, though they knew not well whither, till they came to Colbrook ; by which time the King had gathered an Army of twenty thousand, and was marching towards them : but they not thinking so well of their cause, that they durst put it to the trial of a battel ; or perhaps staying for aid out of France ; withdrew themselves back to Sunning near to Reading, where the young Queen

Owen Glendour stirreth up the Welsh to rebel.

Queen lay: to whom their coming gave some flashes of comfort, but quenched before they were thoroughly kindled: and from thence they march to Cicester; where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Salisbury took up their lodging in one Inne; the Duke of Excester and the Earl of Glocester in another: And now a strange Accident, beyond the reach of all consultation, gave a period to their Delign; for who would think that a private company durst oppose those Lords having their Army so near them? yet the Bayliffe of the Town upon intelligence (no doubt that these Lords were up in Arms against the King,) taking with him a company of Townsmen, in the night assaulted the Inne where the Duke of Surrey and the Earl of Salisbury lay; who thus assaulted made shift to defend themselves till three a clock in the afternoon; but then, being in danger to be taken, a Priest one of their company, set divers houses in the Town on fire, thinking thereby to divert the Assailants from prosecuting the Lords, to save their houses: but this inflamed them the more; and so hotly they pursued their assault, that they wounded the Duke and the Earl to death; who dying that night their heads were stricken off and sent up to London. With them also were taken, Sir Bennet Shelly, Sir Bernard Brocas, Sir Thomas Blunt, and eight and twenty other Lords, Knights and Gentlemen; who were sent to Oxford, where the King then lay, and there were put to execution. The Duke of Excester in the other Inne, hearing of this assault, fled out of the backside towards the Camp, intending to bring the whole Army to the rescue, but the souldiers having heard a clamour, and seeing fire in the Town, supposing the King had been come with all his Forces, out of a sudden fear dispersed themselves and fled; which the Duke seeing, he also, with Sir John Shelley, fled into Essex, where wandering and lurking in secret places, he was at last apprehended as he sat at supper in a friends house, and led to Plafsey, and there shortly after beheaded, the place, where by his counsel and countenance, the Duke of Glocester formerly had been apprehended: that we may observe how the Divine Providence, in revenging of injuries, takes notice, and makes use of the very circumstance of place where the injuries are done. The Earl of Glocester fled towards Wales, but was taken and beheaded at Briflow. Magdalen the counterfeit King Richard, was apprehended and brought to the Tower, and afterward hanged and quartered; with Mr. Fereby, another of King Richard's Chaplains. Diven other Lords, and Knights, and Gentlemen, and a great number of mean persons, were in other places put to death; that so much Noble blood, at one time, and for one cause, hath scarce been heard or read of. The Abbot of Westminster, in whose house the plot was contrived, hearing of these misfortunes, as he was going between the Monastery and his Mansion, fell suddenly into a Palsie, and shortly after, without speech, ended his life. About this time also, a strange piece of Treason is reported to have been practised against the Kings life: that there was found in his bedcloaths an Iron with three sharp pikes standing upright; that when the King should have laid him down, he might have thrust himself upon them. But seeing there is no farther mention of inquiring after it; it seems to have been but an idle rumour not worth believing.

But now that the hot English blood was well allayed, the Welsh blood springs up as hot: For now, Owen Glendour an Esquire of Wales, brought up at the Innes of Court in London; partly out of a desire to revenge a wrong done him (as he conceived in a suit for lands in controversy between the Lord Grey of Ruthin and him, but chiefly out of an humour of aspiring, endeavoured to draw the Welshmen to a general defection, telling them, that the English being at variance amongst themselves, now was the time to shake off their yolk, and to resume their own ancient Laws and Customs. To whose persuasions the Welsh men hearkening, made him their King and Captain; and he having gotten a competent Army: sets first upon his old Adversary Reynold Lord Grey of Ruthin, and takes him prisoner; yet with promise of releasement, if he would marry his daughter, which offer though the Lord Grey at first not only refused, but scorned, yet out of necessity at last he was contented to accept; when notwithstanding his deceitful Father in law trifled out the time of his enlargement till he dyed. But the Welshmen growing confident upon this success, break into the borders of Herefordshire, making spoil and prey of the Countrey as freely as if they had leave to do it; for indeed none opposed them but only the Lord Edmund Mortimer, who had formerly withdrawn himself to his Castle at Wigmore; and having assembled the forces of the Countrey, and joining battel with them, was taken Prisoner, and then fettered and cast into a deep and vile Dungeon. It was thought if Glendour had as well known how to use his victory, as to get it, he might at this time have put the English yolk into a great hazard to be shaken off; but he having killed 1000. of the English, thought he had done enough for that time, and so giving over the pursuit, retired. The inhumanity of the Welsh women was here memorable, who fell upon the dead carcases of the English, first stripping them, and then cutting off their privy parts and noses; whereof the one they thrust into their mouths, the other they pressed between their buttocks. Many noble men, specially his Kinsmen the Pierces solicited King Henry to deliver Mortimer; but the King was deaf of that ear, he could rather have wished both him and his two Sisters in Heaven, for then he should be free from conceal'd Competitors.

These affronts were at this time suffered in the Welsh, because the King was now employed in a more dangerous service with the Scots; for they taking advantage of the distraction in the Kingdom (as it was always their custom to do) had made an In-ride into the County of Northumberland, and suddenly one night set upon the Castle of Wark; took and spoiled it, and then returned. In revenge whereof, the English invaded and spoiled certain Islands of the Orkneys: Then the Scots set forth a Fleet, under the conduct of Sir Robert Logan; but before he came to any action, he was encountred, and the greatest part of his Fleet taken. But these were but such affronts, as often happen between troublesome neighbours; for all this while the Peace was still in being between the Nations; but at last it brake out into an open war upon this occasion: Robert King of Scots had offered to match his Son David with a Daughter of George Earl of Dunbarre, and had received money of him in part of her portion; and afterward, would neither suffer the Match to proceed, nor yet pay back the money; but married his son to a daughter of Archibald Earl of Dowglas: Upon which indignity, George of Dunbarre flies into England to King Henry, and with his aid, makes divers incursions into Scotland: Whereupon Robert King of Scots sent to King Henry, that if he would have the Truce between them to continue, he should deliver to him George of Dunbarre. King Henry answered, that he had given him a safe conduct, and could not now recall it with his Honour; but as for continuing the Truce, King Robert might do in that what he thought best. Upon this answer, the King of Scots presently proclaimed warr against him; but King Henry as ready in that matter as he, stayed not for King Robert's invading of England; but himself with a puissant Army invaded Scotland, burning Castles and Cities, and not sparing Churches, and Religious Houses. About the end of September, he besieged the Castle of Maydens in Edinburgh; where Prince David, and the Earl of Dowglas were: At which time, Robert Duke of Albany, who in the King of Scots sickness managed the business, sent an Herald to King Henry, proteſting upon his Honour, that if he would stay but six daies, he would give him battel, King Henry rewarded the Herald, and stayed; but six times six daies passed, but neither Duke of Albany, nor any other for him appeared. And now Winter came on, victuals grew ſcant, and which was worst, a mortality began in the English Camp; For which causes, King Henry removed his siege, and returned into England. As soon as he was gone, Sir Patrick Heburne a Scottishman, having a good opinion of his valour, thought to do great matters; and with a competent Army of the men of Lough-deane, he invaded Northumberland, making great spoil, and loading his souldiers with prey, and prisoners; but in the Retreat marching looſly, and licentious, was ſet upon by the Earl of Northumberland Vice-Warden, at a Town called Nesbie, where Heburne himself, and all the flower of Lough-deane were slain; Sir John and William Cucklurne, Sir William Buſſe, John and Thomas Habbington, Esquires, and a multitude of common souldiers taken prisoners. On the English part few slain, and none of any rank or quality: in revenge whereof Archibald Dowglas with an Army of twenty thousand entred Northumberland; but in a place called Hamildon, were encountred by the English, under the leading of Henry Lord Percy, surnamed Hospurre, and George Earl of March, who put them to flight; and after the slaughter of ten thousand of them, took five hundred prisoners; whereof the chief were Mordack Earl of Fife, (son of the General, who in the fight lost one of his eyes) Thomas Earl of Murray, Robert Earl of Angus, the Earls of Arboll and Mentith; and amongst the slain, were Sir John Swinton, Sir Adam Gordon, Sir John Levison, Sir Alexander Ramsay, and three and twenty other Knights.

In this mean time, Glendour of Wales had solicited the King of France for aid, who sent him twelve hundred men of quality, but the winds were so contrary, that they lost twelve of their Ships, and the rest returned home. The English, deriding this ill success of the French, so exasperated the French King, that presently after he sent twelve thousand, who landed safely, and joyned with the Welsh, but as soon as they heard of the English Armies approach, whether mistrusting their own strength, or suspecting the Welsh mens faithfulness, they ran to their Ships and disgracefully went home.

King Henry's Ambassadors lately sent into Britain to fetch the Lady Jane de Navarre Dutcheſs of Brittain, the relict of John de Montford surnamed the Conquerour; with whom the King by Procurators had contracted Matrimony; in the beginning of February returned with her in safety: The King met her at Wincheſter, where the seventh of February the marriage was solemnized.

About this time some affronts were offered by the French: Valerian Earl of S. Paul, with seventeen hundred men, landed in the Ile of Wight, where he burnt two Villages and some few Cottages; but hearing the people of the Island to have assembled, he made haſte to his Ships, and returned home. Also John Earl of Clermont (the heir of Bourbon) won from the English the Castles of S. Peter, S. Mary, and the New-Castle: The Lord de la Bret, won the Castle of Calafin; places of great consequence to the English.

And now to make King Henry fenſible that a Crown can hardly ever sit easie upon the head, if it be not set on right at first; a new Conspiracy is hatching against him: The Pierces, Earls of Northumberland and Worceſter, with Henry Hospur, began about this time to fall off from King Henry; their reason was, first, because the King at their request refused to redeem their kinsman Mortimer from Glendour's slavery; and then because he denied them the benefit of such prisoners as they had taken of the Scots, at Hamildon, or Nesbie; whereupon they went of themselves, and procured Mortimer's delivery, and then entred into a League offensive and defensive with Glendour; and by their Proxies, in the house of the Archdeacon of Bangor, they agreed upon a Tripartite Indenture under their hands and seals, to divide the Kingdom into three parts; whereby all England and from Severn and Trent, South and Eastward, was assigned for the portion of the Earl of March: All Wales and the Lands beyond Severn Westward, were assigned to Owen Glendour; and all the remainder of Land from Trent Northward, to be the portion of the Lord Piercy. In this, as Glendour perswaded them, they thought they should accomplish a Propheſie; as though King Henry were the Mould-warp cursed of Gods own mouth; and they were the Lyon, the Dragon and the Wolf which should divide the Land among them. In this mean time King Henry, not acquainted with this Conspiracy, caused a Proclamation to be made, intimating that, the Earl of March had voluntarily caused himself to be taken Prisoner, to the end, the Rebels having him in their custody, might pretend some colour for their Conspiracy: and therefore he had small reason to take care for his deliverance. Hereupon the Pureites assited with a company of Scots, and drawing to their party the Earl of Stafford, and Richard Scroope Archbishop of York, and many other, purposed to joyn with the Captain of the Welsh, but first they framed certain Articles against the King, and sent them to him in writing. That he had falsified his Oath given at his landing, swearing that he came but only to recover his Inheritance, and would not meddle with the King, or with the Crown. That most traitorously he had taken Arms against his Sovereign Lord, imprisoned him, and then most barbarously caused him to be murdered. That ever since the death of King Richard, he had unjustly kept the Crown from his kinsman Edmund Mortimer Earl of March, to whom of right it belonged. That upon no occasion he had imposed divers Taxes upon the people. That by his Letters he procured Burgesses and Knights of the Parliament to be chosen; for which causes and many other, they defied him, and vowed his destruction, and the restoring of the Earl of March to his right. King Henry could not but know that all these Articles against him were true, yet seeing the knowing it hindered him not from seeking to get the Crown when he had it not; it could less hinder him from seeking to keep it now that he had it; and if he were able, being a private man, to get it from a King, he was likely to be more able, being now a King, to keep it from private men; and as for any objections that Conscience could make, he had enough to answer them all: For, if his Title were good against King Richard, by his Resignation, it was good against Mortimer by his swearing Allegiance; and upon these grounds, with a mind as confident as if all circumstances were of his side, he raised an Army, and marched towards the Lords, taking care they might by no means joyn with the Welsh, and about Shrewsbury on Saturday S. Mary Magdalens Eve he encountered them, in which fight though the Scots and Henry Hotspur shewed much valour, yet the victory rested on the Kings side; Hotspur himself was slain, the Earl of Worcester was taken prisoner, together with Sir Richard Vernon, Sir Theobald Trussell, the Baron of Kinderton; and the rest fled. On the Kings part (besides the Earl of Stafford, who had that morning revolted from the Conspirators) were slain, Sir Hugh Shierley, Sir John Clifton, Sir John Cockayne, Sir Nicholas Cusell, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Calverley, Sir John Massie of Puddington, Sir Hugh Mortimer, and Sir Robert Gausell, all which had been but that morning dubbed Knights, with Sir Thomas Wendsley, who dyed afterwards of his wounds; of common souldiers about sixteen hundred, but of the Conspirators above six thousand, whereof 36 the King slew with his own hands; but was once unhorsed by Dowglas, who in his presence slew Sir Walter Blunt, with divers others, that day in all things atired like to the King; for which exploit, Dowglas (being after the fall of his horse taken prisoner) was by the Kings command carefully attended, and without ransom set at liberty: In this battel, the young Prince Henry, though wounded in the face with an Arrow, yet was not wounded in his courage, but continued fighting till. After this victory the King caused publick thanks to be given to God, and then caused the Earl of Worcester to be beheaded, and many others of that Rebellion to be drawn, hanged and quartered, and their heads placed on London Bridge: And then the King sent his Son Henry Prince of Wales, with his whole Army into that Country; but before his coming, Owen Glendour was abandoned by all his Company; and lurking in the Woods was there famished; many of his associates were taken and put to death. Whilst the Prince was in Wales, Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, of his own accord, came and submitted himself to the King, protesting his innocency, as not being once acquainted with any intent of Treason and Rebellion; whose excuse the King received for the present with gentle language, the rather for that he had the possession of Berwick Castle and other places of strength in his power, but yet he wiped not off the score of his misdemeanors out of his mind.

And now with the fourth year of his Reign ended all the great Troubles of this King Henry the fourth: those that follow are but such accidents as are frequent in all times both abroad and at home. The Britains under the leading of the Lord of Castile, spoiled the Town of Plimouth, in revenge whereof, the Western-men, under command of William Wilford, set forth a Fleet, which arriving in Britain, took forty Ships laden with Oyl and Wines, and burnt forty more. Again the French landed a thousand men in the Ile of Wight, where they got together a great booty of Cattel; but the Islanders coming upon them took away their booty, and made many of them leave their Carkates for a booty to the Island. Yet the French would not leave so, but a while after, as having gotten new spirits, they cast Anchor before the Ile of Wight, and require no less then to have the Island into their possession, but a resolute answer of the Islanders frightened them away, and made them glad they were gone. Soon after this the Duke of Orleans, brother to the French King, in a vaunting style, sent a challenge to King Henry to meet him in the field, each of them to have a hundred in his Company; to which the King answered, That for his own valour it had sufficiently been tried, and for this challenge of the Dukes, neither the Person nor the Cause were worthy of his undertaking. Upon this refusal of the Kings, divers taunts and jeers were bandied between them, till at last the Duke in great passion, falls upon Vergie a Town in Guyen, but after three months assailing it, being valiantly defended by Sir Robert Antfield and three hundred English men, he was glad to give over with loss, and return into France. Presently upon this, the Admiral of Britain, accompanied with the Lord Du Castille, and thirty sail of Ships, attempted to land at Dermouth in Devonshire, but were repelled, and the Lord Du Castille, and two of his brothers, and four hundred of his men were slain, besides two hundred

A hundred taken prisoners; of whom, the Lord Baquerile Marshal of Britain, was one. After this five hundred men of arms, five hundred Cross-bows, and a thousand Flemings, under the conduct of the Earl of S. Paul, laid siege to the Castle of Marck, three leagues from Callice; but first by Sir Philip Hall Captain of Callice, and after by Sir Richard Aston Lieutenant of the English pale, they were forced to retire and flee: The Earl of S. Paul escaped to S. Omers, but left many of his men of quality behind him, and more taken Prisoners. After this, Thomas Duke of Clarence, the Kings second Son, and the Earl of Kent, with competent Forces entered the Haven of Sluce, where they burnt four Ships riding at anchor, and returned to the relief of Callice, besieged at that time by the French; and in the way took three Carricks of Genova richly laden, and brought them into the Chamber of Rye. And these were the troubles of this King abroad. About this time a Parliament was assembled at Coventry; which by some was called, the Lay-mens Parliament, because the Sheriffs were appointed, that none should be chosen Knights for the Counties, nor Burgesses for the Cities and Towns, that had any skill in the Laws of the Land.

But now at home, the Reliques of the former Northern Rebellion began to revive; for now Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, Richard Scroope Archbishop of York, Thomas Monray Earl Marshal, the Lords, Hastings, Fawconbridge, and Bardolf, with divers others, conspired at a time appointed, to meet upon Yorkwood-Downes, and there bid defiance to King Henry. Articles of Grievances were framed, and set up in all publick places, which drew multitudes to be partakers of the enterprize. But now, Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmerland, with the Lord John the Kings third son, the Lord Henry Fitz-Hughes, Ralph Evers, and Robert Humphreys, make head against them; and coming into a Plain in the Forest of Galltree, they fate down right against the Archbishop and his Forces, which were twenty thousand; and Westmerland perceiving the Enemies Forces to be far more then theirs, he used this policy: he sent to the Archbishop, demanding the reason why he would raise Forces against the King? who answering, that his Arms were not against the King, but for his own defence, whom the King upon the instigation of Sycophants, had threatened: withall he sent him a scrowl of their grievance, which Westmerland read, and seemed to approve, & thereupon desired a conference with him: The Archbishop more credulous then wife, perswaded the Earl Marshal to go with him to the place appointed to confer: the Articles, are read and allowed of; and thereupon Westmerland seeming to commiserate the souldiers, having been in armour all day, and weary, wished the Archbishop to acquaint his party, as he would do his, with this their mutual agreement; and so shaking hands, in most Courtly friendship drank unto him, whereupon the souldiers were willed to disband, and repair home: which they had no sooner done, but a Troop of horse, which in a colourable manner had made a shew to depart, wheeled about, and afterward returned; and being come in sight the Earl of Westmerland arrested both the Archbishop and the Earl Marshal, and brought them both Prisoners to the King at Pomfret; who passing from thence to York, the Prisoners likewise were carried thither, and the next day both of them beheaded. At Durham the Lords Hastings and Fawconbridge, with two Knights, were executed. Northumberland, with the Lord Bardolf, fled first to Berwick, and after into Scotland, where they were entertained by David Lord Flemming: whereupon the King gave summons to the Castle of Berwick, which at first they refused to obey, but upon the planting and discharging of a Piece, they presently yielded without compolition: and here William Graystock, Henry Baynton, and John Blinksop, Knights, and five other were presently put to execution, and many others committed to several Prisons. About this time, James son and heir of Robert King of Scotland, a child of nine years old, attended by the Earl of Orkney, as he was sailing into France, was taken by certain Mariners of Norfolk, who brought him to the King at Windsor, the 30 of March, 1408. and the King sent them to the Tower of London.

Northumberland and Bardolf, after they had been in Vales, France, and Flanders, to raise a power against King Henry, returned back into Scotland, and after a year with a great power of Scots entered England, and came into Yorkshire, making great spoil and wast as they passed: but Sir Thomas Rokeby Sheriff of York, levying the forces of the County, upon Bramham-moor gave them battel; in which Northumberland was slain, Bardolf taken, but wounded to death, and the rest put to flight. About this time also, Sir Robert Humphreys Vice-Admiral of England, with ten men of war entered Scotland, burnt their Galley, and many other ships over against Beth, and brought away with him fourteen tall ships laden with corn and other staple commodities, which at his return he sent into the Markets round about, and thereby brought down the prices of all things; and purchased to himself the name of Mend-market.

The Prince had been a Student in Queens Colledge in Oxford, under the tuition of his Uncle Henry Beaufort, Chancellour of that University, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln and Winchester, and lately made a Cardinal, by the title of Ensebius. From Oxford, the Prince was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy Earl of Worcester was made his Governour: but coming afterward to be at his own disposing, whether being by nature valorous, and not yet well stayed by time and experience; or whether incited by ill companions, and emboldned by the opinion of his own greatness; he ran into many courses so unworthy of a Prince, that it was much doubted what he would prove when he came to be King once. It is said, he lay in wait for the Receivers of his fathers Rents, and in the person of a Thief set upon them and robbed them. Another time, when one of his companions was arraigned for felony before the Lord Chief Justice, he went to the Kings Bench bar, and offered to take the Prisoner away by force; but being withstood by the Lord Chief Justice, he stepped up to him, and struck him over the face: whereat the Judge nothing abashed, shed, rose up and told him, that he did not this affront to him, but to the King his father, in whose place he sat; and therefore to make him know his fault, he commanded him to be committed to the Fleet. You would have wondered to see how calm the Prince was in his own cause, who in the cause of his companion had been so violent: for he quietly obeyed the Judges sentence, and suffered himself to be led to Prison. This passage was not a little pleasing to the King, to think that he had a Judge of such courage, and a Son of such submission: but yet for these and such other pranks, he removed him from being President of the Council, and placed in it his third son John. This made the Prince so sensible of his fathers displeasure, that he thought it necessary to seek by all means to recover his good opinion; which he endeavoured to do by a way as strange as that by which he lost it; for, attiring himself in a garment of blew Sattin; wrought all with Elyt-holes of black silk, at every hole the needle hanging, by which it was sowed, and about his arm a thing in fashion of a hounds collar, studded with SS. of Gold, he came to the Court at Westminster; to whom, the King (though not well in health) caused himself, in a Chair, to be brought into his Privy Chamber; where in presence of but three or four of his Privie Counsel, he demanded of the Prince the cause of his unwonted habit and coming? who answered, That being not only his subject but his son, and a son so tenderly always regarded by him; he was worthy of a thousand deaths, if he should intend or but imagine, the least offence to his sacred Majesty, and therefore had fitted himself to be made a sacrifice: and therewithall reached his dagger, holding it by the point to his father. For (said he) I desire not to live longer, then I may be thought to be, what I am and shall ever be, Your faithful and obedient Vassal. With this or the like Answer, the King was so moved, that he fell upon his sons neck, and with many tears embracing him, confessed that his ears had been too open to receive reports against him, and promising faithfully, that from thenceforth no reports should cause any disfaffection towards him. The King about this time, made his son John Duke of Bedford, and his son Humphrey Duke of Gloucester; he made also Sir Thomas Beauchamp Earl of Dorset, and the Earl of Arundell he created Duke of York.

The rest of King Henry's daies, from this time forward, being scarce a year, was free from all trouble both abroad and at home, unless perhaps he might be troubled in mind for having shed so much English and Noble blood; for expiation whereof, or else to the end he might joyn Valour and Devotion in one action together, which hitherto he but used singly; he took upon him the Crusado, and at a Council in White-Friers, order was taken, and great preparation was made for his journey to Jerusalem: But it was otherwise Decreed in Heaven; and yet not so otherwise, but that he ended his life in Jerusalem, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Of his Taxations.

IN the very beginning of his reign, it might pass in stead of a Taxation, that he found in King Richards Coffers, in money and jewels, to the value of seven hundred thousand pounds. In his fourth year, an extraordinary Subsidie was granted him; twenty shillings of every Knights Fee, and of every one that had twenty shillings a year in land, twelve pence, and upward according to that rate; and of every one that had twenty pounds in goods, twelve pence, and upward according to that rate; but with this caution and protestation, that it should not hereafter be drawn for a Precedent, and that no Record thereof should be made. In his sixth year the Clergy granted to the King a Tenth. In his seventh year, the Clergy granted a Tenth and a half, and the Commons two Fifteens. In a Parliament holden the ninth year of his reign, the King moved to have allowed him in every year wherein there was no Parliament kept, a Tenth of the Clergy, and a Fifteenth of the Laity; to which demands the Bishops assented, but the Commons would not. In his seventh year, a Parliament began which lasted almost a whole year, in which a Subsidie was at last granted; so sharp, that even Priests and Friars who lived of Alms, were forced every one to pay a Noble.

Of Laws and Ordinances made in his time.

Controversies in Religion first punished by burning.

IN this Kings daies, burning and execution by fire for controversies in Religion was first put in practise.

Also in the first year of his reign, an Act was made, that no person of what degree soever, should after that day alledge for his excuse, any constraint or coarcting of his Prince, for doing of any unlawful act; and that such excuse, after that day, should stand him in no stead.

Also an Act was made, that no Lord, nor other might give any Liveries to any but their household and menial servants. In his twelfth year, the King caused a new coyn of Nobles to be made, which was of less value then the old Noble by four pence.

Also that all Rypiers, and other Fishers from any of the Sea-coasts, should sell their fish in Cornhill and Cheapside themselves, and not to Fishmongers that would buy to sell again.

Also this King instituted the Dutchy Court, which he did in honour of the House of Lancaster, to the end, the Lands belonging to the Dutchy, might in all following times be distinguished and known from the Lands of the Crown. In his sixth year the King called a Parliament at Coventry, and sent Procefs to the Sheriffs, that they should chuse no Knights nor Burgesses, that had any knowledge

The Dutchy Court instituted by King Henry.

A knowledge in the Laws of the Realm; by reason whereof, it was called, the Lay-mens Parliament. In his seventh year, the Mayor of London for preservation of fish, obtained, that all Wears which stood between London and seven miles beyond Kingstone: as also, such as stood between London and Gravesend, should be pulled up and taken away.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

BY reason of discord between John of Gaunt, and Wickham Bishop of Winchester; the Bishop either in durance, could not, or in fear, durst not come to the Parliament house, at a time when the King required a supply of money; but the Clergy unanimously affirming, that without their brother, the Bishop of Winchester's presence, they neither can nor will consult of any thing, he is presently sent for, and by the King secured. After this, the King called a Parliament at Coventry, and sent Procefs to the Sheriffs that they should chuse no Knights or Burgesses that were Lawyers, and was therefore called the Laymens Parliament: And shortly after another Parliament was called, and named the unlearned Parliament, either for the unlearnedness of the persons, or for their malice to learned men: In which the Commons presented a Petition to the King and the upper House; desiring that the King might have the Temporal possessions of the Bishops and Clergie, the value whereof they pretended would be sufficient maintenance for a hundred and fifty Earls, one thousand five hundred Knights, six thousand two hundred Esquires, and a hundred Hospitals for maimed Souldiers. They craved likewise, that Clerks convict should not be delivered to the Bishops Prison; and that the Statute made in the second year of the King against Lollards, might be repealed. But the King denied their Petition; and in person commanded them from thenceforth, not to presume to trouble their Brains about any such business, for he was resolved to leave the Church in as good state as he found it. In the twelfth year of his reign certain learned men in Oxford, in their Sermons maintained the opinions of Wickliffe: but the Bishops and Doctors of the University, inhibited and condemned them. In his time was a great Schism in the Church, by reason of two Anti-Popes; but afterwards in an assembly of Cardinals and Bishops, a third man was elected, named Alexander the fifth, who had been trained up at Oxford.

Works of Piety done in his time.

KING Henry founded a Colledge at Battlefield in Shropshire, where he overcame the Lord Henry Percy. In his third year, the Conduit upon Cornhill was begun to be built. Also in his time Sir Robert Knolls made the Stone-bridge of Rochester in Kent; and founded in the Town of Pomsfret a Colledge and an Hospital; he also re-edified the body of the White-Friers Church in Fleetstreet, where he was afterward buried: Which Church was first founded by the Ancestors of the Lord Grey of Codnor. In the eighth year of his reign, Richard Whittington Mayor of London erected an house or Church in London, to be a house of Prayer, and named it after his own name, Whittington Colledge; with lodgings and weekly allowance for divers poor people. He also builded the Gate of London, called Newgate, in the year 1420. which was before a most loathsome prison: he builded also more then half of S. Bartholomews Hospital in West-Smithfield, and the beautiful Library in the Gray-Friers in London, now called Christs Hospital. He also builded a great part of the East-end of Guildhall, and a Chappel adjoining to it, with a Library of itone, for the custody of the Records of the City. But he that exceeded all at this time in works of Piety, was William Wickham Bishop of Winchester; his first work was the building of a Chappel at Tichfield, where his Father, Mother, and Sister Perrot were buried: Next, he founded at Southwick in Hampshire, near the Town of Wickham, the place of his birth, as a supplement to the Priory of Southwick, a Chauntry, with allowance for five Priests for ever: He bestowed twenty thousand marks in repairing the houses belonging to the Bishoprick; he discharged out of Prison in all places of his Diocess, all such poor prisoners as lay in execution for debt, under twenty pounds: he amended all the high-ways from Winchester to London, on both sides the River. After all this, on the fifth of March, 1379. he began to lay the foundation of that magnificent structure in Oxford, called New-Colledge; and in person laid the first stone thereof; in which place before, there stood Neims-Colledge, built by Alover, at Neims intreaty; and for the affinity of the name, came to be called New-Colledge. In the year 1387, on the 36. of March, he likewise in person laid the first stone of the like foundation in Winchester, and dedicated the same, as that other in Oxford, to the memory of the Virgin Mary. The Grocers in London purchased their Hall in Cunnynhope Lane for 320. marks; and then laid the foundation thereof on the tenth of May. Casualties

Casualties happening in his time.

The Devil appears in the likeness of a Gray Fryer.

A snow that continued four months.

IN his third year, in the Moneth of March, appeared a blazing star; first betwixt the East and the North, and then sending forth fiery beams towards the North: fore-shewing perhaps the effusion of blood that followed after, in Wales and Northumberland. In the same year, at Danbury in Essex, the Devil appeared in likeness of a Gray Fryer; who entering the Church, put the people in great fear, and the same hour, with a peevish of whirlwind and Thunder, the top of the steeple was broken down, and half the Chancel scattered abroad. In his seventh year, such abundance of water brake suddenly over the Banks in Kent, that it drowned Cattel without number. Also this year, the Town of Roylstone in Hartfordshire was burnt. In his ninth year was so sharp a winter, and such abundance of snow, continued December, January, February, and March, that almost all small Birds died through hunger.

Of his Wives and Children.

HE had two Wives, the first was Mary, one of the Daughters and heirs of Humphrey de Bohun Earl of Hereford, Essex, and Northampton; she dyed before he came to the Crown, in the year 1394. His second Wife was Joan, Daughter to Charles the first King of Navarre, she being the widow of John de Montford surnamed Streamy, or the Conquerour, Duke of Britain; who dyed without any issue by King Henry, at Havering in Essex, the year 1437. In the fifteenth year of King Henry the sixth, and lyeth buried by her husband at Canterbury. He had four sons and two daughters; Of his sons, Henry his eldest was Prince of Wales, and after his Father, King of England. His second son was Thomas Duke of Clarence, and Steward of England; who was slain at Beaufort in Anjou, and dyed without issue. His third son was John Duke of Bedford; he married first with Anne daughter to John Duke of Burgundie; and secondly with Jacoba daughter of Pier of Luxembourg, Earl of S. Paul, but dyed also without issue. His fourth son was Humphrey, by his brother King Henry the fifth created Duke of Glocester, and was generally called the good Duke; he had two Wives, but dyed without issue, in the year 1446. and was buried at S. Albans; though the vulgar opinion be, that he lies buried in S. Pauls Church. Of King Henry the fourths daughters; Blanch the elder was married to Lewis Barbatous, Palatine of the Rhene, and Prince Elector; Phillippe his younger Daughter, was married to John King of Denmark and Norway.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

Concerning his body; he was of a middle stature, slender limbs, but well proportioned. Concerning his Mind; of a serious and solid disposition, and one that stood more upon his own legs than any of his Predecessors had done: in cases of difficulty, not refusing, but not needing the advice of others; which might confirm, but not better his own. He was neither merry nor sad, but both: beat pleased when he was opposed, because this was like to do him good, by sharpening his invention: most angry when he was flattered, because this was sure to do him hurt, by dulling his judgment. No man ever more loved, nor less doted upon a wife, then he: a good husband, but not uxorious; that if there be reins to that Passion, we may know he had them. It was thought, he affected the Crown, not so much out of Ambition as out of Compassion, because the oppressions of his Country he could not so well help being a subject, as a King; for otherwise we may truly say, he was a looser by the Crown, being not so great for a King, as he was before for a Subject: The Crown rather was a gainer by him, which hath ever since been the richer for his wearing it. We may think he was either weary of his life, or longing for death; for why else would he take upon him the Crusado, having been told by a skillful Soothsayer, that he should die in Jerusalem? but it seems, he did not believe him.

Of his Death and Burial.

He dies of an Apoplexy.

IN the forty sixth year of his Age, having Peace both at home and abroad, and being of too active a spirit to be idle, he took upon him the Crusado, and great provision was made for his journey to Jerusalem: but alas, his journey to Jerusalem required no such provision; for being at his Prayers at S. Edward's shrine, he was suddenly taken with an Apoplexy, and thereupon removed to the Abbot of Westminster's house; where recovering his senses, and finding himself in a strange place, he asked what place it was? and being told that he was in the Abbots house, in a Chamber called Jerusalem: Well then (said he) Lord have mercy upon me, for this is the Jerusalem where a Soothsayer told me I should dye. And here he dyed indeed, on the 20 day of March, in the year 1413. when he had lived six and forty years, reigned thirteen and a half. It is worth remembering, that all the time of his sickness, his will was to have his Crown set upon his bolster by him; and one of his fits being so strong upon him, that all men thought him directly dead; the Prince coming

A coming in, took away the Crown: when suddenly the K. recovering his senses, missed his Crown; and asking for it, was told, the Prince had taken it: whereupon the Prince being called, came back with the Crown, and kneeling down said, Sir, to all our judgements, and to all our griefs, you seemed directly dead, and therefore I took the Crown as being my Right: but seeing to all our comforts, you live, I here deliver it much more joyfully then I took it, and pray God you may long live to wear it your self. Well (saith the King sighing) what right I had to it, God knows. But (saith the Prince) if you dye King, my sword shall maintain it to be my Right against all opposers. Well (saith the King) I refer all to God: but I charge thee on my Blessing, that thou administer the Laws indifferently, avoid Flatterers, defer not to do Justice, or be sparing of Mercy: And then turning about, said, God bless thee, and have mercy on me: and with those words, gave up the ghost. His body with all Funeral pomp was conveyed to Canterbury, and there solemnly buried.

His admonitions to the Prince.

Of Men of note in his time.

OF men of Valour in his time, of whom there was store, I shall need to say no more then what hath already been said in the body of the story: only I cannot but remember Sir Robert Knolls, who born of mean parentage, made himself famous over all Christendome; and dying at a Manour of his in Norfolk, was brought to London, and buried in the Church of the White Friars in London, which himself had re-edified. But for men of learning, I must set in the first place, William Wickham, a man of no learning, yet well worthy to hold the place: In relating of whose life, I must have leave to expatiate a little. His fathers name was John Long, or as some say, Perot; but as Cambrian proverb, Wickham; and not from the place of his dwelling, though he was Parish Clerk of Wickham in Hampshire, where he taught children to write: in which quality his son William proved so excellent, that Nicholas Wodall, Countess of Winchester Cattle, took him from his father, and kept him at School, first at Winchester, afterward at Oxford, till himself being made Surveyor-general of the Kings works, he sent for this William to serve him as his Clerk; who in short time grew to expert in that employment, that Adam Tortleton Bishop of Winchester, commended him to the King, who employed him presently in surveying his Fortifications at Dover, and Quinborough Castles, and afterward made him Surveyor of his Buildings at Winchester Cattle, and his houses of Henly and East-Hamstead. And here first envie rose up against him; for having caused to be engraven on a stone of a Wall at Winchester Cattle, these words; This made William Wickham: Some that envied his rising, complained to the King of his insolency, as arrogating to himself, that excellent piece of building to be done at his charge; but Wickham called before the King about it, made answer, that his meaning was not, neither by any indifferent construction could it import, that Wickham made that building, but that the same building made Wickham, as being a means of the Kings great favour towards him. This answer pacified the King, who took him daily more and more into his favour; and being now entered into the Ministry, was first made Person of S. Martins in the Fields, then Minister of S. Martins le grand, afterwards Archdeacon of Lincoln, Provost of Vells, and Rector of Manyben in Devonshire; so as at one time he had in his hands so many Ecclesiastical livings, that the value of them, in the Kings Books, amounted to eight hundred seventy six pounds thirteen shillings: besides which, he was honoured with many Temporal places of great profit and respect, as to be his principal Secretary, Keeper of the Privy Seal, Master of the Wards and Liveries, Treasurer of the Kings Revenues in France, and some other Offices. After which, the Bishoprick of Winchester falling void, means was made to the King to bestow that place upon him: And here, the second time, did envie rise up against him, informing the King that he was a man of little or no learning, and no way fit for such a dignity: whereupon the King made stay of granting it: but when Wickham came before the King, and told him, that what he wanted in personal learning, he would supply with being a Founder of learning; This so satisfied the King, that he bestowed the place upon him. After this, he was made Lord Treasurer of England; and here the third time did envie rise up against him; for the King requiring of his subjects a supply of money. It was answered, that he needed no other supply, then to call his Treasurer to account: This blow struck deep upon the Bishop: for he was presently charged to give account for eleven hundred ninety six thousand pounds; and whilest he was busied in preparing his account, all his Temporalities, upon importunity of John of Gaunt, were seized into the Kings hands, and given to the Prince of Wales, and himself upon pain of the Kings displeasure, commanded not to come within twenty miles of the Court. In this case, he dismissed his train, and senteth copies abroad of his account, if it might be received; but was hindered by the working of John of Gaunt against him; upon this ground (as was thought). Queen Philip wife to King Edward the Third, upon her death-bed, by way of Confession, told Wickham, that John of Gaunt was not the lawful issue of King Edward, but a supposititious son: for when she was brought to bed at Gaunt of a Daughter, knowing how desirous the King was to have a son; she exchanged that daughter, with a Dutch woman for a Boy, whereof she had been delivered about the same time with the Queen. Thus much she confessed, and withal made the Bishop swear, that if the said John of Gaunt should at any time, either directly, or indirectly attempt the Crown, or that rightfully, through want of issue, it should devolve unto him; that then he should discover this matter, and make it known unto the King, and Council. Afterward the Queen being dead, and the Bishop finding John of Gaunt, as he thought, too much aspiring, he secretly told him this relation, and this adjuration of his supposed mother, advising him not to seek higher then a private state; for else he was bound by oath to make it known known to all the World: Thus far the Bishop did well; but when he saw the son of John of Gaunt not only aspiring, but possessed of the Crown, why did he not then discover it, and joyn at least with the Bishop of Carlisle, in opposing it? Certainly, we may know, that either the whole relation was but a Fable, or that Wickham was a Temporizer, or that John of Gaunt was a most patient man, to suffer the affront of such an indignity, with less than the death of him that did it. But howsoever it was, it is certain, the Duke bore a mortal grudge to the Bishop; who had no way to withstand such an enemy, but by making Alice Pierce his friend: by whose means, after two years, he was restored to all his livings; and afterward K. Edward being dead, and Alice Pierce banished; by the means of a greater friend then Alice Pierce (his full purse) he obtained in the second year of K. Richard, a general pardon under the Great Seal of England; and from that time forward enjoyed a quiet life, and died in the fourth year of this King Henry the fourth, being then of the age of above 80 years, and lieth buried in the Church of S. Swithins in Winchester, in a monument of his own making in his life time; leaving for his heir Thomas Perrot, the son of his sister Agnes, married to William Perrot.

William Wickham his parentage, and rising.

John of Gaunt said to be a supposititious son.

Roger Walden, who died in the ninth year of this King: he was at first a poor Scholar in Oxford; and the first step of his rising, was to be a Chaplain in the Colledge there of S. Maries; from thence by degrees he got to be Dean of York; and after this, a high step, to be Treasurer of England; and yet a higher after that, upon the banishment of Thomas Arundell, to be Archbishop of Canterbury: But being now at the top, he came down again; for in this Kings time, Thomas Arundell being restored to the Archbishoprick, Walden was not only put out of that place, but was called to account for the Treasurership: and though he shewen his Quietus est, yet all his Temporalities were seized, and his person imprisoned, till by the mediation of the now Archbishop Arundell, he was made Treasurer of Callice, and after promoted to be Bishop of London.

The next place after these, is justly due to Geoffry Chancer, and John Gower, two famous Poets in this time, and the Fathers of English Poets in all the times after: Chancer died in the fourth year of this King, and lieth buried at Westminster: Gower, in this Kings ninth year, and was buried at S. Mary Overies Church in Southwark. And now come others to be remembered, who lived and died in this Kings time: Hugh Legate, born in Hartfordshire, a Monk of S. Albans, who wrote Schulies upon Boetius de Consolatione, Nicholas Gorham, born also in Hartfordshire, a Dominick Friar, and the French Kings Confessor, though an Englishman. Walter Disse, so called of a Town in Norfolk, where he was born, Confessor to the Duke of Lancaster. Lawrence Holbeck, a Monk of Ramsey, who wrote an Hebrew Dictionary. John Cotton Archbishop of Armagh: Richard Scroope brother to William Scroope Lord Treasurer of England, made Archbishop of York; and writing an invective against King Henry, lost his head. William Thorpe, an earnest follower of John Wickliffe, for which he was committed to Saltwood Castle, where he died. Stephen Patrington, born in Yorkshire, and Robert Mafcalc, a Carmelite Fryer of Ludlow; both of them Confessors to King Henry the fifth. Boston a Monk of the Abbey of Bury in Suffolk; who wrote a Catalogue of all the Writers of the Church, and other Treatises. John Purvey, who was convented for teaching Doctrine contrary to the Church of Rome, and compelled to recant. Thomas Rudborne Bishop of S. David, who wrote a Chronicle. Nicolas Riston who considering the strife between the then Anti-popes, wrote a book, De tollendo schismate. Robert Wansham a Monk in Dorsetshire, who wrote a book in verse, Of the Original and signification of Words. Robert Wimbledon an excellent Preacher, as appeareth by the Sermon he made upon this Text, Redde rationem Villicationis tue.

THE REIGN OF KING HENRY THE FIFTH.

HENRY of Monmouth (so called from the place in Wales, where he was born) eldest son of King Henry the fourth, succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of England, to whom the Lords of the Realm swore Homage and Allegiance, before he was yet Crowned; an Honour never done before to any of his Predecessours: and afterwards on the ninth of April, in the year 1412. he was Crowned at Westminster, by Thomas Arundell, Archbishop of Canterbury, with all Rites and Solemnities in such case accustomed: And as the Scripture speaks of Saul, That as soon as Samuel had anointed him King, he had a new heart given him, and he became another man then he was before: So was it with this King Henry; for presently after his Coronation, he called before him all his old Companions, who had been fratres in malo with him; strictly charging them, not to presume to come within ten miles of his Court, until such time as they had given good proof of their amendment in manners; and lest any of them should pretend want of maintenance to be any cause of their taking ill courses, he gave to every one of them a competent means whereby to subsist. And knowing (as he did) the fashion of the Scots and Welsh; that in times of change they would commonly take advantage, to make Inroads upon the borders; he therefore caused Forts and Bulwarks in fit places to be erected, and placed Garrisons in them, for preventing or repelling any such Incursions. Immediately after this, he called a Parliament, where a Subsidy was granted without asking; and in this Parliament the Commons began to harp upon their old string, of taking away the Temporalities of the Clergy; and the Bishops fearing how it might take in the Kings ears, thought it best to divert him; by striking upon another string which they knew would be more pleasing to him; which was to shew him the great right he had to the Crown of France. And thereupon Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, in a long narration, deduced the Kings right from Isabel daughter to Philip the fourth, married to King Edward the second; from whom it descended by direct line to his Majesty, and no hindrance of enjoying it, but pretension of the Salique laws; which (said he) was neither according to the law of God, nor yet intended at first to that Nation; and though his Predecessors by reason of other incumbences forbore to prosecute their Claim, yet he being free from all such incumbences, had no less power then right to do it, This indeed struck upon the right string of the Kings inclination; for as he affected nothing more then true glory, so in nothing more then in warlike actions. Hereupon, nothing was now thought of, but the Conquest of France. First therefore he begins to alter in his Arms the bearing of Semy-de-Luces, and quarters the three Flower Deuces, as the Kings of France then bare them; and that he might not be thought to steal advantage, but to do it fairly, he sent Embassadors to Charles the sixth then King of France, requiring in peaceable manner the surrender of the Crown of France; which if he would yield unto, then King Henry would take to Wife his Daughter Katharine; but if he refused to do it, then King Henry would with fire and sword enforce it from him, or lose his life. The Ambassadors sent, were the Duke of Excester, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Lord Gray, the Lord High Admiral, and the Bishop of Norwich, with five hundred Horse: who coming to the Court of France, were at first received and feasted, with all the honour and shew of kindness that might be; but as soon as their message was delivered, and that it was known what they came about, the Copy of their entertainment was altered, and they were sent away with as little complement, as they were before received with honour; only told, that the King would speedily make answer to the King their Master by his own Ambassadors; and speedily indeed he did it; for the Earl of Vendôme, William Barotier Archbishop of Bourges, Peter Fresnel, Bishop of Lysleaux, with others, were arrived in England, almost as the English were returned. But being come, the Archbishop of Bourges made a long Oration in the praise of Peace, concluding with the tender of the Lady Katherine, and 50000 Crowns with her in Dower, besides some Towns of no great importance: To which King Henry by the Archbishop of Canterbury made Answer; That these offers were trifles, and that without yielding to his demands, he would never desist from that he intended: and with this Answer the French Ambassadors were dismissed. It is said, that about this time, the Dauphin (who in the King of France his sickness, managed the State) sent to King Henry a Tonne of Tennis Balls, in derision of his youth, as fitter to play with them, than to manage Arms; which King Henry took in such scorn, that he promised with an Oath, it should not be long ere he would toss such Iron balls amongst them, that the best Arms in France should not be able to hold a Racket to return them. And now all things are prepared and in a readiness for the King's journey into France, his men shipped, and himself ready to go on Shipboard; when suddenly a Treason was discovered against his person, plotted by Richard Earl of Cambridge, Henry Lord Scroppe of Malham, Lord Treasurer, and Thomas Gray Earl of Northumberland, and procured by the French Agents. These being apprehended, and upon examination confessing the Treason, and the money (which was said to be a Million of Gold) by them for that end received, were all of them immediately put to death. From this Richard Earl of Cambridge, second Son of Edmund of Langley, did Richard afterward Duke of York claim and recover the Crown from the Lancastrian Family. This execution done, and the wind blowing fair, King Henry weighs Anchor; and with a Fleet of 1200 Sails, (Grafton saith, but Enguerrant saith, 1600; attended with six thousand Spears, and 24000 Foot, besides Engineers and labourers; he puts to Sea, and on our Lady Eve landed at Caux; where he made Proclamation, that no man upon pain of death should rob any Church, or offer violence to any that were found unarmed; and from thence passing on, he besieged Harfleur; which when no succour came within certain dayes agreed upon, the Town was surrendered and sacked. Of this Town he made the Duke of Exeter Captain, who left there for his Lieutenant, Sir John Falstaff, with a Garrison of 1500 men. It is said, that when King Henry entered Harfleur, he passed along the streets bare-foot, until he came to the Church of St. Martin; where with great devotion, he gave most humble thanks to God for this first achieved Enterprize. From thence he marched forward, and coming to the River of Soame, he found all the Bridges broken; whereupon he passed on to the Bridge of St. Maxens, where 30000 French appearing, he pitched his Camp, expecting to be fought with; and the more to encourage his men, he gave the order of Knighthood to John Lord Ferrers of Groby, Reynold Grayfisk, Pierce Tempest, Christopher Morisby, Thomas Pickering, William Huddleston, Henry Mortimer, John Husbalt, Philip Hall; but not perceiving the French to have any mind to fight, he marched by the Town of Amiens to Bowes, and there stayed two dayes expecting battel, and from thence marched to Corby; where the Peasants of the Countrey, with certain men of Arms sent from the Dauphin, charged the right wing of the English, which was led by Hugh Stafford Lord Bourchier, and won away his Standard, but was recovered again by John Bromeley of Bromeley, a Commander in the Lord Staffords Regiment, who with his own hand slew him that had taken the Colours; and then taking them up, displayed the same; with sigle whereof, the English were so encouraged, that they presently routed the French, and put them to flight: which valiant exploit, the Lord Stafford recompensed, by giving to Bromeley an Annuity of fifty pounds a year out of his Lands in Staffordshire. After this, the King marched towards Calice, so strictly observing his Proclamation against Church-robbing; that when one was complained of for having taken a silver Pixie out of a Church, he not only caused the same to be restored, but the Souldier also to be hanged: which point of Discipline, both kept the rest from offending in that kind, and drew the people of the Countrey, underhand to relieve his men with all things necessary. The French King hearing that King Henry had passed the River of Soame, by advice of his Counsel (who yet were divided in opinion) sent Montjoy the French King at Arms to desire King Henry, and to let him know he should be fought with; which King Henry, though his Army was much infected with Feavers, whereof the Earl of Stafford, the Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Molines and Burnell, were lately dead, yet he willingly heard, and rewarded the Herald for his message; and first having cleared a passage over a Bridge, where of necessity he was to pass, on the 22 of October, he passed over with his Army: At which time the Duke of York that led the Rereward, had discovered the Enemy to come on apace, whereof he sent word to the King; who thereupon made a stand, and appointing his Officers what course to hold, and encouraging his Souldiers, they all attended when the battel should begin. The French Army was divided into three battels; in the first were placed eight thousand men at Arms, four thousand Archers, and fifteen hundred Crossbows, the wings consisting of two thousand two hundred men at Arms; this battail was led by the Constable of France himself, the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the Earls of Ewe, Richmond, and Vendôme, the Lord Dampier, the Lord Admiral of France, the Admiral Bouciguale, and others. The middle Battail wherein were more men at Arms, was commanded by the Dukes of Barre, and Alanson, and by the Earls of Varmont, Salings, Blamont, Granipepe, and Rouffy. In the Rereward, were all the remainder of the French forces, guided by the Earls of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauconbridge, and the Lord Lunrey, Captain of Ardey. The Frenchmen thus ordered, being six times, some say ten times, as many as the English, (who were not above nine thousand) thought of nothing, but of the booty they should get: In the mean time King Henry having made choice of a piece of ground half fenced on his back with the Village, wherein they had reited the night before, on both sides having strong hedges and ditches, begun there to order his battel; but first he appointed an ambush of two hundred Archers, which upon a watch-word given, should discharge their whole flight upon the whole flank of the enemies horse: The Vant-guard consisting of Archers only, was conducted by the Duke of York, who out of an heroic courage made suit for that place; with whom were joynted the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The main battel was led by the King himself, which consisted of Bill-men, and some Bow-men; with him were the Duke of Gloucester his Brother, the Earl Marshall, Oxford, and Suffolk. The Rereward was led by Thomas Duke of Exeter, the Kings Uncle, consisting of all sorts of weapons; the horsemen, as wings guarded the companies on both sides. The King to prevent the fury of the French Cavalry, by the direction of the Duke of York, appointed divers stakes studded with iron at both ends, of six foot long, to be pitched behind the Archers, and appointed Pioners to attend to remove them, as they should be directed: These things thus ordered, publique Prayers were humbly made, and the on-set was presently given by the French horsemen; whereupon Sir Walter Orpington, according to direction, caused the Bow-men behind the hedges, to let fly their Arrows; which so galled the French horses, that either they cast their Riders, or through their unruliness, so opened their Ranks, that the right wing of the English horse had way to come in upon the French foot; and withall, the French horse disorderly retiring, they were miserably trodden down and disfranked by their own company: Upon which, the King with his main battel came on with such resolution, that himself in person charged the Duke of Alanson, by whom he was well-near unhorsed; but afterward, having first slain two of the Dukes men, he charged the Duke again, and with his sword beat him from his horse; whom the Kings Guard, notwithstanding the King cried out to the contrary, slew outright: and with his fall, the main battel of the French first gave ground, then turned their backs, and lastly cast away their weapons and fled. But then certain of the French horsemen that first ran away, led on by Robert Bondile and the Captain of Agincourt, meaning to wipe away the blot of running away from souldiers, by fighting with boyes, set upon the Pages and Lannettes that were left in the Camp; who gave such a lamentable shriek, that King Henry verily thought some fresh forces had been come: whereupon he caused all the arrows that were sticking in the field, to be gathered, and the stakes to be plucked up, and made ready to be again used; amongst which the Duke of Yorks body was found, miserably hacked and defaced: the sight whereof, together with danger of a second Charge, made King Henry give order, the Prisoners should be all slain, except only some principal men, whom he caused to be bound back to back, and so left: For which fact, though done in cold blood, yet the King could not justly be taxed with cruelty, seeing the number of the prisoners was more then of his own souldiers; and nothing could give assurance of safety, but their slaughter. But all was not yet done: for the Earls of Marle and Fauconbridge, with six hundred men at Arms, who had stood still all day, began now to stir, and gave a brave charge upon King Henry's Army; but being but few, and their horses galled with the stakes, they had only the honour to dye bravely; and indeed they slew more of the English, then the whole Army had done before. And now at last, the King being satisfied by the scouts, that no Enemy was more to be seen, he asked what the place was called; and being told, Agincourt; Well then (said he) this shall be from henceforth called the battel of Agincourt: and presently he caused the whole Army, in their array as they were, to give God thanks; causing the Clergie there present, to sing the Psalm of David, In exitu Israel de Aegypto; and made Proclamation, that every one, at the verse, Non nobis Domine, sed nomini tuo da gloriam, should kneel down, and the horsemen bow their bodies: and then singing Te Deum and other holy Hymns, they marched to the enemies Camp, where the souldiers had liberty given them to take the spoil.

A great Victory no doubt, but yet a victory by which the English gained not one foot of ground in France, more then they had before; and which Monshetle attributeth not so much to the valour of the English, as to the indifferetion of the French, who had so straightened the vant-guard of their Army, and pent them up so close together, that they had not room to draw out their swords; so true is that saying, Quos deus vult perdere, dementat. The next day, after the Battel, French Heralds came to ask leave to bury their dead, and had it, and the English Heralds, appointed to make search, made return that there were slain of the French above ten thousand, whereof a hundred twenty six were of the Nobility bearing Banners; of Knights and Gentlemen of Coat-Armour, seven thousand eight hundred seventy four, whereof five hundred were knighted the night before the battel; and of common souldiers, about sixteen hundred. Amongst the slain of the Nobility, were Charles le Brets High Constable, Jaquet of Chastillon, Admiral of France, the great Master of France, the Master of the Cross-bowes, the Dukes of Alanson, Brabant, and Barre; the Earls of Nevers, Marle, Vaudemont, Beaumont, Grandpre, Rouffy, Fauconbridge, Foy, and Lestresack: There were taken Prisoners, Charles Duke of Orleans, John Duke of Bourbon, the Lords Danvers, Fosseux, Hamiers, Roy, Camy, Fauconrt, Nael, Bouciguale; to the number in all of fifteen hundred. On the English part were slain, Edward Duke of York, and the Earl of Suffolk, and not full six hundred in all; but (saith Caxton) not above six and twenty in all; and Paulus Emilius saith, besides the two Lords, only two Knights, and but ten private fouldiers in all: a Miracle rather than a Victory. But not only K. Henry was the death of the French Lords before named, in the field with his sword; but of another great Prince, at home, with his Victory; for Lewis the Dauphin, eldest son of Charles the sixth, King of France, presently upon it, without any other cause apparent, fell sick and died. Yet King Henry, to make his enemies the better contented with their overthrow, and to take away the envy of his Victory; at his return into England with his Prisoners, which was on the sixth of November following, he presently gave strait order, that no Ballad or Song should be made or sung, more then of Thanksgiving to God for his happy Victory and safe return; but without words of either disgracing the French, or extolling the English. At his entrance into London, the City presented him with a thousand pounds, and two Balcons of Gold worth five hundred pounds more. The bodies of the Duke of York and the Earl of Suffolk were brought into England, and the Dukes buried at Frodringham in Northamptonshire, the Earls at New-Elme in Oxfordshire.

About this time the Emperour Sigismund Cousin-german to King Henry, having been first in France, came accompanied with the Archbishop of Rhemes, Embassador from the French King, into England; for whom there were thirty great ships sent from the King to wait him over: but approaching to land at Dover, the Duke of Gloucester, with a company of Gentlemen, having their swords drawn, stepped up to the knees in water, saying to him, That if he came as the King's friend, he should be welcome; but if as claiming any jurisdiction, they would resist him: whereupon the Emperour renounceth all Imperial Authority; and is thereupon admitted to land, and received with as much honour as could be done him; and afterward together with Albert Duke of Holland, who was lately likewise arrived at Winchester, is elected Companion of the Order of the Garter, and fate in their Cels at the solemnity of the Feast. A principal cause of the Emperours coming, was to mediate a peace between England and France; wherein he had brought King Henry to a good degree of inclination; till news came of the besieging of Harflew by the French, and of the Earl of Arminiack setting upon the Duke of Excester, being Governor there: and then he presently grew so averse from Peace, that he would hearken no more to any Treaty of it. Not that he disliked they should treat of Peace with their swords in their hands, as all wise men would do; but that to great of Peace, and in the time of the Treaty to do acts of Hostility, was an affront to all honesty, and not to be tolerated with any patience.

And now the Earl of Arminiack having set down before the Town, the Vice-Admiral of France brought up the whole Navie of the French, with intent whilst the Earl should assail it by land, to have entred the Town by the waters side: but of this purpose, the valour and diligence of the Duke of Excester prevented them. As soon as King Henry had intelligence hereof, he would presently have gone himself; but being dissuaded by the Emperour, he sent his brother the Duke of Bedford, with the Earls of March, Oxford, Huntington, Warwick, Arundell, Salisbury, Devonshire, and divers others, with two hundred Sail, to the rescue of Harflew; who upon the Feast of the Assumption of our Lady, came to the mouth of the River Seine: whereupon, Norbon the French Admiral set forward, and got the mouth of the Haven: and here began a fight, which was resolutely maintained on both sides, until the English having sunk five hundred Vessels one and other of the French, and taken three great Carricks of Genova, won the Harbour, and at last, though with some opposition made by their Gallies, relieved Harflew, and made the Earl of Arminiack glad to raise his siege. Upon the news hereof, the Emperour desisted from mediating any further for peace with France; and entering into a league defensive and offensive with King Henry, wherein only the Pope was excepted, on the 19 of October he departed towards Germany, whom King Henry accompanied to Callice, whither the Duke of Burgundie came to confirm the League concluded on before by the Earl of Warwick and him, concerning Flanders and Artois only. In the mean time the French had hired divers Carricks and other great Ships of the Genovese and Italians, which joyning with the French Fleet, lay at the mouth of the River of Seine, under the command of Jaques Baltard of Bourbon, to hinder all succours from coming to Harflew; but John Earl of Huntington (son to the Duke of Excester beheaded at Chichester) being sent to scowr the coasts, encountered with him, and after a long fight, took him Prisoner, and three of his great Carricks, with all the money for the half years pay of the Fleet, and sinking three other of his Carricks, and dispersing the rest, cleared the mouth of the River, and then returned to the King at Southampton. And now upon the twenty third of July, in the fourth year of his reign, the King himself, with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, the Earls of Huntington, Warwick, Devonshire, Salisbury, Suffolk and Somerset, the Lords Ruffe, Willoughby, Fitz-Hugh, Clynton, Serpes, Matrevers, Bowchier, Ferrers of Croby, Ferrers of Charlsey, Fanhope, Grey of Cadnor, Sir Gilbert Umphreville, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and an Army consisting of twenty five thousand five hundred twenty eight fighting men, besides a thousand Artificers and Pyoners, took shipping at Rosfworth, and upon the first of August landed in Normandy near to the Castle of Tongue, which he presently besieged, and upon the ninth of August had it yielded to him, at which time the Earl of Salisbury, took the Castle of Alvervillers which the King gave to him and to his heirs, being the first land given by the King in France.

At the winning of Tongue, the King made eight and twenty Knights; and from thence Marched with his Army to Caen; where to prevent the Citizens from falling out, he cast up a Mount; and

A and then making many assaults, but finding them to do little good, he caused his Pyoners to undermine the walls: which being done, upon the fourth of September, he offered the Besieged their lives, if they would submit: which they refusing, he thereupon made a shew of a general assault, whilst many of his men entred the City under the foundation, of whom the Duke of Clarence with his Company was the first: and they coming upon the backs of those that defended the walls, easily overcame them; and then the whole Army entred without resistance. The next day, the King caused all the principal men of the Town to come before him at their Senate house; where some of them, for their stubborn refusing the grace he had offered them, were adjudged to death, and the rest fined: the spoil of the Town was distributed amongst the souldiers. The Captain of the Castle stood out a while; but being advertised that the King had sworn to shew no mercy, if he did not surrender; he gave twelve Hostages, that if it were not relieved before the twentieth of September, he would then give it up; which not coming he performed: and so the King had possession both of Caen and the Castle.

And now Charles the new Dauphin, being but seventeen years of age and bare of money, had got into his possession all the Jewels, Plate, and Money of the Queen his Mother; which he incensed her against him, that to do him a spite, she placed the Duke of Burgundie in chief authority about the King, who by reason of his infirmity, was unable himself to manage the State; and the Duke having now the Sword in his hand, meant first to repress the growing boldness of the Dauphin, and afterward to repel the common Enemy: and the Dauphin likewise, envying the Dukes advancement above him, meant first to take down his swelling greatness, and afterward to fall upon the foreign Adversary; and thus while private respects were preferred before publick, whilst the Duke and the Dauphin had their first intentions one against another, not looking after King Henry, but in the second place, after their own turns served, an easie way was left for King Henry's proceedings, and he went on at his pleasure with small opposition. He sent the Duke of Clarence, who took in the City of Bayeux, as likewise the Duke of Gloucester the City of Lisieux; whilst himself remaining still at Caen, put out of the City the natives that were impotent or young infants, to the number of 1500. and in their places put English people, and finding a great mass of Money and Plate, deposited by the Citizens in the Castle, he caused the same upon proof, to be respectively delivered to the right owners, upon condition they would acknowledge him for their Sovereign; which moderate and just dealing won him more hearts then the force of his arms had won him knees, specially with the Normans, who are easier to be drawn with gentleness and love, then forced by violence and compulsion. From hence the King Marched the first of October to Corfys Castle, which within three dayes yielded. The fourth of October he came to Argentan, which not relieved by a day agreed upon, was likewise surrendered. The Town of Alanson endured eight dayes siege, but in the end did as other their neighbour Towns had done. From Alanson the Earl of Salisbury was sent to Fayles, to view the strength thereof, whom the King presently followed, where the besieged concluded, if it were not relieved before the second of January, then to yield up the Town: no relief coming, the Town was yielded up, and soon after upon the like terms, the Castle. From hence the King returned to Caen, to put in execution a Proclamation he had formerly made; That if the Inhabitants of Normandy that were fled, returned not by a day assigned, he would then grant their Lands to his souldiers: and thereupon he gave to the Duke of Clarence during life, the Vicounties of Auge, Orver and Pontieu, with all the Lands of those that were not returned according to the Proclamation. All the Lent the King lay at Bayeux, whilst his Navie still kept the Seas, and daily took many French ships, but on the sixteenth of July, such a Tempest took them, that they were driven to fall in with Southampton; and yet, with all their diligence, could not so save themselves, but that two Ballingers, and two great Carricks laden with Merchandize were in the very Haven drowned. In the mean time the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Talbot besieged the strong Castle of Damfront: the Duke of Clarence took Conrton and Burney; and many other being taken, as Chambais, Bechelounyn, Harcourt, Fantgernon, Crevener, Avoyillers, Bagles, in all of them he placed Captains and Garisons, and particularly in Fresny, Sir Robert Brent, lately made Viscount: The Duke of Gloucester also, with the Earl of March, and the Lord of Cadnor, took in all the Isle of Constantine, except Chereburg, and then returned to the King, but was sent back to take in that City also; which after some time, when no relief came, was, together with the Castle, likewise surrendered; although by this time the Duke of Burgundie and the Dauphin, by mediation of the Pope, were reconciled and began to joyn their Forces to make resistance. And now the Duke of Excester the Kings Uncle, with a supply of fifteen thousand men out of England, came to the King, who presently took in the City of Encreux; and the Earl of Ryme, the strong Castle of Mille le Vesco.

The next thing attempted, was the siege of Roan, a City strongly fortified, both with walls and ditches; and to which there was no convenient passage, but by the City of Lovies: to this City therefore he first lays siege, which when relief came not within a time agreed on, was surrendered; and yet there was another impediment to be removed, a stone-bridge, which hindered the approach to Roan, being exceeding strongly guarded: For this, King Henry devised floats of wicker covered with beatts hides, by which the Duke of Clarence with his quarter passed the River, and then laid siege to the Town on that side; and for the other side, he had other devices made with hogheads and pipes, fastned to firpoles and Barges, with which he passed his men over at pleasure; and in the mean time he caused divers of his souldiers that could swim, to make shew of of passing the River three three miles off another way, with which the French men being deluded, drew all their forces thither, and by this means the Fort being left unfurnished of sufficient guard, was presently forced to surrender, and the soldiers were taken to the Kings grace. The Bridge being thus gained, the Duke of Excester was sent, and with him winifor the Herald, to summon the Citizens to surrender the Town; who not only gave proud answers, but also made a fally forth, though with the loss of thirty of their men. Upon this obstinacy of theirs, the King presently orders his siege; his own quarter was the Charente, the Duke of Clarence at S. Gerways, the Duke of Excester at Port St. Dennis, and every great Commander had his quarter assigned; so as the City was besieged round, and a great chain of Iron set upon pikes, and a strong wooden Bridge for passage from one Camp to the other, was made over the River. At this time the Earl of Kilmarney with sixteen hundred Irish, came to the King, and had their quarter assigned them, who behaved themselves with great valour. The Kings Cousin german, the King of Portugal, sent likewise a Navy of Ships to the mouth of the River of Seyne, which stopped all passage of succour to Roan; many policies and practices were used against the City, but none prevailed, till famine forced it; for there being in Roan 21000 persons at the beginning of the siege, and the siege continuing long, it grew to that extremity; that the Citizens drank nothing but vinegar and water, and had little to eat but Rats and Mice, Cats and Dogs, and such like. Great numbers of the poorer fort were thrust out of the City, who not suffered to pass the English Army, miserably perished; only upon Christmas-day, in honour of Christs birth, the King relieved and suffered to pass as many as were at first put out, but not others that were put out the second time, but suffered them to perish.

In this distress, a Parley is required by the Citizens; who notwithstanding their misery, yet stood upon such high terms, that nothing was concluded, only a Truce for eight days was granted them; the eight days ended, and nothing yet agreed upon amongst themselves; they crave one day longer, and neither in that day could any thing be agreed on; then they crave four days more, in which the multitude and common people so pressed the Magistrates, and Governours of the City that on the fourth day, being about the nineteenth of January, the City was surrendered, and the Inhabitants themselves, and all their goods were yielded to the Kings mercy; the Duke of Excester was appointed to take possession, who accordingly entered with his soldiers. The next day after being Friday the twentieth of January, the King himself made his entry, with four Dukes, ten Earls, eight Bishops, sixteen Barons, and others, and was by the Clergy conducted to our Lady Church; where after publick thanksgiving, he took Homage and Fealty of the Burgeses and Inhabitants; making Proclamation, that all that would come and acknowledge him to be their Sovereign, should enjoy the benefit of his Protection, and retain their possessions; whereupon many came in, and many Towns were surrendered. In this time of the Kings lying at Roan, the Earl of Salisbury took in Hunfey, Munster de Villiers, Ewe, and Newcastle; the Duke of Clarence took Vernon, and Namur; and the Earl of Warwick, la Roche Guyon.

And now the Duke of Burgundy seeing the great successes of King Henry, could think of no better way for his own safety, then to make a reconciliation between the two Kings; to which end, Ambassadors are sent to procure their meeting; at which time, King Henry for their service already performed, and in hope of more hereafter, made the valiant Gascogne Captain le Buff, Earl of Longueville, Sir John Gray Earl of Tankerville, and the Lord Boncher Earl of Ewe. Upon the last of May, King Henry accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence, Gloucester, and Excester, his Uncle Beaufort, the Bishop of Winchester, with the Earls of March, and Salisbury, and a thousand men at Arms, entered the place appointed for the meeting of the two Kings. The French Queen (her Husband being taken with the frenzy) with the Duke of Burgogne, and the Earl of St. Paul, and a company of Ladies; amongst whom, as a bait to intangle the Kings affection, was the Kings Daughter, the beautiful Lady Katherine; with whose sight, though the King was marvelously taken, yet he made no shew thereof; till other things should be agreed upon; but the Dauphin having made means to the Duke of Burgogne to hinder all agreement, nothing was effected; whereupon at their parting, the King told the Duke, that he would have both the Lady, and all his other Demands, or else drive the King of France out of his Kingdom, and him out of his Dukedom: Upon this, the Duke thought it best to agree with the Dauphin, and upon this, the sixth of July, Articles of their reconciliation are signed and sealed; In the mean time, the Earl of Longueville surprized the Town of Pontboise, but had scarce been able to make good the surprize, if the Duke of Clarence had not come to his succour; from thence the Duke marched to Paris, and there stayed two days; but perceiving no shew of fally to be made, he returned to Pontboise; whither the King himself came; and from thence marching on, took in the Cattle of Vaynon Villiers; and on the last of August, the Castles of Gisors and Galyard, and Dumilly; so that now all Normandy (Moun St. Michael only excepted) was reduced to the possession of the King of England, which had been wrongfully detained from him, ever since the year 1207.

The Dauphin all this while, though outwardly having made a reconciliation with the Duke of Burgogne, yet inwardly bearing a spleen against him, intended nothing so much as his destruction; which to effect, he procured a meeting between the Duke and him, and all the Peers of the Realm at Monstreyn; where the Duke though humbling himself in reverence to the Dauphin on his knee, was most barbarously murdered; which act, was so much the less to be pitied in the Duke, by how much in the like kind, upon the like interview, he had caused Levis the Duke

A meeting for reconciliation appointed between the two Kings of England and France.

The Duke of Burgogne treacherously murdered by the Dauphin.

A of Orleanse to be murdered. But though this barbarous act might justly incense Philip Earl of Carlois the Duke of Burgogne; Heir to seek revenge; yet as a wife and politic Prince, he forbore for the apy present, to make shew of color or dilttemperature; and considering with himself, that difference between the Dauphin and him, would but give King Henry the greater advantage, he endeavoured to propose an overture of peace between the two Kings; And to that end, Ambassadors are sent from the King of France, and the young Duke of Burgign, whom the King kindly entertained, but seemed to intimate unto them, that he could give no great credit to their propositions, unless the Lady Katherine would joyn in them, whose innocence he knew would never abuse him. Whilst these things are in agitation, the Earl of Salisbury took in Fresnes, and the Earls Marshall and Huntington entered into Mayn, who approaching Meun, was encountered by the Forces of the Dauphin, whereof they slew five thousand, and took two hundred prisoners; for which, news he brought to Roan, whither King Henry was come so solemnize the Feast of Christs Birth, thanksgiving to God, was publicly made; and in the instant thereof, arrived other Ambassadors from the King and Queen of France, and a letter from the Lady Katherine to King Henry, was secretly by the Bishop of Arras delivered; The conclusion of all was, that the King of England should speed himself to Troyes, there to be espoused to the Lady Katherine, and to have assurance of the Crown of France, after the decease of the present King Charles; Whereupon with a Guard of fifteen thousand choice soldiers, accompanied with the Duke of Clarence and Glocester, the Earls of Warwick, Salisbury, Huntington, Longueville, Tankerville, Ewe, and Ewe; the King of England came to Troyes in Champaign, upon the 18. day of May, where he was met by the Duke of Burgogne, and divers of the French Nobility, who attended him to the Palace, where the Queen with her Daughters, the Dukes of Burgign, and the Lady Katherine, gave him Princely entertainment; and after some intercoure of complement between the Princes & the Ladies, King Henry tendered to the Lady Katherine, a Ring of great value, which she (not without some blushing) received; and afterward, upon the twentieth day of May, she was affianced to him in St. Peters Church, and on the third of June following, the marriage was solemnized; and therewithal King Henry was published to be the only Regent of the Realm and Heir apparent to the Crown of France, the Articles whereof, with all convenient expedition were Proclaimed both in England and in France, and the two Kings, and all their Nobles, and other Subjects of account, were sworn to observe them; and in particular the Duke of Burgogne.

And thus was the Salique Law violated, and the Heir Male put by, his succession in the Crown, which the Genius of France will not long endure, a while it must; and therefore the main endeavour of both Kings now is, to keep him down, whom they had put down; and thereupon, on the fourth day of June, King Henry with the French King, James King of Scots, who was newly arrived, the Duke of Burgogne, the Prince of Orange, one and twenty Earls, five and forty Barons, with many Knights and Gentlemen, and an Army consisting of French, English, Scotch, Irish, and Dutch, to the number of six hundred thousand, marched towards the Dauphin; and upon the seventh day, laid siege to the Town of Seins, which sided with the Dauphin, which after four dayes siege was yielded up. From thence they removed, having the Duke of Bedford in their company, who was newly come out of England, with large supplies of men and money, to Montfresan; which was taken by Escalado, only the Castle held out till; during the siege whereof, King Henry, created an Officer of Arms, to be King of Heralds over the English men, and intrusted him Garter; whom he sent with offers of mercy to the Castle, but was by the Captain thereof reproachfully upbraided; for punishment of which his presumption, a Gibbet was erected, and in view of Mounseur Guitrey, the said Captain, twelve of his friends were executed; whereupon those of the Castle treated for Peace; but the King in eight dayes together, would not grant so much as a parley; so that after six weeks siege, they were enforced, (their lives saved) simply to yield. From thence the King marched to Meun upon Seins, and belleged it the thirtieth of July, the Captain whereof was Barbusin a Gascogne, no less politic then valiant, who countermined some, and stopt other Mines made by the English, and fought hand to hand in the Barriers with King Henry; yet at last through Famine and Pettilence was forced to yield; but being suspected to have had a hand in the murder of the Duke of Burgogne, he was sent prisoner to Paris; and presently thereupon, both the Kings with their Queens, the Duke of Burgign and his Dutcheis, with a Royal Train came thither, where the French King was lodged in the house of S. Paul, and the King of England in the Cattle of Lomvre. And here the three States of France anew under their hands and seals in most authentick manner, ratified the former Articles of King Henries Succession in the Crown of France; the Instruments whereof were delivered to the King of England, who sent them to be kept in his Treasury at Westminster.

And now King Henry began to exercise his Regency, and as a badge of his Authority, he caused a new Coyn which was called a Salute, to be made; whereupon the Arms of France and England were quarterly stamped; he placed and displaced divers Officers, and appointed the Duke of Excester with five hundred men, to the Guard of Paris; He awarded our Proccels against the Dauphin, to appear at the Marble-Table at Paris, which he not obeying, Sentence was denounced against him, as guilty of the murder of the Duke of Burgogne, and by the sentence of the Parliament, he was banished the Realm.

After this, the King making Thomas Duke of Clarence his Lieutenant General of France and Normandy; on the 6. of January, with his beloved Queen Katherine he left Paris; and went to Amiens, and from thence to Callice; and thence landing at Dover, came to Canterbury, and afterward ward through London to Westminster, where the Queen upon St. Matthews day, the fourth of February, was Crowned; the King of Scots sitting at dinner in his State, but on the left hand of the Queen, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Kings Uncle the Bishop of Winchester being on the right hand. All were served with covered messes of Silver, but all the Feast was Fish, in observance of the Lent season.

After this, the King took his progress through the Land, hearing the complaints of his poor Subjects, and taking order for administering of Justice to high and low; and then met the Queen at Leicester, where they kept their Easter.

The Duke of Clarence by treachery slain;
with divers
others.

In the mean time, the Duke of Clarence making a Road into Anjou, came to the City of Amers, where he knighted Sir William Rosse, Sir Henry Goddard, Sir Rowland Wyder, Sir Thomas Beauford his natural Son; and returning home laden with prey, was advertised that the Duke of Anjou intended to intercept his passage; whereupon he sent the Scout-master, Andrew Fagosa, a Lombard, to discover the face of the Enemy; who being corrupted, brought report that their number was but small, and those but ill ordered, that if he presently charged there could be no resistance. The Dukes Credulity caused him to draw all his Horses together, and leaving his Bows and Bills behind, which were his chiefest strength, with his Horse only he makes towards the Enemy; but the Traitor leading to a straight, whereby his appointment an Ambush was laid, that the Duke could neither retreat, nor flee; he soon perceived the Treachery, but finding no remedy, he manfully set spurs to his Horse, and charged upon the Enemy; but overlaid with multitude, and wearied with fight, was himself, with the Earl of Tankerville, the Lord Rosse, the Earl of Angus, Sir John Lumley, Sir John Vere, and above two thousand English slain; The Earls of Somerset, Suffolk, and Pearch, Sir John Berkley, Sir Ralph Nevil, Sir William Boni, and 60. Gentlemen were taken prisoners: The body of the Duke of Clarence, was by Sir John Beauford his base Son, (the Duke dying without other Issue) convey'd into England, and buried at Canterbury besides his Father: and this disaster happened upon Easter-Eve. The King was at Beverley when he heard of his brothers death, and presently thereupon dispatched away Edmund Earl of Mortaigne into Normandy, making him Lieutenant thereof; and then calls his high Court of Parliament to Westminster, requiring aid by money, to revenge his brothers death, which was readily granted, and the King thus provided, sent his Brother the Duke of Bedford with an Army consisting of four thousand men at Arms, and four and twenty thousand Archers, whom about the middle of May he followeth himself, and safely arriving at Calice, halted to relieve the Dauphin with seven thousand men had besieged; but hearing of the Kings Changers, which the Dauphin with seven thousand men had besieged; but hearing of the Kings coming, was retired to Tours. The King of Scots, with the Duke of Gloucester, about the eighth of July besieged Dreux; which agreed, if it werenot relieved by the twentieth of that month, then to surrender it; no relief coming, it was surrendered. The King pursued the Dauphin from place to place, but could not overtake him, but in the way surprized the Town of Bagency, where place to place, but could not overtake him, but in the way surprized the Town of Bagency, where all that craved it, he took to mercy, as likewise he did at Romgemont; from thence he went to Orleans, and from thence to Vignes St. Ton, and from thence to Paris; where having fitted himself with supplies, he went and fate down before Menise in Brye, which after some opposition, he also took; and thereby had possession of all the Fortresses in the Isle of France, in Lorraine, in Brye, and in Champaigne.

Queen Katherine is brought to bed of a son at Windsor; and King Henries Prophecetical speech of him. King Henry with over-hasty journeys in France, falls sick and dies.

His exhortations to his Lords at his death.

Upon St. Nicholas day, in the year 1422. Queen Katherine was brought to bed of a Son at Windsor, who was by the Duke of Bedford and Henry Bishop of Winchester, and the Countess of Holland Christened by the name of Henry; whereof, when the King had notice, out of a Prophecetick rapture he said; Good Lord! I Henry of Monmouth shall small time reign, and much get, and Henry born at Windsor shall long time reign and lose all, but Gods will be done.

About this time the Dauphin laid siege to Cosney, which the King was intente to relieve, as being a Town of the Duke of Burgoyne's; and therefore tendred it more then if it had been his own; and making over hasty journeys, he over-heat himself with travel; and coming to Senlis, found himself so ill at ease, that he was forced to remain there, and to send his Brother the Duke of Bedford to prosecute his design, which the Duke performed, and the Dauphin upon his approach, retired into Berry; whereof in mockage he was after called the King of Berry. But the Kings Fever and Flux increasing, he was removed to Boys de Vincens; where growing worse and worse, within a few days he dyed. But somewhat before his departure, he had made his Brother the Duke of Bedford Lieutenant General of Normandy, and Regent of the Kingdom of France, and his Brother the Duke of Gloucester, he had made Protector of England, and of his Sons person. Exhorting all to be true and faithful to the Duke of Burgoyne, to be at unity amongst themselves, to be loyal to their young Prince, to be serviceable to his dearly beloved Queen, to hold and preserve what he by his valour, and Gods assistance had won; and never to conclude contract of amity with the Dauphin or Duke of Anjou, until they had submitted themselves to the Kings Grace. And so giving God thanks for all his favours and blessings bestowed upon him, in the midst of saying a Psalm of David, he departed this life; who might have justly prayed God with David, Take me not away in the midst of my dayes, for he dyed about the age of five or six and thirty years, which in Davids account is the midst of the number of the days of mans life: but though he dyed in the midst of his days, yet he dyed in the fulness of his Glory; and of whom it may be said, --- Jamq; arce positus, Ridet anhelantes duri ad fastigia montis: When he had reigned nine years and five months.

Of his Taxations.

IN his first year, an incredible sum of money was given him by the Clergy; to divert him from a motion propounded to take away their Temporalities: And in the same year a Subsidy was granted him both by the Clergy and the Laity. In his fourth year was granted him, towards his wars in France, two whole Tenths of the Clergy; and a Fifteenth of the Laity; which being far too short to defray his great charge, he was forced to pawn his Crown to the Bishop of Beauford his Uncle for a great sum of money, as also certain Jewels to the Lord Maior of London, for renthousand Marks. In his ninth year a Parliament at Westminster, for revenge of the Duke of Clarence death, two Tenths of the Clergy, and one Fifteenth of the Laity, which because the half of the business could not stay the usual course of collection, the Bishop of Winchester brought in presently twenty thousand pounds, to receive it again when the Subsidy should be gathered. The same year also the Duke of Bedford in the Kings absence called a Parliament, wherein was granted towards his wars, one Fifteenth to be paid in such money as was at that time current. These are all the Subsidies that were given him, notwithstanding his many and great Atchievements, by which it appears what great matters a moderate Prince may do, and yet not grieve his Subjects with Taxations.

King Henry pawneth his Crown to raise money.

Of Lawes and Ordinances made by him, or in his time.

HE ordained the King of Heralds over the English, which is called Garter. In his ninth year, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, it was ordained that no man should offer Gold in payment, unless it were weight; and thereupon were appointed ballances and weights.

No gold to be offered in payment unless it were weight, and thereupon weights ordained.

An Act made in the thirteenth year of King Richard the second, which disabled the Alien Religious to enjoy any Benefices within England, was in the beginning of this Kings Reign put in execution: and further, this King excluded also the French from all preferment Ecclesiastical; and those Priors Aliens Conventual, who had institution and induction, were bound to put in security, not to disclose, or cause to be disclosed, the Counsell and secrets of the Realm.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN the beginning of his Reign, the Wickliffes increased greatly, of whom Sir John Oldcastle was chief; who by marriage of a kinswoman of the Lord Cobham of Cooling in Kent, obtained that Title: this Knight being very valorous, and in great favour with the King, was in a Synod at London accused for maintaining of Wickliffes doctrine: whereof the King being informed, sent for him, and instantly dealt with him to submit himself to the censure of the Church: But Sir John Oldcastle told the King, that he owed his subjection only to his Majesty; and as for others, he would stand for the truth against them, to the uttermost of his life. Upon this, he was served by Process to appear in the Archbishops Court; and not appearing, was condemned of Contumacy, and afterwards in a Synod at Rochester, was by the Archbishop pronounced to be an Heretic; who then enacted that Decree, That the holy Scriptures ought not to be translated into the English Tongue: But mark the judgement that fell upon his own tongue, whose roots and blade shortly after (as is recorded) grew to big in his mouth and throat, that he could neither speak, nor swallow down meat, but in horror lay languishing, till at last starved by famine, he dyed. In the mean time, Sir John Oldcastle wrote his Belief, and presented it himself to the King; which the King would in no wise receive, but suffered him, in his presence and Privy Chamber to be summoned; who appearing before the Archbishop, after divers examinations, he was condemned of Heresie, and committed to the Tower of London, from whence shortly after he escaped, and got into Wales. The King by his Proclamation, promised a thousand Marks to any that should bring him in: but so much was his Doctrine generally favoured, that the Kings offer was not much regarded, but he continued four years after undiscovered: At last he was taken in the Borders of Wales, within a Lordship belonging to the Lord Powys, who brought him to London, before the Duke of Bedford Regent of the Realm; where in the end he was condemned, and finally was drawn from the Tower to St. Giles field, and there hanged in a Chain by the middle, and after consumed with fire, the Gallows and all. At the time of his first conviction, four years before, it was rumoured, that twenty thousand men in Arms were assembled in St. Giles field; whereupon the King, at midnight, himself in person went thither, where he found many indeed, who upon examination confessed, that they came to meet their Captain Sir John Oldcastle, but without any intent against the King: yet was Sir Roger Aston, and eight and twenty others of them apprehended, and executed in Smithfield; and all the Prisons in and about London were filled with them.

Sir John Oldcastle censured for maintaining Wickliffes doctrine.

A judgement of God upon the Archbishop of Canterbury, for denying the Scriptures to be translated into English.

Sir John Oldcastle condemned of Heresie: is hanged in St. Giles field, in a chain by the middle.

In his third year, the order of Church service throughout England, was changed from the use of Pauls to the use of Salisbury, to the great disliking of many in those daies.

In his fourth year, a Council was holden at Constance, whither he sent Ambassadors, the Earl of Warwick, the Bishops of Salisbury, Bath, and Hereford, the Abbot of Westminster, and the Prior of Worcester: In which Council it was decreed, that England should have the title of the English Nation, and should be accounted one of the five principal Nations in rank before Spain; which often before had been moved, but never granted till then. And herein were all Wickliff's positions condemned: Also John Huffle, and Hierome of Prague (notwithstanding the Emperours safe conduct) were both of them burned. In this Council, the Schism of Anti-Popes, which had continued the space of nine and twenty years, was reformed: Benedict the 13. had been elected by the Spaniard; Gregory the 12. by the French; John the 24. by the Italians: And now elected by this Council, begun in February, 1414. and continued above three years, wherein were assembled, besides the Emperour, the Pope, and the Palgrave of Rhein, four Patriarchs, twenty seven Cardinals, seven and forty Archbishops, one hundred and threescore Bishops, Princes and Barons with their attendants, above thirty thousand; The aforesaid elected Popes were all put down, or else resigned; and in the place, as legitimate Pope, was elected Otho Colonna by the name of Martin the fifth.

In this year also, fell out an Accident, which shews the strict observance of Ecclesiastical censures in those daies. The wives of the Lord Strange, and Sir John Trussell of Warrington in Cheshire, striving for place at a Sermon in St. Dunstons Church in the East, their husbands being present, fell themselves to striving in their wives behalf, and great part-taking there was on both sides, some slain, and many wounded: The delinquents were committed to the Counter, the Church suspended; and upon examination, the Lord Strange being found guilty, was by the Archbishop of Canterbury adjudged to this Penance, which was accordingly performed: The Parson of St. Dunstons went before, after whom followed all the Lords servants in their shirts; after them went the Lord himself, bare-headed, with a Wax Taper in his hand; then followed the Lady, bare-footed; and then last, came the Archdeacon Reynold Renwood: in which order they went from Pauls, where the sentence was given, to St. Dunstons Church; where at the re-hallowing thereof, the Lady filled all the Vessels with water, and according to the sentence, offered to the Altar an ornament of the value of ten pounds; and the Lord a Pixe of silver of five pounds. A Penance, no doubt, which the Lord and the Lady would have redeemed with a great deal of money, if the Discipline of the Church had in those daies allowed it: but it seems the commutation of Penance was not as yet come in use.

In his ninth year, in a Parliament at Leicester, a hundred and ten Priories alien were suppressed, because they spoke ill of his Conquests in France; and their possessions were given to the King: but by him, and King Henry the sixth, were afterward given to other Monasteries, and Colleges of learned men.

Works of Piety by him, or others in his time.

His King re-edified his Royal Manour, which was then called Sheene, now Richmond, and founded two Monasteries not far from it; the one of Carthusians, which he named Bethlehem; the other of Religious men and women of the Order of St. Bridget, which he named Sion: He also founded the Brotherhood of Saint Giles without Cripple-gate in London. In the second year of his reign, Moor-gate neer to Colmansstreet was first made, by Thomas Faskener Maier of London, who caused also the ditches of the City to be cleaned, and a common Privy that was on the Moore without the wall, to be taken down, and another to be made within the City upon Walbrook, into the which Brook he caused the water of the City to be turned by grates of Iron, in divers places. In his sixth year, Williams of Sevenoak Maier of London, founded in the Town of Sevenoak a Free School, and thirteen Alms-houses. This man was found at Sevenoak in Kent, a new born Infant of unknown Parents, but by charitable people was Christened and brought up bound Prentice in London, and came at last to be Maier of the City. Also Robert Chicheley Maier of London gave liberally to the Alms-houses founded by his brother Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury, at Higham Ferrers in Northamptonshire, where they were born. But Henry Chicheley the Archbishop founded two Colleges in Oxford; one called Bernard Colledge, renewed by Sir Thomas White, and named St. Johns Colledge, the other called All-Souls, which continueth to this day as he left it. Also John Kempe Archbishop of Canterbury, converted the Parish-Church of Wyke in Kent, where he was born, into a Colledge of Secular Priests.

Casualties happening in his time.

In the fifth year of his reign, a great part of the City of Norwich was burnt, with all the houses of the Friars Preachers, and two Friars of that Order. In his third year, on the Feast of the Purification, seven Dolphins came up the River of Thames, whereof four were taken.

Of his Wife and Issue.

He married Katherine the Daughter of King Charles the sixth of France, who was his Queen two years and about three moneths, married at Troyes in Champagne the third day of June, 1420. and afterward February the fourteenth Crowned at Westminster: She surviving King Henry, was re-married to Owen Tudor an Elg of Wales, who pretended to be descended from Cadwallader the ancient King of Wales, though some write him to be the Son of a Brewer, whose meannefs of estate was recompensed by the delicacy of his personage; so absolute in all the lineaments of his body, that the only contemplation of it might well make her forget all other circumstances; by him she had three Sons, Edmund, Jasper, and Owen, and a Daughter that lived but a while. Her Son Owen took the habit of Religion at Westminster, the other two were by King Henry the sixth (their half-brother) advanced in honour: Edmund was created Earl of Richmond, and marrying the sole heir of John Beaufort Earl of Somerset, was Father by her, unto Henry the seventh, King of England, the only heir of the House of Lancaster. Jasper her second Son was first created Earl of Pembroke, and after Duke of Bedford, but dyed without lawful Issue. This Queen, either for devotion, or her own safety, took into the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwark, who dying the second of January, 1436. she was buried in our Ladies Chappel within St. Peters Church at Westminster, whose Corps taken up in the reign of King Henry the seventh, her Grand-child, (when he laid the Foundation of that admirable structure) and her Coffin placed by King Henry her Husbands Tombe, hath ever since remained, and never since re-buried, where it standeth (the cover being loofe) to be seen and handled of any that will. By her King Henry had only one Son, named Henry, who succeeded him in the Kingdom.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

He was tall of stature, lean of body, and his bones but small, but strongly made, somewhat long necked, black haired, and very beautiful of face, swift in running, so as he with two of his Lords, without bow or other engine, would take a wild Buck or Dow in a large Park: He delighted in Songs and Musical Instruments, insomuch that in his Chappel amongst his private Prayers, he used certain Psalms of David translated into English Meeter by John Lydgat Monk of Bury. And indeed it may be truly said of him as was said of Aeneas: Quo iussit alter, Nec pietate fuit, nec bello major & armis; For he seldom fought battel where he got not the victory; and never got victory whereof he gave not the glory to God, with publick Thanksgiving. He was a better man, a King, then a Subject; for till then he was not in his right Orb, and therefore no marvel if he were something exorbitant. He was of a merciful disposition, but not to the pretence of widom; as thinking wife cruelty to be better then foolish pity. He was no less politick then valiant, for he never fought battel, nor won Town, wherein he prevailed not as much by stratagem as by force. He was so temperate in his diet, and so free from vain glory, that we may truly say, he had something in him of Caesar which Alexander the Great had not, that he would not be drunk, and something of Alexander the Great, which Caesar had not, that he would not be flattered. He was indeed a great affecter of Glory, but not of the Glory the blatt of mens mouths, but of the Glory that fills the sails of Time. He dyed of full years, though not full of years: if he had lived longer, he might have gone over the same again, but could not have gone further. If his love were great to Military men, it was not small to Clergy men, insomuch as by many he was called the Prince of Priests.

Priests.

Of his Death and Burial.

Some say he was poysoned, which Polydore Virgil saith was much suspected. The Scots write that he died of the disease called St. Piacre, which is a Palsie and a Cramp: Enguerant saith that he died of St. Anthonies fire: But Peter Basset Esquire, who at the time of his death was his Chamberlain, affirmeth that he died of a Pleurisie, which at that time was a sickness strange and but little known. Being dead, his body was embalmed and clofed in lead; and laid in a Chariot Royal richly apparelled in cloth of Gold, was conveyed from Boys de Vincennes to Paris, and so to Roan, to Abbeville, to Callice, to Dover, and from thence through London to Westminster, where it was interred next beneath King Edwards the Confessour; upon whose Tombe Queen Katherine caused a Royal picture to be laid, covered all over with silver Plate gilt, but the head thereof altogether of massive silver: all which at that Abbies suppression were sacrilegiously broken off and transferred to prophaner uses. He died the last day of August, in the year one thousand four hundred twenty two, when he had reigned nine years and five moneths, lived eight and thirty years; though some say, two years fewer.

Also Titus Livius de Foro Livis, an Italian born, but seeing he was resident here, and wrote the life of this King, it is not unfit to make mention of him in this place: also many others.

THE REIGN OF KING HENRY THE SIXTH.

Here hath been a Race of Princes, of which for three Generations together, it might be rightly said; Pulcherrima Proles; Magnanimi Heroes; nati melioribus Annis. For King Edward the Third had many Sons, not inferior in valor to the many Sons of King Priamus, not excepting his valiant Son  Hector, having fo equal a match for him as Edward the Black Prince, who wanted but an Homer, to have been an Achilles. Then John of Gaunt likewise had divers Sons, men as valorous as any that age afforded. Then Henry the Fourth had four Sons, of so heroical disposition all, that you might know them all to be his Sons, only King Henry the Fifth to be his eldest.

And now that in him the Heroical nature was come to the height, it degenerated again in King Henry the Sixth, which must needs be attributed to the Mothers side; who though in her self, she was a Princess of a noble spirit, yet being the issue of a crazie Father, what marvel, if she proved the Mother of a crazie Issue? and yet even this Issue of hers, a Prince no doubt, of excellent parts in their Kind, though not of parts kindly for a Prince; in a private man praiseworthy enough, but the Sword of a King required a harder metal than the soft temper of King Henry the Sixth was made of: and in him we may see the fulfilling of the Text; Va Genti cuius Rex est puer; Woe to that Nation whose King is a Child, for he was not above eight moneths old, when he succeeded his Father in the Kingdom; although that Text perhaps is not meant fo much of a child in years, for which there may be helps by good Protectors; as of a child in abilities of ruling; whereof, though possibly there may, yet probably there can be no sufficient supply: of which, in this King, we have a pregnant example; for as long as he continued a child in years, so long his Kingdoms were kept flourishing by the Providence of his careful Uncles; but as soon as he left being a Child in years, and yet continued a Child in ability of Ruling, then presently began all things In pejus ruere, & retro sublapsa referri, all things went to wrack both in France and England. And thus much was necessary to be said by way of a Preface to that great fall as it were of Nilus, in King Henry the Sixth.

Henry called of Windsor, because born there, the only child of King Henry the Fifth, as yet scarce nine moneths old, succeeded his Father, and was proclaimed King of England on the last of August, in the year 1422. by reason of whose Infancy, King Henry his Father had before, by his Will appointed, and now the Lords by their consent confirmed, the Regency of France to John Duke of Bedford, the Government of England, to Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, the Guard of his Person to Thomas Duke of Excester, and Henry Beauford Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Chancellor; wherein it was wisely provided that one man should not rule all, lest it should prove a spur to aspiring, and withall stay them from envying one another, when many were alike placed in the highest fourm of authority: and indeed they all carried themselves so uprightly and carefully in their places, that it well appeared the trust reposed in them by the dying King, had made a strong impression of love and loyalty towards his Son.

Anno Dom.

King Henry but eight moneths old when his father died.

John Duke of Bedford is appointed Regent of France, and Humphrey Duke of Gloucester Guardian of the Kings person.

Assistants to the Duke of Bedford.

The Dauphin Crowned King at Poitiers, and called Charles the seventh.

What assistance he had.

King Henry is proclaimed in Paris King of England and France.

The Duke of Bedford marries the Sister of the Duke of Burgoyne.

The Parisians aspiring are repelled by the Regent.

Tho. Montacute Earl of Salisbury defeats a great Army of the French.

1424.

James the first King of Scots, after 18 years imprisonment, is released, and the manner of doing his Homage.

The Regent gives the French a great overthrow at Vernoye.

The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, was to keep that by the sword, which King Henry the Fifth by his sword had gotten, wherein he had many and great assistants, specially the two brothers of France, Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, and John Lord Talbot; and amongst the French themselves, the Duke of Burgoyne, a friend no less powerful, then firm unto him. The Dauphin also (now Crowned King at Poitiers, and called Charles the seventh of France, his father being newly dead, within a little more then a month after King Henry) had likewise great assistants, the Duke of Alanson, and many other Peers of France, and of the Scots many, and some perhaps of the English that took part with him; by means whereof the game of Fortune was a long time played between them with great variety. The first act of the Duke of Bedford's Regency, was an Oration which he made to the French in Paris, which wrought this good effect; that King Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and such French Lords as were present did their Homages, and took their Oaths to be true unto him. The first act of hostility was performed by the new King of France, who sends the Lord Granville to Pont Melun, who surprized it, putting all the English Souldiers to the sword; but the Regent sending thither Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, so strongly beleaguered it, that the Lord Granville not only surrendered it, but swore Allegiance (though he kept it not) to the King of England. From thence the Earl marched to Seyne, which he took by assault; and put all the Souldiers (except the Captain Sir William Maryn) to the sword.

At this time the Regent, the Duke of Burgoyne, John Duke of Britain, and his Brother in law the Earl of Richmond, (who revolted afterward to the new King of France, and was by him made Countable of France) met at Amiens; and there not only renewed the old League, but further enlarged it, to the offensive and defensive respectively: and to make the friendship the more firm, the Regent married Anne the Sister of the Duke of Burgoyne at Troyes. In this mean time the Parisians taking advantage of the Regents absence, conspired to have let in the new King into Paris; but the day before the night appointed for his admission, the Regent with his power entered; apprehended the Conspirators, and put them to publick execution. That done, he furnished all the Forts, and places of strength with English men, and sent Sir John Falstaff, who took in Pacye, and Comfay, two strong Castles; whilst himself with his Forces took in Traynels, and Bray upon Seyne.

The Countable of France the mean while with the new Kings forces, laid siege to Cravant in Burgoyne; but the Regent sent thither the Earl of Salisbury, who set upon the French, and after a long fight, putting them to flight, slew about 1800 Knights and Gentlemen of note, and three thousand common Souldiers, Scots, and French, took prisoners the Countable himself, the Earl Ventadour, Sir Alexander Alerdyn, Sir Lewis Perigoyne, and two and twenty hundred Gentlemen. Of the English part, were slain Sir John Gray, Sir William Hall, Sir Gilbert Halfall, Richard ap Iddocke, and one and twenty hundred Souldiers. From thence the Earl led his forces to Montargis, and fate down before it, which after five monthes siege he took, whilst the Duke of Suffolk took in the two strong Castles of Corvey, and le Roche.

Whilst these things are done in France, in England the Protector ransomed and enlarged the young King of Scots, James the first; who by the space of eighteen years had been kept a Prisoner) which he did out of opinion, that he might withdraw the Scots out of France, taking Homage and fealty of him for the Crown of Scotland, in these words; I James Stuart, King of Scots, shall be true and faithful to you Lord Henry, King of England and France, the Superior Lord of Scotland, and to you I make my fidelity for the said Kingdome, which I hold and claim of you, and shall do you service for the same, so God me help, and these holy Evangelists; and therewithall, with consent of all the Nobility, the Protector gave him to Wife, Jane Daughter to the deceased Duke of Somerset, and Cousen german to the King, with a large Dowry, and married them at St. Mary Overies in Southwark; yet all this courtelie could keep him afterward from being unfaithful, and unthankful.

And now the Protector sent over to the Regent ten thousand well furnished souldiers with which fresh succour he won many Towns and places of strength: which the French seeing, and finding themselves too weak by plain force to withstand the English, they sought by subtilty to compass their ends; and first, they work upon the inconstancy of the Duke of Britain, and his Brother Arthur, by King Henry the fifth created Earl of Teyny, whom by gifts and promises they suborned, perfidiously to deliver over into their possession, the Castles of Crotroye, and Terney; but the English before the French Garrisons were settled, fell upon Crotroye and recovered it; and that done, the Regent besieged Terney, and by secret mining, and violent Batteries so shook the Walls, that they agreed to yield it up, if not relieved by a certain time: whereupon the Duke of Alanson with sixteen thousand French came to the rescue, but perceiving the English to be prepared to receive them, he wheeled about to Vernoye, and swore to the Townsmen that he had put the Regent to flight, and rescued Terney; which they believing, rendred up Vernoye to him: but the Regent followed him thither, when by the encouragement of some fresh Companies of Scots come to his succour he came to a battell in the field, where the English, with the loss of two thousand one hundred common souldiers, and two of the Nobility, the Lord Dudley, and the Lord Charleton; got the honour of the day, and slew of their enemies, five Earls, two Viscounts twenty Barons, and above seven thousand other of the French, besides two thousand seven hundred Scots lately arrived, and took Prisoners the Duke of Alanson himself, the Lord of Heryns, and divers other French, and Sir John Turnbull, and two hundred Gentlemen,

A men, besides common Souldiers. This battel was fought the eight and twentieth day of August, in the year 1424. and thereupon Vernoye was presently re-delivered. After this, the Earl of Salisbury with ten thousand men, taketh in the strong Town of Amiens, the Town of St. Sufan, the Fort of St. Bernard, and others; from thence he went to Anjou, where he performed such Heroick Acts, that his very name grew terrible in all France; as for instance the new High-Countable perfidious Richmond, with forty thousand men laid siege to the good Town of St. James in Benyon, the Garrison whereof consisted but of six hundred English, who being driven to some extremity, fallied forth, crying Saint George, a Salisbury; which word of Salisbury, so frightened the French, thinking he had been come to rescue them, that casting away their weapons, they ran all away, saving some few that yielded themselves Prisoners, leaving all their Tents, four-ten Pieces of Ordnance, forty Barrels of Powder, three hundred Pipes of Wine, much Armour and some Treasure behinde them. After which, other Castles, as that of Beaumont, of Vicount, Tenney, Gilly, Ofce, Rusey, Vassick, and many more were taken in by Sir John Mountgomerie, and Sir John Falstaff; so as once again the French are glad to betake themselves to their old course of fraud; they compounded with a Giscoign Captain for delivery of Alanson to them; whereof the Regent having notice, he sent the Lord Willoughby, and Sir John Falstaff to prevent it, who encountering with Charles de Villiers, that with two hundred Horse, and three hundred Foot, was come to the place appointed for entry, took and slew them all, except some few Horse which saved themselves by flying. After which, the Earl of Salisbury took in and demolished above forty Castles and strong Piles, for which there was publick thanksgiving to God in London.

C Whilst these things were done in France, an unkinde variance fell out between the Protector, and his Brother the Bishop of Winchester, Lord Chancellor: for appealing whereof, the Regent having substituted the Earl of Warwick Lieutenant General in his absence, came into England, where in a Parliament he compounded all differences between them: in honour whereof, King Henry kept a solemn feast; at which time the Regent dubbed the King Knight, not yet above four years old; and then the King presently inveilt with that dignity, many of his servants; and Edmund Mortimer, the last Earl of March, at this time dying, his Inheritance descended to Richard Plantagenet son and heir to Richard Earl of Cambridge beheaded at Southampton, who was now created Duke of York, and was afterward Father to King Edward the fourth: and at this time also, John Mowbray, son and heir to Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, banished before by King Richard the second, was restored to the Title of Duke of Norfolk. And now all things peaceably settled in England, the Regent with the Bishop of Winchester, returned into France; where, at the intercession of the Duke of Burgoyne, the Duke of Alanson was ransomed for two hundred thousand Crowns: and the Bishop of Winchester returned to Calice, where he was inveilt with the Dignity and Hat of a Cardinal, which his brother the Regent put upon his head.

In the fourth year of this Kings reign, a Parliament was holden at Leicester, called of the common people, the Parliament of Bars, because being commanded to lay by their Swords; servants took great bars to follow their Lords and Masters to the Parliament.

About this time, the Duke of Gloucester, Protector, took some blemish in his honour, by marrying another mans wife, Jacqueline Countess of Haynault, Holland and Zealand, who was married before to John Duke of Brabant yet living, and had lived with him ten monthes as his lawful Wife, but at that time upon some discontent, gone from him, intending to be divorced: at which injury offered to the Duke Brabant, the Duke of Burgoyne, being his Cousin, took so great offence, that first by friendly Letters he admonished the Duke of Gloucester of it, & that not prevailing, they grew to terms of challenge, and a Combat between them was appointed; but in the mean time, the Lady betrayed, was carried to the Duke of Burgoyne, who conveyed her to Gaunt; from whence, by friendship of a Burgonian Knight, in mans apparel, she escaped into Holland, and there made a defensive war against her husband the Duke of Brabant, and the Duke of Burgoyne: To her aid, the Duke of Gloucester sent the Lord Fitzwater, with a power of a thousand men: but she being discomfited by the Duke of Brabant, and the Pope also pronouncing the first marriage legal, the Duke of Gloucester deserted her, and then took for a second Wife Eleanor Daughter of the Lord Cobham of Sterborough, his old Mistress, and the Lady Jacqueline, after the death of John Duke of Brabant, married a mean Gentleman; whom the Duke of Burgoyne imprisoned, and brought her self to live in much trouble.

And now in France, the Countable with forty thousand men besieged the Town of St. James de Benyon, and having made a breach fit for assault, whilst his Captains stood straining of courtesie, which of them should first enter, Sir Nicholas Burdet with all his forces fallied forth, crying aloud, A Salisbury, A Suffolk; whose names struck such a terror into the besiegers, that they stood like men amazed, of whom six hundred were slain, two hundred drowned in the Ditches, fifty taken prisoners, with eighteen Standards, and the Countable was glad to quit the place, and give over the siege.

At the same time also, the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Scates, with seven thousand besieged Ponteford many weeks together; but Provision waxing scant, the Lord Scates with three thousand men went a foraging into the Enemies Country; and in his return with plenty of provision, was encountered with six thousand French, of whom he slew many hundreds, took above a thousand prisoners, and then returned safe into the Camp.

About this time also Sir John Falstaffe besieged the strong Town of Graville, which after twelve dayes, offered to render it self by a day, if it were not relieved. The offer was taken, and Pledges delivered: but before the day came, they within the Town had viſtalled and manned the place, and thereupon neglecting their Pledges, refused to render the Castle according to agreement: whereupon the Pledges were brought before the sight of them within the Castle, and there openly put to death.

And now a conspiracy of the Clergie and Magistrates in Mauits so prevailed, that the Marshals of France with five hundred men, about midnight came to the Townwals; where the Guard of English, by those that seemed their friends, were suddenly massacred, and setting open the Gates, made way for the Enemy to enter: whereupon the Alarum given, the Earl of Suffolk with the surviving English withdrew to the Castle, wherein they were sharply assailed by the French, who yet had more mind to ransack houses, and to make good cheer: whereof the Lord Talbot having intelligence by Captain Goffe, whom he had sent to discover the state of the French, he secretly gave notice to the Earl of Suffolk, who thereupon sallied forth of the Castle at a time when the Lord Talbot was ready with his Troops, and on both sides crying, St. George, a Talbot, they fell upon the careless French, who lost four hundred of their best men, the rest were all taken, the Town regained, and the Conspirators, thirty Citizens, twenty Priests, and fifteen Friars, condemned and put to execution.

Whilst these things went on prosperously in France, a great dyſaster fell out in England; for the right Noble Thomas Beauford (son of John of Gaunt, and Katherine Swinford) Duke of Exeter, and Guardian of the King, makes King Henry his heir, and at East-Greenwich in Kent, ended his life; whose place was presently supplied by the Earl of Warwick, and the Earls place in France by the Earl of Salisbury; who thereupon with five thousand men came to Orleanse, and besieged the City, and won from the French the great Fort. But here happened another great dyſaster; for from an high Tower in this Fort, the Beliegers observed the passages of the Townsmen; when the Noble Earl of Salisbury, intending to inform himself of the State of the Town, unfortunately looking out at a window of the Fort, with Sir Thomas Gargrave, a great shot from the Town striking the barres of the window, the splinters thereof were driven into his head and face; of which wounds, within eight dayes he dyed. This was now a second weakening to the English party: but in his place the Earl of Suffolk succeeded, to whom the Regent sended Sir John Falstaff with fresh supplies; whom the Lord De la Brets, nine thousand strong indeavours to intercept: but Sir John resolving to abide the charge, placeth his carriages behind, the Horse next, and the Foot before, lining his Bows with Bill-men, and pitching stakes behind the Archers, who having discharged their first volley retired behind the stakes: on which the French, forgetting their former defeat by that course, ran and goaded their Horses; by which their Vaward being disordered, the battail made a stand: which Sir John perceiving, cryeth out, St. George! they flie! at which words they fled indeed, and lost two thousand five hundred of their men, with the Lords De la Brets, and William Stewart; eleven hundred were taken Prisoners: with whom, and a rich booty, they came to the Camp before Orleanse: And this Battel because most part of the carriage, was Herring and Letten stuffe, was by the French men called the Battel of Herrings. But the besieged having notice of this defeat, they offered to submit themselves to the Duke of Burgoin, who was contented to receive them, so as the Regent would consent: But the Regent consented not; and therefore in the mean time, the besieged made means to the Duke of Alanson, who furnished the Town with fresh Forces and Provision; which put such spirits into the Citizens, that they made a sally out, slew six hundred English, and adventured upon the Basile, where the Lord Talbot commanded, who repelled them with great slaughter of their men; but yet the next day the Earl of Suffolk gave over his siege; and dispersed his Army into their Garisons.

And now the wheel of Fortune began to turn to the French against the English, which once for a going, was not ealie to be stayed. And first, the Duke of Alanson took by assault the Town of Largaux, and in it the Earl of Suffolk and one of his brothers, and slew Sir Alexander Pole another of his Brothers, and many other Prisoners in cold blood, by reason of a contention amongst the French, to whom the Prisoners should belong. Presently upon this, another great blow was given to the English: for the Lord Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, going to fortifie the Town of S. Meaux, were encountered by the said Duke of Alanson, and Arthur of Brittain, with three and twenty thousand men, with whom the English Lords interchanged some blows; but oppressed with multitude, were all three taken prisoners, all fore wounded, twelve hundred of their company slain, and the rest hardly escaping to Mium, where they fortified themselves the best they could against future assaults.

These were great blows given to the English fortune in France; Salisbury slain, and now Talbot taken prisoner, which though they made her a little to totter, yet there must be greater blows given before she will fall. And indeed, these dyſasters were seconded by the perfidious surrender of many Towns and strong Holds to the French King; who now encouraged by these successes, marcheth into Champaign, where by compulsion he took Troyes the chief City of that Province; Challons rebelleth, and enforceeth their Captain to yield it up: by whose examples the Citizens of Rhemes do the like, where the French King is anew Proclaimed, and with accustomed Ceremonies Anointed and Crowned: whereupon many Towns submit themselves to him, and revolt from the English. Vpon this, the Duke of Bedford (to make the French know, that all the English strength consisted not only in Salisbury and Talbot) with ten thousand English, besides Normans, marched out of Paris, and sent letters of defiance to the French King, affirming, that

A that deceitfully and by unjust means he had stoln many Cities and places of importance belonging to the Crown of England; which he was come to justify by battel, if he would appoint a time and place. To which the King of France making a slight answer; the Regent marched apace toward him, and as fast the King of France marcheth away: The Regent followed him, but could not overtake him, till he came near to Senlys: there both the Armies encamped and embattelled, yet only some light skirmishes passed between them; and a night or two after, the French King fled with his Army to Bray: which the Duke thinking to be but a plot to draw him further off from Paris, of whose fidelity he had no great assurance, followed him no further, but returned thither. At which time, the Regent's Brother the Cardinal, having prepared forces to assist Pope Martin in Bohemia, the Regent borrowed them of him for a present expedition, and with them marched into Campaigne, where he found the French King encamped upon the Mount Piball; whose number being twice as many as the Regent's, yet by no provocations could be drawn to battel; but secretly fled to Crispis; whereupon the Regent also returned to Paris.

Whilst these things are done in France, in England, upon St. Leonards day the 6. of November 1429, King Henry not yet eight years old, was with great solemnity Crowned at Westminster: at whose Coronation were made six and thirty Knights of the Bath, and after the solemnity, a feast; and if any man desire to know much Cookery, he may read in Fabian, all the dishes of meat that were served at that feast.

About this time, in France, a strange Impostor ariseth; a maid called La Pucelle, taking upon her to be sent from God, for the good of France, and to expel the English: and some good indeed she did; for by her subtle working, the King was received into Campaigne, and many Towns were rendered to him; whilst the Lord Longeville took by surprize the Castle of Aumale, and slew all the English that were in it. But all these were but petty acquets to the King of France: there is a knot of friendship between the Dukes of Bedford and Burgoin, which must be broken, or he will never be able to compass his designs. He therefore labours by all means possible to disunite them; wherein he so little prevailed, that the Duke of Burgoin acquaints the Regent with all the practices, who thereupon, with many thanks, exhorteth him to continue firm, of which he should never have cause to repent him: and because Normandy was a principal part of the English strength in France, he goeth thither, and by many reasons persuades them, as their Ancestors had alwaies been, to be faithful to the Crown of England.

D In this time of the Regent's absence from Paris, the King of France drew all his forces thither; using all means possible, by Escalado, Battery, and burning the gates, to enter the City: but was so withstood by the vigilancy of the Citizens, that he was glad to found retreat, leaving his slain and maimed souldiers behind him, all but the Pucelle, who being hurt in the Leg, and almost stifled with myre in the ditch, was by a fervant of the Duke of Alanson drawn up, and conveyed after the King to Berry, who by the way received the submission of the Inhabitants of Lignye. Some other Services were performed on both sides, by the Duke of Suffolk and Sir Thomas Kyriell, for the English; by the bastard of Orleanse and Sir Stephen le Eſe, for the French; but of no great importance: till at last, the Pucelle, (who a little before had caused an English Captains head to be cut off, because he would not humble himself to her upon his knee) was by Sir John of Lutsem-burgh taken, and presented to the Duke of Burgoin, who sent her to the Regent, and he to the Bishop of the Diocese, who judicially proceeding against her as a Sorceress, and deceiver of the King and his subjects, she was (after many delays of promise to discover secret practices, and lastly of her feigning to be with child) publicly burnt at Roan.

And now the Regent finding how much the Crowning of the French King had furthered his designs, he made account the like effect would follow the Crowning of King Henry in France: whereupon he is sent for to come over; and coming to Paris, was by his uncle the Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal of Eusebius, not yet above nine years old, with all usual ceremonies Crowned King of France, receiving the oaths of Homage and Fealty of all the French Nobility that were present, and of all the Inhabitants of Paris, and of the places adjacent. Upon this, Pope Eugenius laboured a reconciliation between the two Kings, but could effect nothing, but only a Truce for six years: which agreed upon, King Henry returns into England, and landeth at Dover, the eleventh of February. But the six years Truce was scarce openly Proclaimed, when the French had cunningly possessed themselves of divers Castles and places of strength, justifying their actions, affirming, That what was politically obtained without blowes, was no infringement of the Truce: and afterwards they perfidiously conveyed two hundred men into the Castle of Roan, with intent to have surprized it; but being discovered, they were all taken, and either ransomed, or put to execution. Upon this, the Regent (whose Wife, the Sister of the Duke of Burgoin, being lately dead, and he married again to Jaqueline the Earl of S. Paul's daughter, with whom he went over into England) returned again to Paris; to whom the Lord Talbot, having now paid his ransom, cometh, bringing with him seven hundred tried souldiers; and with them the Regent takes the field, where the French Army lay, but the French slunk away in the dark, as not daring to abide the hazard of a battel.

About this time, the Duke of Bowbon, taken at the battel of Agincourt, after eighteen years imprisonment, paying eighteen thousand pounds for his Ransome, the same day he was enlarged died at London.

And now a very great effect was produced out of a very small cause: There had been sparks of unkindness between the two great Dukes of Bedford and Burgoin, which brake out into a flame upon upon this occasion: A time and place was appointed, where they should meet to compound A some differences that were between them; The place agreed upon, was St. Omers, a Town in Burgoyne: When the time came, they stood upon this nice point, Which of them should first come to the place; as thinking that he which did so, should thereby acknowledge himself to be the meaner person. The Duke of Richmond thought he had no reason to do it, seeing he was Regent of France, and therefore superiour to any subject in the Kingdom: And the Duke of Burgoyne thought he had no reason to do it, seeing it was to be done in his own Dominions, where he was himself the Sovereign Lord. Upon this nice point they parted without meeting; and the unkindness grew afterward to so great hatred, that the Duke of Burgoyne chose rather to be friends with him that had murdered his father, then ever to have any more commerce with the Duke of Bedford. Thus was one great branch of assistance lost off from the English which had been a great means before to make it flourish: and it was not so much, that the assistance was taken from the English, as that it was added to the French: for after this, the Duke of Burgoyne brought more assistance to the new King of France, then ever he had done before to the King of England. By which we may see, when the Divine providence hath a work to effect, what slight occasions it oftentimes takes to effect the work.

Great blowes had been given before in France, to the English fortune by the enemy, but now a blow was given to it by Destiny, which made the Enemies blowes the more incurable; for now the wife, valiant, faithful Regent of France, Duke of Bedford, Anjou, and Alanson, Earl of Mayne, Harcourt, Dreux, Richmond, and Carlisle, and Viscount Beaumont, upon the fourteenth of September 1435, ended his life at Paris, which was in a manner the ending the life of the English fortune in France: all former blowes had been upon inferior members, but this was a blow upon the head, and therefore mortal; and indeed the English fortune in France, never after lifted up its head, but very weakly. He was buried in our Ladies Church at Roan, whereat the Nobility of Normandy much repined, who would have had their own Territory honoured with his Sepulchre: yet see the levity of these men, who a few years after in the reign of Lewis the Son of Charles, would have had his Monument to have been demolished, as being dishonourable, such an Arch-enemy to France, should be interred in the Metropolitan City of that Province: But Lewis answered, God forbid, I should give way to so dishonourable an act, to disquiet his dead bones, who living, would have disquieted us all, and it favours of too much baseness to insult upon a dead Lyon.

But yet in these dyasters, there might have been some reparation by a good Successor, had not Envy and Ambition bred disturbance: the Duke of Somerset desired the Succession, but the Duke of York obtained it; which bred such an envy in the Duke of Somerset towards him, that he laboured nothing so much as to cross his designs, and was a means to hinder the Duke of York's going to his charge so long, that the Parisians had time to think of freeing themselves from the English servitude; and thereupon the City after it had remained seventeen years in the possession of the English, yields to the Constable, and upon composition expels all the English; and which was worse, many other Towns followed this example of Paris, for what Town would not willingly do as Paris did, the epitome as it were of all France? and which they stick not to call Le Monde de Paris, as though there were upon earth no other world but Paris. Even the Normans, who had always been most firm to the English, yet had run the same course, if the Lord Talbot had not kept them in awe, with the slaughter of five thousand of them that way inclined. And now after these great losses, we must be content to play smaller games, cast at Castles and Forts, and some small Towns, like the struggling of dying men, doing acts of life, till there be no more life remaining; And this was now our case in France. The new Regent with eight thousand Souldiers arrived at Harflew, and from thence marcheth to Roan, where he won the reputation of justice and uprightness, notwithstanding all the calumnations of the Duke of Somerset: when the revolted Duke of Burgoyne pretending title to the Town of Callice, approacheth it with an Army of forty thousand men, takes the poor Bastile of Oye, and slaughters and hangs many of the defendants. The Piccards besieged the Castle of St. Mark, took it, and demolished it; from thence they begin Callice with a siege, but were repelled: Then the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Lord Croy to besiege the Castle of Gynsuet, but were repelled there also. In the mean time Pembrook the Herald brought a defiance to the Duke of Burgoyne from the Duke of Gloucester the Protector, that he would give him battle if he would abide it; to whom the Duke of Burgoyne answered, he should be sure to find him where he now was. Whereupon he calleth a Council, and whilst they are debating what is best to be done, the Callicians make a fall, take the Bastile which they had builded, by force, and slew eightscore of the Burgoyneans, which so terrified them, that they upbraid the Duke of Burgoyne, and make both him and the Lord Croy to quit their quarters, and in such haste to be gone, that they left a great part of their best Ordinance, and all their Provision for the relief and help of the besieged; and it seems they had reason so to do, for the next day being the seven and twentieth of July, the Duke of Gloucester landed at Callice, with five and twenty thousand good fighting men, who finding the enemy recoiled, foraged all the Countrey thereabout, and for the space of six weeks harrowed all the parts of Flanders, Artois, and Hainault; and then returning by St. Omers, Arde, and Guisnes, arrived at Callice.

And now we must look a little home, for the D. of York returning into England, finds the Castle of Roxborough besieged by the King of Scots, with thirty thousand men: but he hearing of the Earl of Northumberland's approach, and the Dukes return, incontinently fled. And now again

And here we may have leave to speak of a private matter; for about this time the Dutchess of Bedford married Sir Richard Woodville, a gallant young Gentleman, but of small means, which though it offended her friends, yet it seems offended not God, who made her mother of many children by him; and amongst the rest, of the Lady Elizabeth, afterwards married to King Edward the fourth. Also about this time James King of Scots, who before had been eighteen years Prisoner in England, and afterward released, with a Wife of a Noble house, a great Dower, and many honourable Presents, yet proved ungrateful, was murdered in his bed-chamber by night, whose murderers being found out, were cruelly tortured. And now again to France; when the Duke of Burgoyne could neither by force nor policy take Callice, he attempted a ridiculous practise, to cut a ditch that should drown both the Town and Countrey; but after much labour and expence, his design like a vapour vanished into air. The Lord Talbot besieged Tankerville, and after four months siege, hath it rendered to him: In revenge whereof, the French King in his own person, laies siege to Montfrenau; which whilst the Duke of York was providing to rescue, he was discharged of his office, done of purpose by his enemies, to lay a blot upon him: A lamentable thing in a State, when private envie shall be suffered to undermine the publick safety; and by this means Sir Thomas Gerard had the more opportunity to sell the Town, for which, if he were a gainer in money, he was yet a loser in reputation, and hated both of French and English.

C in much discontent died. Arthur, Constable of France, and John Duke of Alanson besieged the Town of Auranches; but were with dishonour repelled by the Lord Talbot: After this, La Hyre sent Letters to them, that he had a promise from divers Burgers of Roan to let them in at any time appointed; against which time they came to Ryze, within four leagues of Roan, but the Lord Talbot having notice hereof, marched covertly to Roan, and from thence before day to Ryze, where he surpriseth the French, takes the Lord Fontaine, Sir Allon Geron, and many others, and with a rich booty returneth to Roan. The sixth day of November, in the sixteenth year of the Kings reign, the Earl of Warwick having oftentimes been aboard, and still beaten back by tempests, landed at Harflew with a thousand fresh Souldiers, and from thence came to Roan; but in the mean time the Duke of Burgoyne seeing no new Regent yet come, besiegeth the Town of Crotot, to the relief whereof, the new Regent now come, sent the Lord Talbot with five thousand men, whose approach the Duke not enduring, retired to Abbeville, leaving only four hundred, with whom he had manned the Bastile by him there erected, which was soon gained, and all the Souldiers either taken or slain. And there the valiant Talbot sent word to the Duke, that if he would save his Countrey from vastation, he should come to a batel, but the Duke not liking the match; conveys himself to Amiens: Twenty daies together did the Lord Talbot with fire and sword pass through Piccardy, and Artois without opposition, and then returned: Sir Thomas Kyrriell seized upon the Dukes Carriages and Ordinance, and having left in Crotot, victual enough for six hundred men for a whole year, he brought the rest to the Earl of Warwick. And now Henry Earl of Mortgaine, Son to Edmund Duke of Somerset, arrived with two hundred Archers, and three

E hundred Spears, took the Castle of St. Anjou, wherein were three hundred Scots and French; the Scots he slew all, and hanged the French because they had sworn fealty to England, and broke it; he took likewise the Castle of Algarchie, and by means of an Ambush, taketh the Lord Camerois, coming to the rescue thereof. On the other side, the Towns of Neux in Brye, and Susan were sold and delivered to the French by the treacherous Burgers. In June, the Earl of Huntington with two thousand Archers, and four thousand Spears was sent into Gascoigne, whither the Earl of Danois was lately come to buy Towns and Castles, but the Earl of Huntington upon his coming thither, changed all the Captains and Officers, whereby he prevented all such bargains; and so far had bribery spread it self at this time, that even in Normandy the English Captains had but small confidence in the Natives, and not much in some of their own nation; whereupon Sir Richard Woodville, Sir William Chamberlain, and William Peto were sent thither to stop the current of that corruption.

At this time the Council of France procured a reconciliation between the King and the Dauphin; who had been in long jealousies and diffention; which if it had not been done, the Kingdom had been torn with Factions, and never been able to subsist.

And now in a great frost and snow, the English under the conduct of Sir John Clifford, having covered their Armour with white shirts, and their heads with white Almain skulls, came to Pontibus, by night, and undiscovered pass'd the ditches, scaled the walls, slew the Guards, and took the Town; but this good luck was accompanied with a bad of more importance, for presently upon it, the Earl of Warwick died in the Castle of Roan, and conveyed into England, was buried in the Castle of Warwick. To reduce Pontibus, the French King in person layeth siege unto it, when Richard Duke of York being the second time made Regent, having with him the Earl of Oxford, and the Earl of Ewe, levies a power to raise the Siege; and arriving there, sends word to the King, that the next morning he would give him battle; but the King liked not his bidding, but leaving his Ordinance, at midnight stole away to Poissy; thither also the Regent follows him, but with no provocations could draw him to fight.

About this time, a treaty for Peace between the two Kings is appointed to be held at Callice, by the mediation of the Dutchess of Burgoyne, a Portugal Lady; Commissioners meet of both sides, but but nothing concluded, only the Duke of Orleans who had been prisoner to the English five and twenty years, is by the Dutchess mediation ransomed with three hundred thousand Crowns of the Duke of Burgoin's money. The Lord Willoughby beleagued Depe, which the Dauphin with sixteen thousand men cometh to raise; and there young Talbot is taken prisoner, with Sir John Peto, and Sir John Repley, but are shortly after redeemed by exchange. And now another weakness happened to the English party, the Earl of St. Paul forsakes them, and is reconciled to the King of France. The English lay siege to Tarrus, for the ransoming whereof, the French King marcheth thither with 60000 men, relieveth the Town, and then marcheth to Soverine, which he taketh in, and in it, Sir John Ramfion; after which, he took in Arques, but then the English cutting off all convoys of Victuals from coming to him, he is forced to return; after whose departure, the English recover all that he had taken; and to boot, take his Lieutenant prisoner, slaying or hanging all his Souldiers. In this mean while the Lord Talbot taketh in Conquet, and driveth the Bastard of Orleans from the siege of Gagliarda; but the French in the Castle of Cornhill detained many English prisoners; for redeeming of whom, Sir Francis the Aragonist used this stratagem; he apparell'd half a dozen lusty fellows like Peasants, carrying baskets with corn and victuals, and sends them to the Castle, while he with his company lies in ambush, in a Valley near the Castle; the six unsuspected are admitted, and coming to the Captains chamber, seize upon him, and withall give the sign to the ambush, who coming readily on, entered the Castle, put the Souldiers to the sword, set the prisoners at liberty, burnt down the Castle, and with the booty, and Captain of the Castle, returned to Roan.

Whilest these alterations passed in France, a more unnatural, passed in England, the Uncle, first against the Nephew, the Nephew against the Uncle; The Duke of Gloucester Articles against the Cardinal, charging him with affecting prebeminence, to the derogation of the Kings Prerogative, and contempt of his Laws; which Articles are delivered to the King, and by him to his Council, who being most of the Clergy, durst not meddle in them, for offending the Cardinal. On the other side, the Cardinal finding nothing whereof directly to accuse the Duke of Gloucester himself, accuseth his other self, the Lady Eleanor Cobham the Dukes wife, of Treason, for attempting by Sorcery and witchcraft the death of the King, and advancement of her husband to the Crown: for which, though acquitted of the Treason, she is adjudged to open Penances, namely, to go with a wax taper in her hand, hoodless (save a kerchief) through London, diverse daies together, and after to remain in perpetual imprisonment in the Isle of Man. The crime objected against her, was procuring Thomas Southwell, John Hunne Priests, Roger Bollingbrooke a supposed Necromancer, and Margery Jordan called the Witch of Eye in Suffolk, to devile a picture of Wax in proportion of the King, in such sort by sorcery, that as the picture consumed, so the Kings body should consume: for which they were all condemned: the Witch was burnt in Smithfield; Bollingbrooke was hanged, constantly affirming upon his death, that neither the Dutchess, nor any other from her, did ever require more of him, then only to know by his art, how long the King should live: John Hunne had his pardon; and Southwell died the night before he should have been executed.

About this time, the Countess of Cominges being dead, the King of France and the Earl of Arminiack are Competitors for the inheritance: The Earl takes possession; but fearing the King of France his greatness, makes offer of his daughter in marriage to the King of England, with a large portion in money, and besides, to deliver full possession of all such Towns and Castles as were by him or his Ancestors detained in Aquitaine, and had been formerly by the Progenitors of the King of England conquered. The Ambassadors for this business, were by King Henry graciously heard, and honourably returned: after whom were sent Sir Edward Hall, Sir Robert Roffe and others, to conclude all things, and the young Lady is by Proxy affianced to King Henry. But the King of France not liking the proceeding of the match, fendeth the Dauphin with a puissant Army, who took the Earl, with his youngest son, and both his daughters, and gained the Counties of Arminiack, Louverne, Rovergue, Montlessenois, with the Cities of Severac and Cadenac, chasing the Bastard of Arminiack out of the Country; by means whereof, the marriage was then deferred, and left in suspense.

In this distraction of Christendome, many Princes, the Kings of Spain, Denmark and Hungary, became Mediators for a Peace between the two Kings of England and France: Ambassadors of both sides are sent, many meetings were had, many motions made, but in conclusion, only a Truce for eighteen months is agreed upon. In the mean time, the Earl of Suffolk one of the Commissioners for the Peace, takes upon him beyond his Commission, and without acquainting his fellows, to treat of a marriage between the King of England, and a kinswoman of the King of France, Niece to the French Queen, daughter to Rayner Duke of Anjou, titling himself King of Sicilie and Naples: In which business he was so intemperate; that it brought an aspersion upon him of being bribed: but howsoever, an Enterview betwixt the two Kings is appointed, without any warrant of King Henry's part, to be between Charters and Roan. The Commissioners return; the Earl of Suffolk sets forth the beauty of the proposed Bride, and the great benefits that would redound to the Kingdom by this match. The King was easily induced to credit the Relation; but divers of the Kings Council, especially the Duke of Gloucester, opposed it; partly for the meannesses of the match, her father being only a Titular Prince and withal but poor, unable to give any portion at all; and partly, for the wrong which should hereby be offered to the Duke of Arminiack's daughter, to whom the King had been in solemn manner publickly affianced. But reasons could not prevail

A prevail against favour: the Earl of Suffolk's affirmation must not be undervalued. And hereupon, a new creation of Lords first made, (John Beaufort Earl of Somerset, made Duke of Somerset; John Lord Talbot made Earl of Shrewsbury; John Holland Earl of Huntington, made Duke of Excester; Humphry Earl of Stafford, made Duke of Buckingham; H. Beauchampe Earl of Warwick made Duke of Warwick; Edmund Beaufort Earl of Dorset, made Marquess Dorset; and William de la Pool Earl of Suffolk, made Marquess of Suffolk:) this new Marquess honourably accompanied, is sent into France to fetch the Lady Margaret the proposed Bride; who shortly after is married at Southwick in Hampshire, and Crowned Queen of England at Westminster, on the 30 day of May, 1444. In the three and twentieth year of King Henry's Reign. And now instead of benefits by this marriage, there presently followed great inconveniences: for first in exchange of her Person, the Duchy of Anjou, the City of Mantes, with the whole County of Mayne, the best props of the Duchy of Normandy are agreed to be surrendered into the hands of the French; and then the Duke of Arminiack, to revenge the injury offered to his Daughter, is a means to expel the English out of all Aquitain.

At this time, the Duke of Somerset's spleen against the Duke of York, not only is revived, but is grown stronger; for the Duke of York, who was now after the death of the Earl of Warwick, made the second time Regent of France, is so undermined by him, through assistance of the new Marquess of Suffolk, who bore now all the sway with the King and Queen; that not only he supplanted him in his place, but planted himself in it, to the great heart-burning of the Duke of York and his friends; but he wisely dissembled his anger, and for the present passed it over.

And now is no man in grace but the new Marquess of Suffolk; all favours from the King and Queen must pass by him, and the extent of his power over-reacheth all the Council: He gets of the King the Wardship of the body and lands of the Countess of Warwick, and of the Lady Margaret, sole daughter and heir of John Duke of Somerset, afterward Mother to King Henry the seventh. And now the Kings weakness in judgment grows every day more apparent then other, whilest governed by no counsel but of his Queen; and she by no counsel but her own will, and the new Marquess of Suffolk: King Henry is himself the least part of the King, and serves but to countenance the devises of others, whereof he little understands the drift; and which proving ill, the blame must needs be his; if well, the benefit and honour, others. For by intigation of the Queen, he suffers the Duke of Gloucester, for his care of the Commonwealth called the good Duke, to be excluded not only from Command, but from the Council-Table; and permits informers, set on by the Marquess of Suffolk, the Duke of Buckingham, the Cardinal Bishop of Winchester, and the Archbishop of York, to come against him; who lay to his charge, that he had caused divers persons to be executed contrary to Law: wherein though he justified himself, yet no justification would be heard; but to avoid tumultuary part-taking, it was concluded he should be privately convicted and condemned: and to this end, a Parliament by the procurement of his Enemies, unwitting to the King, is called at Bury; to which the Duke of Gloucester resorting, is on the second day of the Session, by the Lord Beaumont Lord High Constable (abetted by the Duke of Buckingham) arrested and put in Ward, all his followers sequestered from him, whereof two and thirty are committed to several Prisons, and the next day after his imprisonment, he is found in his bed murdered; yet shewed the same day as though he had died of an Impostume; though all that saw his body, saw plainly that he died of a violent and unnatural cause: some say, strangled; some, that a hot spit was put up at his fundament; and some, that he was stifled between two feather-beds. His Corps the same day was conveyed to St. Albans, and there buried. Five of his menial servants, Sir Roger Chamberlain Knight, Middleton, Herbert, Artz, Esquires, and John Needham Gentleman, were condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; and hanged they were at Tiburn, let down quick, stript naked, marked with a Knife to be quartered; but then the Marquess of Suffolk, to make a shew as though he had no hand in the business, brought their Pardon, and delivered it at the place of Execution, and so their lives were saved. It is no unmemorable thing which Sir Thomas Moore writes of the pregnancy of this Duke of Gloucester. It happened the King coming one time in progress to St. Albans, a Begger born blind, as he said, at the shrine of St. Alban obtained his sight: which miracle being noised in the Town, the Duke of Gloucester being there with the King, desired to see him, whom being brought unto him, he asked if he were born blinde: who told him, Yes truly; And can you now see? (saith the Earl) Yes I thank God and St. Alban, saith the Begger; then tell me saith the Earl what colour is my Gown? The Begger readily told him the colour; and what colour saith the Earl is such a mans Gown? The Begger likewise told him presently, and so of divers others. Then saith the Earl, Go you counterfeit knave; if you had been born blinde, and could never see till now, how come you so suddenly to know this difference of colours? and thereupon instead of an Alms, caused him to be set in the Stocks. But in the death of this Duke, the Queen, who had a special hand in it, was either not so intelligent or not so provident as she might have been; for as long as he had lived, his Primogeniture would have kept back the Duke of York's claim to the Crown, being but descended from the fifth son of Edward the third, where this Duke Humphrey was descended from the fourth. And here were the first seeds sown between the two Houses of Lancaster, whose badge was the Red-rose, and York, whose badge was the White-rose. And now upon the death of this Duke of Gloucester, the Duke of York began amongst his Familiars, privily to whisper his right and title to the Crown; but so politicly carryed his intent, that all things were provided to further his project, before his purpose was any whit discovered.

Accusations laid to the Duke of Suffolk.

And in this time the rich Cardinal and Bishop of Winchester dies, who lying on his death bed, as Doctor John Baker his privy Counsellour and his Chaplain writeth, used such like words; Why should I dye, saith he, having so much riches? If the whole Realm would save my life, I am able either by Policy to get it, or by money to buy it: Fie, will not death be hired? will money do nothing? and other words to such purpose. But he being dead, there succeeded in his Bishoprick a more deserving Prelate, William Wauslete, called so of the place in Lincolnshire where he was born though his name was Patterne, of the Worshipful Family whereof he was descended. And now to the end the Marquess of Suffolk might not come behind them in dignity, whom he went before in power, he is about this time made Duke of Suffolk.

In France about this time, a victory was gotten, which proved no better then an overthrow; Before the Truce was expired, Sir Francis Surveys an Aragonois, a man thought worthy to be admitted into the honorable Order of the Garter; taking advantage of the security of the French Garisons, suddenly surpriseth a Frontier Town called Fongiers, belonging to the Duke of Britain; the Duke advertiseth the French King thereof, who by his Ambassadors complains both to the King of England, and to the Duke of Somerset then Regent in France: Answer was made it was the fault of the Aragonois, who did it without warrant from either the King, or the Council; nevertheless Commissioners are appointed to meet at Louviers, to treat of some course for satisfaction; but in the time of the Treaty news is brought to the Regent, that the French by a stratagem of a Carter, that with a load of Hay coming over the Draw-bridge, caused the Axeltree to break, and whilst the Porter was ready to help the Carter, the Porters brains were beaten out, the Town of Ardes surprized, and the Lord Fauconbridge Captain thereof was taken Prisoner. Restitution being required by the English, answer is made them in their own language, it was done without warrant from either the French King, or any of his Council, so it was but one for another; and from thence forward the Truce is broken of both sides, and all things grow worse and worse. The French King by composition taketh Louviers, Gerbury, and Vernois, whilst the Regent stands demurring what was best to be done; if he command, not obeyed, if he counsel, not followed, as it happens to men once blemished in Reputation, to have an ill contruction made of all their actions; by which means the French go on without resistance, get Constance, Gussard, Gattard, St. Lo, Festhamp, & many other pieces in Normandy, upon notice whereof, Manleson in Guyen surrenders to the Earl of Foix, and by their example the City of Roan it self takes composition to surrender, where the Earl of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Butler, heir to the Earl of Ormond, were kept pledges; till it was performed. It is true, succours were provided to be sent out of England, under the conduct of the Duke of York; but a rebellion happening in Ireland, which was thought of more importance to be speedily suppressed, diverted him and his Forces thither, where not only he suppressed the Rebels, but so won the hearts of that people, that it was no small furtherance to his proceedings afterward. A fresh supply indeed of fifteen hundred men, under the command of Sir Thomas Kyriel's tent over; but what could a handful of men do against such multitudes as opposed them? for he marching with the rest of the Army towards Beauneux, was encountered by the Earl of Clermont, with seven thousand French and Scots, whom yet at first he made to recoil, till the Constable of France with four hundred men at Arms, and eight hundred Archers came to the rescue, and then fresh men coming upon them that were already tired, the English lost three thousand and above seven hundred, besides divers that were taken Prisoners. After this loss of men, follows presently a loss of Towns; Harflew is assaulted, and though valiantly for a while defended by Sir Robert Curson, yet surrendered at last upon composition: Then the French King with an Army Royal, besiegeth Caen in Normandy, a Town belonging to the Duke of York, defended in his absence by his Lieutenant Sir David Hall; but the Duke of Somerset being Regent, in commiseration of his Dutcheffs being in the Town, notwithstanding the stout opposition of Sir David Hall, surrenders it upon composition to the French; whereof Sir David giving notice to the Duke of York, it bred such a deadly quarrel between the two Dukes, that they were never after thoroughly reconciled. And thus is all Normandy recovered from the English, after it had been in their possession a hundred years; and finally, all France is reduced to the obedience of Charles the French King.

And now hereafter there will be little to do abroad, but there will be the more to do at home, and more blood will be shed in England by civil dissensions, then was shed before in all the Wars of France. This loss of Normandy and other parts in Normandy, is imputed much to the Duke of Somerset; at that time Regent; but the D. of Suffolk must bear a great part of the blame, partly for having been the cause of the surrender of Anjou and Maine, and the chief procurer of the Duke of Gloucesters death, and partly for having wilfully wasted the Kings treasure, and been a means to remove the ablest men from the Council Board; of all which aspersions the Queen takes notice, and knowing how far they trench upon the Dukes Detraction, and her own; she so wrought, that the Parliament assembled at the Black-Friers, is adjourned to Leicester, and from thence to Westminster; but though all means were used to stop these accusations against the Duke, yet the lower House would not be taken off, but exhibited their Bill of grievances against him: That he had traiterously incited the Bailard of Orleans, the Lord Presigny, & others to levy war against the King, to the end that thereby the King might be destroyed; and his son John who had married Margaret Daughter and sole Heir of John Duke of Somerset, whose title to the Crown the said Duke had often declared, in case King Henry should dye without issue, might come to be King; That through his treachery the French King had gotten possession of the Dutchy of Normandy, and had taken prisoners the valiant Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord Fauconbridge and others: but to these accusations, he peremptorily affirmed himself not guilty, so much as in thought. Then were further allegations made against him, that being with others, sent Ambassador into France, he had transgressed his Commission, and without privy of his fellow Commissioners, had presumed to promise the surrender of Anjou, and the delivery of the County of Maine to Duke Rayner, which accordingly was performed, to the great dishonour of the King, and detriment of the Crown; That he had traiterously acquainted the French King with all the affairs of State, and passages of secrecy, by which the Enemy was thoroughly instructed in all the designs of the King and Council: That he had received rewards from the French King, to divert and dissipate all succours sent to the Kings friends in France. Upon these and divers other accusations brought against him, to blear the peoples eyes, he is committed to the Tower; but the Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but he was set at liberty; which so incensed the common people, that they made an Insurrection; and under the leading of a desperate fellow, styling himself Blew-beard, they committed many out-rages; but by the diligence of the Gentlemen of the Countrey, the Captain was apprehended, and the Rebellion ceased. And now another Parliament is called, where great care is taken in chusing of Burgeses, presuming thereby to stop any further proceeding against the Duke of Suffolk; but his personal appearance at the Parliament gave such a general distaste to the House, though he came in the company of the King and Queen, that they forbore not to begin the Assembly, with Petitioning the King, for punishment to be inflicted upon such as had plotted or consented to the resignation of Anjou, and Maine, whereof by name they instanced in the Duke of Suffolk, John Bishop of Salisbury, Sir James Fynes, Lord Say, and others. This Petition was seconded by the Lords of the upper House; whereupon, to give some satisfaction to the Houses, the Lord Say Lord Treasurer, is sequestered from his place, the Dukes Officers are all discharged, and himself formally banished for five years; but with an intent after the multitude had put out of mind their hatred against him, to have revoked him: but God did otherwise dispose of him, for when he was shipped in Suffolk, with intent to have passed over into France; he was met by an English man of War, taken and carried to Dover sands, and there had his head chop off, on the side of the long boat, which together with the body was left there on the sands, as a pledge of some satisfaction for the death of Duke Humphrey.

Whilst these things are done in England, the Duke of York in Ireland began to make his way to the Crown, as descended from Philippa Daughter and heir to Lyonnell Duke of Clarence, elder brother to John of Gaunt, great Grandfather to the present King Henry the sixth. And for a beginning, it is privately whispered, that King Henry was of a weak capacity, and easily abused; the Queen of a malignant spirit, and bloudily ambitious; the Privy Council, if wise enough, yet not honest enough, regarding more their private profit then the publick good; that through their delinquencies, all France was lost, and that God would not bless the usurped possession of King Henry: with these suggestions the Kentishmen seemed to be taken; which being observed by an instrument of the Duke of York, called Mortimer, he takes his time, and tells the multitude, that if they will be ruled by him, he will put them in a course to work a general Reformation, and free them for ever, from those insupportable burthens of taxations, so often, upon every slight occasion obtruded upon them. These promises of Reformation and freedom from impositions, so wrought with the people, that they drew to a head; and make Mortimer, otherwise Jack Cade, their leader; who styling himself Captain Mend-all, marched with no great number, but those well ordered to Black-heath, where between Eltham and Greenwich, he lay by the space of a month exercising his men, and sending for whom he pleased, and for what he pleased: Then he presents to the Parliament the complaints of the Commons: That the Queens Favourites share amongst them the Revenues of the Crown, whereby the King is enforced for the supportation of his present estate, to tax and burthen the Commons, to their utter undoing, and to the general impoverishment of the Kingdom: That the Commons have their commodities daily taken from them for the purveyance of the Kings household, for which they are not paid, nor any assurance for payment thereof given, but only Court promises: That upon the apprehension of any man for Treason or Felony, the Kings menial servants, before conviction, beg the goods and lands of the impeached; whereupon indirect and unlawful proceedings are used by subornation of witnesses, embracery of Jurors, and great mens Letters to the Judges; whereby Justice is perverted, and the innocent after attainted, if not executed, yet at least imprisoned to their undoing: That the Commons have no legal proceedings in their Law-suits, so as the rightful owners of Inheritance, dare not, (if opposed by any Courtier) maintain their Titles, or attempt the recovery of their interest, how just soever: That the Kings Collectors and other Accomptants are much troubled in passing their Accompts by new extorted Fees, and by being enforced to procure a late invented Writ of Quorum Nomina, for allowance of the Barons of the Cinque Ports, & their suing out their Quetus at their own charge, without allowance from the King: That the Bayliffs of Sheriffs, under colour of the green wax out of the Exchequer, do levy greater sums then are by the Record justifiable, yet maintained: That they cannot have the freedom of electing Knights and Burgeses for the Parliament; but by letters from the Favourites of the Court, to their friends and Retainers, the Knights and Burgeses are commonly chosen: That they are too much troubled with too often coming to attend the general Sessions, being enforced in many places to make five daies journey to the place where they are kept. These and some other, were the complaints of the Commons; but the Captain for his own particular (after protestation made to live and dye in the quarrel of the King) required that his Majesty would be pleased to receive A again into favour, the truly noble Prince the Duke of York, and with him the Right Honourable the Dukes of Excester, Buckingham and Norfolk, and the ancient Noblemen of the Realm; by the undue practices of Suffolk and his complices, commanded from his presence; and that all their opposites might be banished the Court, and put from their Offices: That there might be a general amotion of corrupt officers, anabolition of the Green Wax, and other instruments of Exortion out of the Exchequer; a qualification of proceeding in the Kings-Bench; an inhibition of unequal pervyance of provision for the Kings Household, and a present execution of the Promoters, Slegge, Cromer, Ifill, and East, whom he pretended by wrongful information to have abused the King, and wronged his subjects. These Petitions are sent from the Lower-House to the Upper, and from thence committed to the Lords of the Kings Privy Council, who having examined the particulars, explode them as frivolous, and the Authors thereof to be presumptuous Rebels: Whereupon the King is solicited by his Privy Council, to prosecute them by force rather then intreaty; which advice is seconded by the Queen, as conceiving they secretly aimed at her: and hereupon the King draws his Forces to Greenwich, and appointeth divers Lords to assaile the Rebels; but the Lords could get no followers to fight against them who sought only for reformation of abuses, and for punishment of such Traytors as the Lord Say the Kings Chamberlain was: whereupon the Lord Say is presently committed to the Tower, the King and Queen retire to London, from whence within two daies, the King being now fifteen thousand strong, marcheth in perfon towards Captain Mend-all, who politically withdraweth his Forces into Sevenoak Wood; upon notice whereof the King retireth again to London, but the Queen longing for dispatch, sends the two Straffords, Sir Humphrey, and William, with many hotspurs of the Court, to follow the Rebels, who were soon cooled; for they found Captain Mend-all in good order ready to receive them, and in the first encounter, flew Sir Humphrey, and afterwards his brother, and put all the rest to flight; the Kings Forces being at Black-heath, could neither by threats nor intreaties be gotten to go to the rescue, but rather wished the Queen and her Favorites in the Staffords case, or that the Duke of York were in England, to aid his Cousen Mortimer, now first acknowledged to be of his kindred) and many of them stole away to the Rebels, whose number from Suffex and Surrey daily increased, whom yet their Captain restraineth from forraging or taking away any thing by force, and so returneth again to Black-heath, where the Kings Army lay the night before, but was now fallen down to Greenwich. And now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Buckingham are sent to expostulate with the Rebels about their demands; to whom Jack Cade gave very good language, but directly affirming no cessation from Arms, unless the King in person would hear the grievances of the Subject, and pass his Princely word for reformation of their wrongs. This resolution of his made known to the King, who was not sure of his own Souldiers Faith, made him march presently away to Killingworth Cattle in Warwickshire, where he fortified himself as expecting a siege, having left the Lord Scales only to guard the Tower. Jack Cade taking advantage of the Kings departure, cometh to Southwark, where he quarters his men, straitly charging them to commit no outrage, nor do wrong to any; which was duly observed. The next morning he marcheth to London Bridge, where he caused his men to cut the Ropes of the Draw-bridge, no resistance being made against him; and so in good order marched up by London-stone, upon which he strook his sword, saying, Now is Mortimer Lord of London. The Maior of London, Sir Thomas Chalton, standing upon the threshold of his door, bade him take heed he attempted nothing against the quiet of the City; To whom he made answer, Let the world take notice of our honest intention by our actions. And indeed this orderly carriage of himself and his company, won him a good opinion amongst the common sort of people; And now assuming to himself the place of Chief, he sendeth out his Letters of safe conduct, to such whom he pleased to make use of; amongst other, he wrote this Letter to Thomas Cock Draper of London.

By this our writing enfealed, we grant, That Thomas Cock of London Draper, shall safely come into our presence, and avoid from us again at his pleasure, with all other persons coming in his company. Subscribed thus.

His Majesties loyal Subject, John Mortimer, Captain Mend-all. Upon Cock's admission, he had private conference with three other that came with him; to whom at their departure he gave these instructions in writing: You shall charge all Lombards and Merchant-strangers, Genoefes Venetians, Florentines, and others, this day to draw themselves together, and to ordain for us the Captain, twelve Harne's compleat of the best fashion, four and twenty Brigandines, twelve Batel-axes, twelve Gloves, six Horses with saddle and bridle compleatly furnished, and a thousand Marks in ready money; and if they shall fail herein, we shall strike off the heads of as many as we can get. But they failed not, but sent him what he had demanded: who thereupon the next morning, being the third of July, returns to London; and presently sends to the Lord Scales, to bring his Prisoner the Lord Say to the Guild-hall, whither he had called the Lord Maior with his brethren; before whom he caused the Lord Say to be arraigned, who craving to be tried by his Peers, was forthwith taken from his Keeper, carried to the Standard in Cheap, and there had his head chapt off, which being pitched upon a Pike, was born before him to Mile-end, whither he went to have conference with the Rebels of Essex; and by the way meeting with Sir James Cromer High Sheriff of Kent, who had lately married the Lord Say's daughter, he caused his head also to be stricken off, and carried likewise before him in derision. The next morning he came again

A again to London; where, after publick execution done upon some of his fellows, and particularly upon a petty Captain of his, named Paris, that had done things contrary to his Proclamation; upon a displeasure taken against Alderman Malpas, he sent and seized upon all his wares and goods, and fined Alderman Horn in five hundred Marks: whereupon, the Citizens finding him to grow every day more insolent then other, they sent to the Lord Scales for assistance, who sanderth Matthew Gout an old fouldier to them, with some Forces and Furnitures out of the Tower; who presently make a stand at the Bridge, where Cade notwithstanding forceth his passage, and then began to set fire on houses, where many aged and impotent people miserably perished; Captain Bough, Alderman, Sutton and Robert Hayson, valiantly fighting, were slain; yet upon a fresh supply, the Londoners recovered the Bridge again, and drove the Rebels beyond the Stoop in Southwark; at which time, both sides being weary, agreed of a Truce, till the next day. After the Retreat Cade finding he had lost many of his best men, was driven, for supply, to set at liberty all the Prisoners in Southwark, aswell Felons as Debtors: when now his company entering into consideration of their danger, and of the desperate services their Captain had brought them to, began to discover by their countenances their willingness to leave this course: whereof the Archbishop of Canterbury having notice, he with the Bishop of Winchester came from the Tower by water to Southwark, and there shewed the Kings General Pardon under the Great Seal of England; which was so welcome to the Rebels, that without taking leave of their Captain, they withdrew themselves that night to their several habitations. Jack Cade with some few followers bent his journey to Quinborough Cattle, where being denied entrance, he disguised himself, and privily fled; but upon Proclamation, with promise of a thousand Marks to any that should bring him dead or alive, he was afterward, by one Alexander Eden Gentleman, attached; and making resistance, in a Garden at Hothfield in Suffex, was there slain; his body was brought to London, beheaded and quartered, his head set upon London-bridge, his quarters dispersed in divers places in Kent. Upon the news whereof, the King sends Commissioners into Kent, to enquire of the abettors of this Rebellion: whither he followeth himself in person, and though five hundred were found guilty, yet eight only were executed. Though London were the chief flage of this Rebellion, yet other Countreys were not free; especially Wilshire, for the Rebels there, upon the nine and twentieth day of June, drew William Askot Bishop of Salisbury, from the High Altar, where he was saying Masse in Edington Church, to the top of the hill; and there in his Priestly robes most inhumanely murdered him.

This Insurrection was not unknown to the King of France, who taking advantage thereof seized upon all places which the English had in France, leaving them nothing but only Callicie, and the Castles of Harnes and Guisnes; and this was the issue of the Duke of Somerset's Regency in France: whereupon coming into England, at a Parliament holden at Westminster, the sixth of November, in the nine and twentieth year of the Kings reign, he was put under Arrest; upon notice whereof, the Commons at London despoiled his house at Blackfriars, and ceased not, till Proclamation was made to prohibit them; for disobeying whereof, there was one man beheaded, at the Standard in Cheap.

At this time, the Duke of York under pretence of coming to the Parliament, comes out of Ireland, and at London had private conference with John Duke of Norfolk, Richard Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Devonshire and other his assured friends; where it was resolved to keep the chief purpose, (the claim to the Crown) secret; and only to make shew, that his endeavours were but to remove ill Counsellors from the King; of whom they instanced in the Duke of Somerset as chief; and hereof, the Duke sent divers letters to the King, complaining of the wrongs the Duke of Somerset had done him, but withall making protestation of his own loyalty. To which the King maketh answer, that he would take his complaints into consideration; but somewhat blames him for the death of the Bishop of Chester, by his means suspected to be slaughtered, and for dangerous speeches uttered by his servants, tending to Rebellion; concluding; that notwithstanding any thing said or done to the contrary, he took and esteemed him a faithful subject, and a loving kinsman. But the Duke of York, not herewith satisfied, departeth into Wales, and there levieth men, making his colour for the good of the Common-wealth: and the removing of bad Counsellors. The King advertised hereof, presently raiseth an Army; and with the Duke of Somerset (now enlarged) marcheth towards Wales: while the Duke of York having notice which way the King came, by another way marcheth toward London; who being told, the Londoners would not admit him entrance; he passed the River Thames at Knight-bridge, marched into Kent, and encamped at Burnt-heath. The King in his pursuit came to Black-heath, and there pitched his Tents, from whence he sent the Bishops of Winchester and Ely, the Lord Rivers, and Richard Andrews, Keeper of the Privy Seal, to know the cause of this commotion, and to make offer of reconciliation, if the Dukes demands were not unreasonable. The Duke made answer, that nothing was intended against the Kings person, his Crown or Dignity: All that was fought, was to remove ill Counsellors from about the King, but especially Edmund Duke of Somerset; whom if the King would be pleased to commit, to ward, till his legal trial might be had in Parliament, he would then not only dismiss his Army, but come unto his presence as a loyal subject. Hereupon the Duke of Somerset is committed to prison: The Duke of York dismisseth his Army, and cometh in person to the King: in whose presence, (contrary to his expectation) he found the Duke of Somerset, which so moved him, that he could not hold, but presently charged him with Treason: which the Duke of Somerset, not only denied, but

Upon this Insurrection in England, the King of France seizeth upon all the English Territories; and leaves the English nothing but Callicie.

but recriminates the Duke of York, to have conspired the Kings death, and the usurpation of the Crown: whereupon, the King removeth to London, the Duke of York as a Prisoner riding before him, and the Duke of Somerset at liberty, which was not a little marvelled at by many. And now the King calleth a Council at Westminster, where the two Dukes are earnest in accusing each other; but while the Council are debating the matter, there comes a flash of lightning out of France, which diverted them; for the Earl of Kendall, and the L. Epsar, came Embassadors from Burdeaux, offering their obedience to the Crown of England, if they might but be assured to be defended by it: but withall, at the same time there came a report, that Edward Earl of March, son and heir to the Duke of York, with a great power was marching towards London. Hereupon matter for a double consultation, and for this latter, it was resolved on, that the Duke of York should in the presence of the King and his Nobility, at the High Altar in Pauls, take his Oath of submission and Allegiance to King Henry: which he accordingly did, and then had liberty to depart to his Castle at Wigmore. And for the former, the Earl of Shrewsbury with about three thousand men was sent into Gascoigne, who arriving in the Isle of Mardre, passed forth with his power, and took Fronsbeck and others pieces, but having received in the night instructions from Burdeaux of certain conspirators, he makes all the speed he can thither, and was entered the Town before the French had notice of his coming; so that many of them were slain by the Lord L. Epsar in their beds. Shortly after there arrived, the Earl of Shrewsbury's son, Sir John Talbot, with the bastard of Somerset, and two and twenty hundred men, by whose means Burdeaux is well manned with English, in which time the Earl was not idle, but went from place to place, to receive the offered submission of all places where he came: and having taken Chavillon, he strongly fortified it, whereupon the French King raiseth an Army, and besiegeth Chavillon, to the rescue whereof, the Earl maketh all possible speed with eight hundred Horse, appointing the Earl of Kendall, and the Lord L. Epsar to follow with the Foot: In his way he surpriseth a Tower the French had taken, and put all within it to the sword; and meeting five hundred French men, that had been foraging, many of them he slew, and the rest he chased to their camp. Upon whose approach the French left the siege, and retired to a place which they had formerly fortified; whither the Earl followeth them, and resolutely chargeth them so home, that he got the entry of the Camp: where being shot through the thigh with an Harquebus, and his horse slain under him; his desireous to relieve his Father, lost his own life, and therein was accompanied with his bastard brother Henry Talbot, Sir Edward Hall, and thirty other Gentlemen of name. The Lord Malin, with threescore other were taken Prisoners, the rest fled to Burdeaux, but in the way a thousand of them were slain. And thus on the last day of July, in the year 1453. at Chavillon, the most valorous Earl of Shrewsbury, the first of that name, after four and twenty years service beyond the Seas, ended his life and was buried at Rouen in Normandy, with this inscription upon his Tomb: Here lieth the right noble Knight John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Westford, Waterford, and Valence, Lord Talbot of Goodrich and Orchenfield, Lord Strange of Blackmere, Lord Verdon of Alton, Lord Cromwell of Winkfield, Lord Lovetoft of Worsoppe, Lord Farnival of Sheffield, Knight of the Noble Orders of St. George, St. Michael, and the golden fleece, great Marshal to King Henry the sixth, of his Realm of France. The Earl of Kendall, the Lords Monferat, Rosaine and Dangledeas entered the Castle of Chavillon, and made it good against the French the space of ten daies; but then having no hope of succour, they delivered it, upon composition to have liberty to depart to Burdeaux: and now the Gascoignes were as ready to open their gates to the French, as they were before to the English; by means whereof, in short time, the French recovered again all Gascoigne except Burdeaux, and that also at length, upon condition that both garrisons and inhabitants with all their substance, might safely depart for England or Callice, and that the Lords L. Epsar and Durant, with thirty others, upon pain of death should never after be found in the Territories of France.

At this time upon St. Bartholomew's day, an ancient custome being, that the Maior of London and the Sheriffs should be present in giving prizes to the best wrestlers; It happened that at the wrestling place near Moore-fields, the Prior of St. Johns was there to see the sports, when a servant of his, not brooking the disgrace to be foyled before his Master, against the custome of the place, would have wrestled again, which the Maior denied; whereupon the Prior fetcht Bow-men from Clarkemwell, to resist the Maior, and some slaughter was committed; the Maiors Cap was shot through with an Arrow, he nevertheless would have had the sport go on, but no wrestlers came, yet the Maior Sir John Norman told his brethren, he would stay a while, to make trial of the Citizens respect towards him: which he had no sooner said, but the Citizens with Banners displayed came in great number to him, and fetcht him home in great triumph. Upon the neck of this began the quarrel in Holborn, between the Gentlemen of the Inns of Chancery, and some Citizens, in appealing whereof, the Queens Attorney and three more were slain.

And now the Duke of York, by all means laboureth to stir up the hatred of the Commons against the Duke of Somerset, repeating often what dishonour England sustained by Somerset's giving up the strong Towns of Normandy, and how he abused the Kings and Queens favour to his own gain, and the Commons grievance; then he addresseth himself to those of the Nobility that could not well brook his too much commanding over the Kings and Queens affection: amongst others he fastneth upon the two Nevills, both Richards, the Father and the Son, the one Earl of Salisbury, the other of Warwick; with whom he deals so effectually, that an indissoluble knot of friendship is knit betwixt them; by whose assistance, (the King lying dangerously sick

A at Clarendon) the Duke of Somerset is arrested in the Queens great Chamber, and sent to the Tower; and in a Parliament now convoked, approached, charged of Treason, and many heinous crimes objected against him: whereupon the King, though weak, is brought to London, of purpose to dissolve the Parliament, and that dissolved, the Duke of Somerset is presently set at liberty again, and not only so, but is made Captain of Callice and Guisnes, the only remainder the English had in France. Upon this, the Duke of York and his party, with a great power, march towards London: against whom, the King attended with the Duke of Somerset, the Duke of Buckingham and his son, both named Humphrey, Henry Earl of Northumberland, James Earl of Wiltshire, Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and two thousand men, marcheth forwards; at S. Albans both Armies meet: the Duke in the morning sends a letter to the King, protesting his fidelity and sincerity, only he desires the Duke of Somerset may be delivered, to stand or fall by the Judgment of his Peers; and this he would have, or dye in the pursuit. The King for answer, commands him to disband, and submit to his mercy, and not expect, that he will deliver any in his Army, who have shewed their loves in standing to him. Herewith the Duke acquaints his friends, who hereupon fall every one to his quarter: The Earl of Warwick fell upon the Lord Clifford's quarter, where the Duke of Somerset halting to the rescue, was slain, and with him the Earl of Northumberland, Humphrey Earl of Stafford, the Lord Clifford, and about five thousand others, besides many that were hurt; the King himself shot in the neck with an arrow; the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Scaler, in the faces; the Earl of Dorset so hurt, that he was fain to be carried home in a Cart: The Kings Army had been increased after his coming forth, to eight thousand; but now they are all dispersed or slain; and the King unguarded, is left in a poor thatched house, whither to be freed from the danger of arrows, he had withdrawn himself. The Duke of York having notice where the King was, goes with Warwick and Salisbury; who all three upon their knees present themselves before him, making humble Petition to him for pardon of what was past: and now, seeing the common Enemy was slain, they had what they aimed at. To whom the King throughly affrighted, said: Let there be no more killing then, and I will do what you will have me. This first battle of S. Albans was fought upon the three and twentieth day of May, in the three and thirtieth year of King Henries reign. The bodies of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford were buried in the Chappel there. And now the Duke of York, in the Kings name, commands a surcease from further hostility: and in all reverent manner conveyeth the King to London; where they keep the feast of Pentecost together; at which time a Parliament is summoned to begin at Westminster, the ninth day of July; and therein it is enacted, that the Duke of Gloucester should be declared publicly a loyal subject, and that none should misreport or dispute the actions of the Duke of York, or of any in his company; and moreover the Duke of York is made Protector of the Kings person, and of the Realm; the Earl of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellor, and the Earl of Warwick Captain of Callice, wherein they all carried themselves with unblameable demeanour.

In this mean time, the Queen not well pleased with these proceedings, seeks all means to incite the Lords of her party, and they as much seek to incite her to make opposition; she puts the Duke of Buckingham in minde that these Traitors had slain his hopeful son at S. Albans; she tells the now Duke of Somerset, that by them his dear Father lost his life: And they again put the Queen in minde of the unsufferable indignity done to her, in making her husband only a King in name, setting a Tutor over him, as though he were a child, whilst the Duke of York and his complices manage all. Upon which incitation, all the Enemies of the Yorkshire Faction are assembled by the Queen at Greenwich; where it is debated of some course to be taken for restoring the King to his former liberty and Government: at length it is concluded, that the Duke of York should be commanded to give over his place of Protectorship, for that the King was of years and discretion sufficient to rule of himself without a Guardian, and the Earl of Salisbury to surrender his place of being Lord Chancellor, for that the great Seal was never delivered him, seeing that which was now used, was made since the Kings restraint, and therefore not sufficient; to which conclusion of theirs, the King easie to be wrought upon, yields his consent, and thereupon they are both discharged from their Offices, and summoned to appear at the Council Table at Greenwich; but the Lords were wiser then to put themselves into their hands, and therefore make answer, that none had power to displace them, nor to command their appearance in any place, but in Parliament: and so they continued about London, placing and displacing whom they pleased, and by their triumphant authority, took John Holland Earl of Exeter out of Sanctuary, and sent him prisoner to Pomfret Castle. These proceedings gave occasion to the licentious multitude to raise commotions, and the Prentices of London upon a very slight occasion, fall upon our landish Merchants, rifle and rob their houses; and the Maior assembling a company of substantial Citizens to suppress them, the King-leader of the disorder flies to Sanctuary, Commissioners are sent to enquire and punish the offence, but when the Maior and Commissioners were set, tidings came that the Commons were up in Arms; whereupon the Commissioners left the business to be proceeded in by the Maior, who so discreetly ordered the matter, that many of the offenders were punished, some by death, others by fine, and all things were quieted and appeased.

At this time the French having little to do against the English in France, would needs be doing something against them in England: They set out two Fleets, one under the conduct of William Lord Pomyers, the other of Sir Peter Bressy; the Lord fell upon Fulney in the West-Countrey, the Knight upon Sandwich in Kent, where some hurt they did, but not of importance to countervail their Voyage.

The Earl of Salisbury going to acquaint the King, is set upon by the Lord Audley.

Who is slain; and his Army defeated.

And now the Queen finding the little respect the Londoners bore to her party or the Kings, persuades the King, as for his health and recreation, to make a progress into Warwickshire, which he did, by the way hunting and hawking, and the Queen making show of minding nothing but pastimes; and this she did, with a purpose the easier to entrap the three Lords of York, Salisbury, and Warwick, to whom she writ most loving letters, earnestly inviting them to be at Coventry by an hour appointed; which they, not doubting any fraud, intended to have done, but hearing by the way of the mischief plotted against them, they caused their Retinue to go on-ward the way to the Court, as though themselves were coming after; but they provided otherwise for their safety, the Duke of York with a Groom and a Page, getting him to Wigmore Castle, the Earl of Salisbury to his Castle of Middleham in the North, and the Earl of Warwick to the Sea-side, and so to Callice; but before they parted, they agreed upon an Alphabet, by which they might have entercourse of letters, yet their intentions kept undiscovered.

The King unwitting of this mischief intended against the Duke of York and his friends, returneth to London, where he calleth a Council, and therein of his own accord, desireth that some course might be invented for a perfect reconciliation of all parties; promising upon his salvation (an asseveration not usual with him) so to entertain the Duke of York and his friends, that all differences should be removed, and a perfect amity on all parts be established: to which end messengers are dispatched to the Duke of York, and all other of his party, commanding them upon urgent affairs of the Realm, and upon Royal promise of safe conduct, to repair to his Court at London, at a day appointed. The Duke of York accordingly came, and with 400 men well apparelled, lodged at his house called Baynard's Castle; the Earl of Salisbury with 500 men, lodged likewise at his house called Herbours; The Duke of Excester (lately released) and the Duke of Somerset with 800 men, were lodged within Temple-Barre; The Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Egremont, and the Lord Clifford with 1500 men were lodged in Holborn; The Earl of Warwick with 600 in red jackets with ragged staves, embroydered behind and before, were lodged at the Gray-Friers in London. Upon the seventeenth of March the King and the Queen came to London, and were lodged at the Bishops Palace; the Maior having five hundred well appointed men in readiness, rode with a competent number all day long round the City, for preservation of the Kings Peace: The Lords lodging within the City, held their Council at Black-Friers; the other, at the Chapter-house at Westminster: Between both, the Reverend Archbishop of Canterbury, the son of Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, with some other of the most able Prelates interceded so, that by their mediation it was at last concluded, that all wrongs and misdemeanours on every side should be forgotten and forgiven, that each side should be friends to the other, and both be obedient to the commands of the King. Besides this in general, there were some particular Articles to be performed by the Duke of York, the Earls of Salisbury, and Warwick, which afterward was ratified under the Great Seal of England, the 24 day of March, in the 36. year of the reign of King Henry the sixth. Upon the publication whereof, a solemn Procession was made in Paul's Church, at which the King was present with his Crown on his head; before him, hand in hand went the Duke of Somerset, and the Earl of Salisbury, the Duke of Excester and the Earl of Warwick, and so one of the one, another of the other part, till they they were all marshalled behind the King came the Queen, the Duke of York leading her by the hand, who in going made shew of favourable countenance towards him: Divine Service ended, they return to the Court, in all outward appearance truly reconciled; but all was dissimbled, as will presently appear; for presently upon this, an affray fell out between a servant of the Earl of Warwick's, and a Courtier, who in the encounter is dangerously wounded; the Earls man flieth; the Kings servants seeing their fellow hurt, and the offender escaped, watch the Earls coming from the Council Table, and assail him; many are hurt, but the Earl getteth a Wherry, and so escapes to London; the Queen incontinently commands the Earl to be committed to the Tower, but he foreseeing the danger, poits to Yorkshire, where he acquaints the Duke of York, and his Father the Earl of Salisbury of all the occurrences, with the palpable discovery of the Queens canker'd disposition, advising them to stand upon their guard, and to provide against the approaching storm. Himself speeds to Callice, and being then Lord Admiral, takes with him all the Kings ships that were in readiness, and scouring the Seas, meets with five great Carricks, three of Genova, and two of Spain, and after two days fight, takes two of them, with which he returned to Callice, where he unloaded their freight, and found it worth ten thousand pounds in Staple commodities, besides the Ships and Prisoners.

In the mean time the Earl of Salisbury, with about five thousand men marcheth through Lancashire, to pass that way to the King, with a purpose to acquaint him with the affront offered to his son, and the inveterate malice discovered in the Queen against him, The Queen with the Dukes of Buckingham and Somerset, hearing of his coming, gave order to the Lord Audley to use means to apprehend him, who thereupon levyeth ten thousand men in Cheshire and Shropshire, and with them about a mile from Draynton, in a plain called Bloreheath, he attended the Earl, there being but a small brook of no great depth between them. Early in the morning the Earl made a seeming Retreat, which the Lord Talbot observing, presently causeth his Troops to pass the River; but before they could be reduced again into order, the Earl with his whole strength, falls upon them, and with the slaughter of the Lord Audley, and most of them that had passed the River, he discomfited the rest, and slew about 24. hundred of them. Sir John and Sir Tho. Nevill Knights, the Earls sons, were forely wounded, who with Sir Thomas Harrington travelling into the North

A North Countrey, were apprehended and sent as prisoners towards Chester; but upon a message from the Marchmen were presently released.

And now the Duke of York thinking fit no longer to conceal his design, makes preparation to take the Field, the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick do the like; and amongst others of approved valour, whom the Earl of Warwick had brought from Callice with him, were two principal noted men, John Blunt, and Andrew Trollop. Likewise the King, with the Dukes of Somerset, and Excester, draws his Forces to Worcester, from whence Richard Beauchamp Bishop of Salisbury is sent to offer the Torkiffs a full and general pardon, if they would lay down Arms, and become loyal Subjects. Whereunto they answered, that there was no trust to the Kings pardons, as long as the Queen had a predominant power; but if they might have assurance of safety, they would express their loyalty, and humbly render themselves at his service. Hereupon the King advanceth nearer, and approaching the Lords Army, caused Proclamation to be made, that whosoever would abandon the Duke of York, should be received to mercy, and have Pardon. Upon this, the night following, Andrew Trollop, with all the Callicians submit to the King, and by him are all the counsels of the Duke of York discovered; which so much discouraged him, that he with his young son, the Earl of Rutland, fled first into Wales, and then into Ireland: The Earls of March, Salisbury and Warwick got into Devonshire, where by the means of John Dynham Esquire (the same man that afterward by King Henry the seventh was made Lord Treasurer of England) they were shippt from Exmouth, to Gernsey, and so to Callice. All the common souldiers the King pardons, only makes exemplary punishment of some few Captains, sends the Dutcheffs of York, and

C her two younger children, to the Dutcheff of Buckingham her sister to be safely kept; and then having spoiled the Town and Castle of Ludlow, he dismiss his Army. And now a Parliament is called at Coventry, wherein the Duke of York, Edward Earl of March his son, Richard Earl of Salisbury, Richard Earl of Warwick, John Lord Clifford, and many other the confederates of the Duke of York, are convict of Treason, and all their lands and goods seized on to the Kings use. Henry Duke of Somerset by the Queens means is made Captain of Callice, whither coming to take possession, he was by reason of Ordinance shot at him from Rice-bank, forced to retire; which the Queen hearing, was so incensed, that in great passion she gave order to make ready all the Kings ships lying at Sandwich, to give assistance to the Duke of Somerset, but the forementioned John Dynham, out of love to the Earl of March, boarded those ships in the harbour, and

D took the Lord Rivers designed Admiral for that service, and carried both him and the ships to Callice, from whence the Earl sayled to Ireland, to the Duke of York, who having conferred and concluded that course to take, he returned to Callice, the new admiral the Duke of Excester not daring to stop his course. Sir Simon Montford was appointed to guard the Cinque Ports, having divers ships under his command to bar the Earl of Warwick's entrance; but the Earl by his espials having perfect intelligence of all passages, fell suddenly upon Sir Simon before his ships were ready, took him prisoner, ranfackt the town of Sandwich, and carried him prisoner and the ships to Callice: By the way he undertood how much the Kentish men desired his return, and longed for his coming; whereupon he came the second time to Sandwich, to whom presently resorted the Lord Cobham and very many Gentlemen of the Countrey: so as now his army was five and twenty

E thousand strong; with which he marched towards London, against whom the Lord Scalers was appointed to go, and with some convenient Troops to assure London: but the Maior directly refused to admit him; whereupon he resorted to the Tower, from whence afterward he did the Londoners no small displeasure. The Earl of Warwick having notice, that his Father the Earl of Salisbury was upon march to meet him, passeth over his men; and without impeachment, joyned with him and his friends near Excester.

The King with the Dukes of Somerset and Buckingham with a great army marcheth towards them, and near to the Town of Northampton both Armies meet: The Earl of March with the advice of the Earl of Warwick prepares for the fight: The Queen (the King more intrentive to devotion then fighting) did the like, the fight continued about two hours, wherein were slain on

F both sides above ten thousand men; but upon the fall of Humphrey Duke of Buckingham, the Kings side was discomfited, and John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, Thomas L. Egremont, John L. Beaumont and some other of account were slain: The Queen with the Duke of Somerset, taking with them the young Prince, fled to the Bishoprick of Durham: The King himself was taken, and as a Prisoner conveyed to London: where the Tower is yielded to the Earl of Warwick; the Lord Scalers in disguised apparel endeavouring to escape, is taken by the water-men, and by them beheaded, and his Corps carelessly left upon the sands. Thomas Thorpe one of the Barons of the Exchequer, in the habit of a Monk, his Crowne shorn, purposing to flee to the Queen, is taken and committed Prisoner to the Tower, and after by the Commons beheaded at High-gate. The Duke of York being advertised of this good success, leaveth Ireland and poits to London, wherein the

G Kings name, he summoneth a Parliament, which being assembled, he in the presence of the Lords in the upper House, placeth himself in the Imperial Seat, and with great boldness laies open his rightful claim to the Crown of England, as being the Son and heir of Anne daughter and heir of Roger Mortimer Earl of March, son and heir of Philippa the sole daughter and heir of Lyonel Duke of Clarence, the third son of Edward the third, and elder brother of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Father of the usurper Henry the fourth, Grandfather to King Henry the Fifth, who was Father to him that at this time untruly stileth himself King Henry the Sixth. And after relating the many miseries that had befallen the Realm since the time of this Usurpation, he concluded, that he would not expect nor desire possession of the Crown, except his descent were indisputable, and his title without exception. This being a business of importance, required deliberation: but in conclusion, the Duke having before-hand prepared the Lords Spiritual, and few of the Nobility being present, that were not of his part, the Burgesses were easily persuaded: and it was generally resolved, and enacted accordingly, that King Henry during his life, should retain the name and honour of a King; that the Duke of York should be proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown, and Protector of the Kings person, his lands and Dominions; and that if at any time, any of King Henrys friends, allies or favourites in his behalf should attempt the disannulling of this Act, that then the Duke should have present possession of the Crown. It is not unworthy the noting, that while the Earl of March was declaring his title in the upper House, it happened in the nether House, that a Crown which hung in the middle of the House, to garnish a Branch to set lights upon, without touch or wind, fell suddenly down: as likewise at the same time fell down the Crown which stood on the top of Dover Castle: a sign, as some thought, that the Crown of the Realm should be changed. Afoons as the Parliament was dissolved; the Duke dispatched Letters into Scotland; requiring in the Kings name, the Queen, the Dukes of Somerset and Exeter, and all other of the Nobility, that remained in the Kingdom, with all speed to repair to his presence in London: but they had other work in hand; for having gotten together of English and Scots, to the number of eighteen thousand, they came marching into England; against whom went the Duke of York with his younger Son the Earl of Rutland, and the Earl of Salisbury, (leaving the King in the custody of the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Warwick;) and approaching near the Queens Army, he was certified by the Scouts, that the enemy far exceeded his power, both in number and in all warlike preparation (he not having in his Army above five thousand men) and thereupon the Earl of Salisbury advised him to retire, and to attend the coming of the Earl of March, who was gone into Wales to raise the March men; but the pride of his former victory made him deaf to all counsel of declining the battle; and so hastened on by his destiny, from Sandall Castle he marcheth on to Wakefield green; where the Lord Clifford on the one side, and the Earl of Wiltshire on the other, were placed in Ambuscado; the Duke of York supposing that the Duke of Somerset who led the battle, had no more Forces then what were with him, undauntedly marcheth towards him: but being entered within their danger, ambushed on both sides brake out upon him, and slew him with three thousand of his men, the rest fled; the Earl of Salisbury is taken prisoner, and harmless Rutland, not above twelve years old, who came thither but to see fashions, is made a sacrifice for his Fathers transgressions, who kneeling upon his knees, with tears begging life, is unmercifully stabbed to the heart by the Lord Clifford, in part of revenge (as he swore) of his Fathers death; and the Queen most unwomanly in cold blood, caused the Earl of Salisbury, and as many as were taken prisoners, to be beheaded at Pomfret Castle, and to have their heads placed on poles, about the Walls of York. Thus died Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, who had taken to Wife Cicely daughter to Ralph Nevill, the first Earl of Westmerland, by whom he had issue, eight sons and four daughters; his eldest son Henry died young, his second son Edward was afterward King of England; his third son Edmund Earl of Rutland, was slain with his father; John Thomas, and William died young, his seventh son George was after Duke of Clarence, his youngest son Richard, surnamed Crouchback, was after King of England. His eldest Daughter was married to Henry Holland Duke of Exeter, his second Daughter Elizabeth was married to John de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, his third Margaret to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, his fourth Ursula died young. This Duke being dead, had his head crowned with a paper Crown, together with many circumstances of disgracing him; but this act of spight was fully afterwards recompensed upon their heads that did it.

The Earl of March hearing of his Fathers death, laboured now so much the more earnestly, in that he laboured for himself; and parting from Shrewsbury whose Inhabitants were most firm unto him, he increased his Army to the number of three and twenty thousand, and presently took the field; and having advertisement that Jasper Earl of Pembroke, with the Earl of Ormond and Wiltshire followed after him with a great power of Welsh and Irish: he suddenly marched back again, and in a plain near Mortimers Cross, on Candlemas day in the morning, gave them battle, where with the slaughter of three thousand and eight hundred, he puts the Earls to flight. Owen Tewitber who had married Queen Katherine, Mother to King Henry the sixth, and divers Welsh Gentlemen were taken, and at Hereford beheaded. Before the battle, it is said, the Sun appeared to the Earl of March like three Suns; and suddenly it joynted altogether in one; for which cause, some imagine, that he gave the Sun in its full brightness, for his badge or Cognizance.

The Queen in the mean time encouraged by the death of the Duke of York, with a power of Northern men marched towards London: but when her Souldiers were once South of Trent, as if the River were the utmost limit of their good behaviour, they fell to forrage the Country in most barbarous manner: Approaching S. Albans, they were advertised that the Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Warwick were ready to give them battle; whereupon the Queens Vaward hasteth to pass through S. Albans; but being not suffered to pass, they encountered with their Enemies in the field called Barnard-beath; who perceiving the main battle to stand still, and not to move; which was done by the treachery of Lovelace, who with the Kentish men had the leading of it: they soon made the Southern men to turn their backs and fly; upon whose flight the rest in doubt of each others well meaning, shifted away; the Lords about the King perceiving the danger, withdrew themselves. Only the Lord Bonville coming in a complemental manner to the King, and

A and saying it grieved him to leave his Majesty, but that necessity for the safeguard of his life enforced it; was importuned, and Sir Thomas Kyrell a Knight of Kent likewise, by the King to stay; he passing his Royal word, that their stay should be no danger to them; upon which promise they stayed, but to their cost: for the Queen hearing that the Commons had beheaded Baron Thorpe at High-gate; she in revenge thereof, caused both their heads to be stricken off at St. Albans: so as there were slaughtered at this battail the full number of three and twenty hundred, but no man of name, but only Sir John Gray, who the same day was made Knight, with twelve other at the Village of Colney.

And now the King was advised, to send one Thomas Hoe, (that had been a Barrister) to the Victors, to tell them; that he would gladly come to them, if with convenience it might be done: whereupon the Earl of Northumberland, appointed divers Lords to attend him to the Lord Clifford's Tent, where the Queen and the young Prince met to their great joy: but it was now observed, as it were in the destiny of King Henry; that although he were a most pious man, yet no enterprise of war did ever prosper, where he was present; that we may know the prosperity of the world to be no inseparable companion to men of Piety. At the Queens request, the King honoured with Knighthood thirty Gentlemen, who the day before had fought against the part where he was: the Prince likewise was by him dubbed Knight, and then they went to the Abbey, where they were received with Anthems, and withall an humble Petition to be protected from the outrage of the loose souldiers, which was promised, and Proclamation made to that purpose, but to small purpose; for the Northern men said, It was their bargain to have all the spoil in every place, after they had passed Trent: and so they robbed and spoiled whatsoever they could come at. The Londoners hearing of this disorder, feeling there was no more assistance in the Kings promise, to keep the Northern men out of their Gares; inso much that when they were sent to, to send over to the Camp certain Cart-loads of Lenten provision; which the Maior accordingly provided: the Commons rose about Cripple-gate, and by strong hand kept the Carts from going out of the City: Hereupon the Maior sends the Recorder to the Kings Council, and withall intreats the Dutcheffs of Bedford, and the Lady Scales to intercede for him to the Queen; and to excuse his not using force, considering how dangerous it might be in these doubtful times, to stir their fury, that would not easily be allayed. It was well advised to send women to intreat a woman, for by this means they prevailed, that some of the Lords of the Council, with a guard of four hundred good souldiers were appointed to go for London, to enquire and certify of these things: when suddenly news was brought, that the Earl of March with a great Army was marching towards them: for the Earl of Warwick having gathered together his scattered troops, and joynted with the Earl of March, they halted towards London, and were joyfully received upon the eight and twentieth day of February; and upon Sunday the second of March, the Earl of Warwick mustred all his Army in St. Johns field, and having call them into a ring, read unto them the agreement of the last Parliament, and then demanded, whether they would have King Henry to reign still? who all cried, No; no: then he asked them, whether they would have the Earl of March eldest son of the Duke of York (by that Parliament proclaimed King) to reign over them? who with a great clamor cried, Yea, yea: Then went there certain Captains, and others of the City, to the Earl of March at Baynards Castle, at acquaint him with what was passed; who at first seemed to excuse himself, as unable to execute so great a charge: but animated by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London and Exeter, and the Earl of Warwick, he at last consented to take it upon him; and thereupon, the next morning he went in Procession to Pauls, and offered there, and after Te Deum sung, he was in great state conveyed to Westminster, and there in the great Hall, seated in the Kings seat, with the Scepter of St. Edward in his hand; and then again the people, of whom there was a great concourse, were aloud demanded, if they would acknowledge him to be their King? to which with great willingness they all cried, Yea, yea. Then taking Homage of divers Noblemen there present, he was with Procession and great solemnity conveyed to the Abbey, and placed in the Quire as King, whilst Te Deum was singing: That done, he offered at St. Edwards Shrine, and then returned by water to Pauls, and was lodged in the Bishops Palace; and upon the fourth of March he has generally Proclaimed King, by the name of Edward the Fourth. And here in the course of all Writers, ends the Reign of King Henry the Sixth; that it may be truly said, never any came to be King so soon after his birth, nor left to the King so long before his death; for he came to be King at eight moneths old, and he left to be King, living twelve years after. There was indeed in that space of time, a certain Vicissitude, sometimes a King, and sometimes no King; the passages whereof must be related in the following Kings Reign.

No enterprise of war ever prospered where King Henry was present.

Of his Taxations.

IN the first year of his Reign, a Parliament was holden at London, where the Queen Mother with the young King in her lap came and sat amongst the Lords; and there was then granted a Subsidy of five Nobles upon every sack of Wool that should pass out of the Land, for three years, but if carried out by Merchant strangers, then to pay three and forty shillings for every sack. In the third year of his Reign, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, wherein was granted a Subsidy of twelve pence in the pound of all Merchandize coming in, or passing out of the Realm, and three shillings of a Ton of Wine, for the term of three years. In his sixth year, in a Parliament at Westminster was granted a Subsidy, of every Ton of Wine three shillings, and of other Merchandize, except Wool, Fell, and Cloth, twelve pence in the pound: Also of every Parish through the Realm (except Cities, and Boroughs) the Benefice being in value ten Marks, Ten of that Parish should pay six shillings eight pence; and of every Benefice of the value of ten pounds, ten Parishioners should pay thirteen shillings four pence, and so ratably of every Benefice, from the lowest to the highest. And for the Inhabitants of Cities and Boroughs, every man being worth twenty shillings above his household-stuffe, and the apparel of him and his wife, should pay four pence, and so after that rate to the richest.

Of Lawes and Ordinances in his time.

IN the 32 year of this King, the Lord Maior of London first began to go by water to Westminster to take his Oath, where before they used to go by land. Also in this Kings Reign the Art of Printing was first found at Mogunce in Germany, by a Knight called John Cutenberghen, and brought into England by William Caxton of London Mercer, who first practised the same in the Abby at Westminster in the year 1471. In the 23 year of his Reign, in the Parliament then holden, it was Enacted, that when wheat was sold for six shillings eight pence the quarter, Rye for four shillings, and Barley for three shillings; it should be lawful for any man to carry the said kinds of Corn, into the parts beyond the Sea without licence, so it were not to the Kings enemies or Rebels; which act was afterward confirmed by King Edward the Fourth.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

A Great Shism was in the Church in this Kings time by reason of Anti-Popes; for remedy whereof, a Council is called at Constance, to which the Emperours of Constantinople and Trablizon send their Ambassadors. In this Council John the three and twentieth is convened, condemned, deposed, and imprisoned. Gregory the twelfth, and Benedict the thirteenth are deprived, and Otho Colonna, by the name of Martin the fifth, is chosen Pope. During these confusions in the Western Church, the Christians in the Eastern Church are utterly ruined: The Emperour smothered to death in a preas of people, and the great City of Constantinople won by the Turk, made ever since the seat of his Empire. In the six and thirtieth year of this King, Reynold Peacock Bishop of Chichester, who had laboured many years in translating the holy Scripture into English, was accused and convicted, for holding and publishing certain opinions at that time held Heretical, which at last openly at Pauls Cross he revoked; that he had held, there was no necessity to believe that Christ descended into Hell; also no necessity to believe in the Communion of Saints, or that the Universal Church cannot erre in matters of Faith, or that it is necessary to believe and hold whatsoever a General Council shall determine: Also that he had held, that spiritual persons ought to have no Temporal Possessions, and that personal Tythes were not due by Gods Law: These Points he openly renounced; but was notwithstanding deprived of his Bishoprick; only a certain Pension was assigned him to live on in an Abby, where soon after he died.

Works of Piety done by him, or others in his time.

THE King himself founded two famous Colledges, the one in Cambridge, to our Lady and St. Nicholas, called the Colledge Royal, or the Kings Colledge; the other of Eaton besides Windsor, called of our blessed Lady; to the maintenance whereof, he gave 3400 pounds by year. In the 28 year of his Reign, his Queen Margarets began the Foundation of Queens Colledge in Cambridge. In the time of his Reign also, Henry Chicheley Archbishop of Canterbury founded two Colledges in Oxford; one called All-Souls Colledge, the other Bernard Colledge. In his time also, Humphrey Duke of Gloucester (but others say, Thomas Kenpe Archbishop of Canterbury) built the Divinity School in Oxford; also the said Archbishop built Pauls Cross in form as now it standeth; and William Wynter Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor of England founded Mary Magdalen Colledge in Oxford. In his seventeenth year, Ralph Lord Cromwell, builded

In his ninth year, John Wells Maior of London, caused the Conduit commonly called the Standard in Cheap, to be builded. In his first year, the West Gate of London, sometime called Chamberlain-Gate, and now Newgate, was begun to be new builded by the Executors of Sir Richard Whittington Lord Maior of London. In his fifth year, John Reynell Maior of London, gave certain lands to the City of London, for which the City is bound to pay for ever, all Fifteens that shall be granted to the King, (so as it pass not three Fifteens in one year) for three Wards in London; namely, Doughty-Ward, Billingsgate-Ward, and Algate. Also this year, the Tower at the Draw-bridge of London was begun by the same Maior. In his four and twentieth year, Simon Eyre Lord Maior of London builded the Leaden-Hall in London, to be a Storehouse for Grain and Fuel for the poor of the City, and a fair Chappel at the East end of the same, leaving in stock a thousand pounds, which afterward a King Edward the Fourth borrowed and never paid it again. Also in this Kings time, William de la Poole Duke of Suffolk, and Alice his Wife, Daughter to Thomas Chawcer, Son to Geoffrey Chawcer the famous Poet, translated and encreased the Manour place of Ewelme in Oxfordshire, and builded new the Parish Church of Ewelme, and an Hospital or Almshouse for two Priests, and thirteen poor men, to which he gave three Manours, Ramruge in Hamphire, Cokene in Wiltshire, and Merth in Buckinghamshire: They also founded the Hospital of Donington Cattle.

Casualties happening in his time.

IN his fifth year was so unreasonable weather, that it rained almost continually, from Easter to Michaelmas. In his seventh year, the eight of November, the Duke of Norfolk was like to have been drowned passing through London-Bridge, his Barge being set upon the piles, overwhelmed so, that thirty persons were drowned, and the Duke with others that escaped, were fain to be drawn up with ropes. In his 17 year, was so great a dearth of Corn that people were glad to make them bread of Fern-roots. In his 18 year, all the Lyons of the Tower died: Also in this year, the 18 day of July, the Postern-Gates of London by East-Smithfield against the Tower of London, sank by night more then seven foot in the earth. In his two and twentieth year, on New-years day, near unto Bedford, a very deep water, which ran betwix the Towns of Swellstone and Harleswood, stood suddenly still, and divided it self, so that by the space of three miles, the bottom remained dry: which wonder, many thought to signifie the division of the people, and falling away from the King, which happened shortly after. In the three and thirtieth year of his Reign, besides a great Blazing Star, there happened a strange sight, a monstrous Cock came out of the Sea, and in the presence of a multitude of people at Portland, made a hideous crowing three times, each time turning about clapping his wings, and beckning towards the North, the South, and the West; as also many prodigious births. In his six and thirtieth year, in a little Town in Bedfordshire, it rained blood, whereof the red drops appeared in sheets hung out to dry.

Of his Wife and Issue.

HE married Margaret Daughter of Rayner Duke of Anjou, and Titular King of Jerusalem, Sicellie, and Arragon; by whom he had small Portion, and little strength of Alliance; yet might have been a good match, if they could have changed conditions with one another, that he might have had her active and stirring spirit, and she his soft and milde disposition; She was his Wife six and twenty year, and after her husband's depulsion from the Regal Throne, his Forces being vanquished at the Battel of Tewksbury, in a poor Religious house whither she had fled for safety of her life, was taken Prisoner and carried captive to London, where she remained in durance, till Duke Rayner her Father purchased her liberty, unto whom she returned, and lastly died in her native Country. By her, King Henry had issue only one Son named Edward, who when the day was lost at Tewksbury, fought to escape by flight, but being taken, was brought into the presence of King Edward; whose resolute answers provoked K. Edward so much, that he dashed him on the mouth with his Gantlet, and then Richard the Crouchback ran him into the heart with his Dagger; his body was buried amongst the poor persons there slain, in the Monastical Church of the Black-Friers in Tewksbury.

Of his Death and Burial.

UPON King Edward's recovering the Crown, he was committed to the Tower; where the 21 of May, in the year 1472, he was murdered by the bloody hand of Richard Duke of Gloucester; the day after, he was brought to Pauls Church in an open Coffin bare-faced, where he bled; thence carried to the Black-Friers, where he also bled; from thence in a Boat to Chertsey Abbey, without Priest or Clerk, Torch or Taper, saying or singing, and there buried; but afterward at the appointment of King Edward, was removed to Windsor, and there interred, and a fair Monument made over him.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was well tall of stature, spare and slender of body, of a comely countenance, and all parts well proportioned. For endowments of his mind, he had virtues enough to make him a Saint, but not to make him a God, as Kings are said to be gods; for of that commanding power there being two parts, Parcere subiectis, & debellare superbo; he wanted the latter. He was not sensible of that which the world calls Honour, accounting the greatest honour to consist in humility; His greatest imperfection was, that he had in him too much of the Log, and too little of the Stork; for he would not move, but as he was moved, and had rather be devoured; then he would devour. He was not so stupid, not to know prosperity from adversity; but he was so devout, to think nothing adversity; which was not a hindrance to Devotion: He was fitter for a Priest than a King, and for a Sacrifice than a Priest: and he could not choose but die a Martyr, who all his life had been a Confessor. He had one immunity peculiar to himself, that no man could ever be revenged of him, seeing he never offered any man injury. By being innocent as a Dove, he kept his Crown upon his head so long; but if he had been wise as a Serpent, he might have kept it on longer. But all this is not sufficient, if we express not in particular his several virtues: So modest, that when in a Christmas, a shew of women was presented before him with their breasts laid out, he presently departed; saying, Fie, fie for shame, forsooth you be too blame. So pitiful, that when he saw the quarter of a Traitor over Cripplegate, he caused it to be taken down; saying, I will not have any Christian so cruelly handled for my sake. So free from swearing, that he never used other oath but forsooth, and verily; So patient, that to one who strook him when he was taken prisoner, he only said, Forsooth you wrong your self more then me, to strike the Lords anointed: So devout, that on principal Holy-days he used to wear sackcloth next his skin: Once for all, let his Confessor be heard speak, who in ten years confession never found that he had done or said any thing, for which he might justly be enjoined Penance. For which causes King Henry the Seventh would have procured him to be Canonized for a Saint, but that he was prevented by death, or perhaps because the charge would have been too great, the Canonization of a King being much more costly then of a private person.

Of Men of Note in his time.

THESE were men of valour in this Kings Reign, of extraordinary eminency; as first, John Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, who when a French Lord upbraided him, that his sword was of lead; he made him answer, and made him feel that it was of steel. Next him was Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, whose very name was a sufficient charm to daunt a whole French Army. Then the next was John Lord Talbot, so great a terror to the French, that when the women would still their children from crying, they would use to say, Talbot comes. Then was Richard Nevill Earl of Warwick, so much greater then a King, as that which makes, is greater then that it makes; and such a one was he. Many other besides these, not much inferior to these; that we may truly say, there never was a more heroical King of England then Henry the fifth: nor ever a King of England that had more heroical Subjects, then Henry the sixth. And though Arms and Letters seem to be of different conditions, yet they commonly grow up and flourish together; as in this Kings Reign, were John Leland surnamed the Elder, who wrote divers Treatises for instruction of Grammarians: William White a Priest of Kent, professing the Doctrine of Wickliffe, for which he suffered Martyrdom by fire: Alexander Carpenter, who wrote a Book called De virtutibus vitorum, against the Prelates of that time: Peter Bassett Esquire of the Privy Chamber to King Henry the fifth, whose life he wrote: John Pole a Priest, who wrote the life of St. Walburge an English woman: Also, Thomas Walden, alias Netter, who wrote divers Treatises against the Wickliff: Peter Clerk, a Student in Oxford, and a defender of Wickliffe's doctrine; for which he died: and was put to death beyond Sea: Thomas Walsingham born in Norfolk, a diligent Historiographer: Thomas Kingstead the younger, an excellent Preacher, who wrote divers Treatises: Thomas Rudborne a Monk of Winchester, and an Historiographer: Peter Payne an earnest professor of Wickliffe's Doctrine, for which he fled into Bohemia: Nicholas Upton a Civilian, who wrote of Heraldry, of colours in Armory, and of the duty of Chivalry: John Capgrave born in Kent, an Augustine Friar, who wrote many excellent Treatises, particularly the Legend of English Saints: Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, Protector of the Realm, well learned in Astrologie, whereof he wrote a special Treatise intituled Tabula Directionum: John Wetherhamstead, otherwise called Frummentarius, Abbot of St. Albans, who wrote divers Treatises; and amongst others, a book of the Records of things happening whiles he was Abbot, which book Holingshead had seen, and in some passages of his time followed: Roger Oteley accused of Treason for practising with the Lady Eleanor Cobham by sorcery to make the King away; and thereof condemned, and died for it: he wrote one Treatise intituled Contra vulgi superstitiones; and another, De sua Innocentia: Henry Walsingham a Carmelite Friar of Norwich, who wrote sundry Treatises in Divinity: John Ladgate a Monk of Bury, who had travelled France and Italy to learn languages, and wrote many works in Poetry: Thomas Beckington Bishop of Bath, who wrote against the Law Salique of France: Michael

THE REIGN OF KING EDWARD THE FOURTH.

Edward Earl of March, born at Roan in Normandy, son and heir of Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, slain in the battel at Wakefield, succeeded his Father in the Right, but exceeded him in the possession of the Crown of England; and that by vertue of an Act of Parliament lately made; wherein the said Duke of York not only was declared heir apparent to the Crown, and appointed Protector of the King and Kingdom; but it was further enacted, that if King Henry, or any in his behalf, should attempt the disannulling of this Act; that then the said Duke or his heir should have the present possession: which because his friends attempted to do, therefore justly doth Edward Earl of March his son, by vertue of this Act, take possession of the Crown; and is proclaimed King of England, by the name of Edward the fourth, through the City of London, on the fifth day of March, in the year 1460. But before he could have leisure to be Crowned, he was forced once again to try his fortune in the field by battel: For King Henry in the North was raising a new Army, against whom King Edward, upon the twelfth of March, marched with his Forces from London, and by easie journeys came to Pimfret Castle, from whence the Lord Fitzwater was sent to guard the passage at Ferrilbridge, to stop the Enemies approach that way; King Henry likewise advanceth forward, sending his power under the conduct of the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whilst himself with his Queen and son stay at York. The Lord Clifford very early on Palm-sunday, with a troop of Northern men, falls upon those that guarded Ferrilbridge, and defeated them with the slaughter of the Lord Fitzwater and the Battard of Salisbury. The Earl of Warwick hearing of this defeat, comes posting to King Edward's Camp, and in his presence killing his Horse, protested his resolution to stand with him to the death. Upon this resolution of the Earls, the King made presently Proclamation, that all who were afraid to fight, should at their pleasure depart; but to those that would stay, he promised good reward, adding withal, that if any that stayed, should after turn his back or flee, then he that should kill him, should have double pay. After this he gave order to the Lord Fauconbridge, and Sir Walter Blunt, to lead on the Vaward; who in their march about Darningdale, encountered with the Lord Clifford; (who formerly in cold-bloud had slaughtered the young Earl of Rutland;) and he being stricken into the throat with an Arrow (some say) without a head; and presently dying: the Lord Nevill son and heir of the Earl of Westmerland was also slain, with most of their Companies, and the rest put to flight. The next day likewise (the Duke of Norfolk being dangerously sick, to whom that place was assigned) G Fauconbridge and Blunt continue the leading of the Vaward-guard; and on Palm-sunday, by break of day, they came to a plain field between Tonton and Saxton, from whence they made a full survey of King Henry's Army, and certified King Edward, that the Enemy was threescore thousand strong; where his Army was but forty thousand and six hundred: Whereupon a second Proclamation was made through the Camp, that no quarter should be kept, nor prisoner taken. The Armies being both in fight, the Lord Fauconbridge gave direction to the Archers (upon a signal by him given) to shoot every man a flight-arrow (for that purpose provided) and then to fall back three strides, and stand. The Northern men in the mean time plyed their Bows till till all their sheaves were empty; but their Arrows fell short of the Enemy by threescore yards; and not only did no hurt to the Enemy, but did hurt to themselves; for their Arrows being spent, and coming to hand-blows, their own Arrows sticking in the ground, galled their thighs, and pierced their feet. Ten hours the battle continued doubtful; till the Earl of Northumberland being slain, with the Lord Beaumont, Gray, Daerres, and Wells, Sir John Nevill, Andrew Trollop, and many other Knights and Esquires; the Earls of Exeter and Somerset fled, leaving the Countess to King Edward, but the bloudest that ever England felt, for there fell that day six and thirty thousand seven hundred threescore and sixteen persons, no prisoners being taken but the Earl of Devonshire. The battle ended, King Edward hails to York, where he caused the heads of his Father and other friends to be taken down and buried with their bodies, setting in their places the heads of the Earl of Devonshire, and three other, there at that time executed. The Earl of Somerset acquainting King Henry with this overthrow, persuades him with his Queen the King of Scots, who comforteth them with promise of relief, but maketh a sure bargain, for in lieu of a pension to be allowed King Henry during his abode there, the Town and Castle of Berwick were delivered to him. Queen Margaret and her son are sent into France, who obtained of Lewis the eleventh her Cousin, that all of King Edward's friends were prohibited stay or traffique in the French Kings Dominions: but all King Henries friends might live there freely. After this, King Edward comes to London; and upon his entrance to the Tower, makes four and twenty Knight, and the next day four more; and upon the 28 day of June, in the year 1461. he rode from the Tower to Westminster, and was there Crowned in the Abbey Church.

Shortly after, a Parliament is summoned, which began at Westminster the fourth of November; In which, all Acts of King Henry the sixth prejudicial to King Edward's Title, are repealed: and therein John Earl of Oxford, a valiant and wise man, (he who in a former Parliament had disputed the question concerning the precedency of Temporal and Spiritual Barons, a bold attempt in those dayes; and by force of whose Argument, Judgement was given for the Lords Temporal) with his Son Aubrey de Vere, Sir Thomas Tiddingham Knight, William Tyrrell, and Walter Montgomery Esquires, were, without answer, convicted of Treason, and beheaded. And to encourage others to well deserving, King Edward at this time advanced many in honour: his brother George he created Duke of Clarence; his brother Richard, Duke of Gloucester, John Lord Mowbray Brother to the Earl of Warwick, he made first Viscount, then Marquess Montacute; Henry Bourchier Brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury, is made Earl of Essex; and William Lord Fauconbridge, Earl of Kent. And now their new honours are presently put into employment; the Earl of Essex and Kent, accompanied with the Lords Audely and Glinton, Sir John Howard, Sir Richard Walgrave, and others, to the number of ten thousand, are appointed to scour the Seas, who landed in Britain, took the Town of Conquet, and the Isle of Bee, and then returned. At this time Henry Duke of Somerset, Ralph Percy, and divers others came in, and humbly submitted themselves to King Edward's mercy; who protested his propension of freely pardoning them, and as many other that would submit themselves as they did.

All this time King Henry was in Scotland, and Queen Margaret in France; where she obtained of the French King, a company of five hundred men; with whom she sailed towards Newcastle, and landed at Tynmouth, but suddenly again returned, and was her self by tempest beaten to Berwick, but her company was driven on the shore before Bamburgh Castle; where they set their Ships on fire, and fled to an Island called Holy Island; but were so assailed there, by the Bastard Ogle and John Manners Esquire, that many of them were slain, and almost four hundred taken prisoners, only their Colonel Peter Bessie happened upon a Fisherman, who brought him to Berwick to Queen Margaret, and by her was made Captain of the Castle of Alnwick, which he with his French men kept, till they were rescued. Shortly after, Queen Margaret having gotten together a great company of Scots, and other of her friends, bringing her husband with her, and leaving her son at Berwick, entered Northumberland, took the Castle of Bamburgh, made Captain thereof Sir Ralph Grey; and then came forward to the Bishoprick of Durham: whither he returned to her the lately reconciled, and now again revolted Duke of Somerset, Sir Ralph Percy, and divers others, who altogether made a competent Army. King Edward, hearing hereof, makes preparation both by Sea and Land; and first he sends Viscount Montacute with some Companies into Northumberland; whom he in person followeth with his whole power: The Viscount marcheth towards King Henry, and by the way encountereth the Lord Hungerford at Hedgesmoore, but he, with Lord Basse, upon the first charge ran away, leaving Sir Ralph Darcy alone with his own Regiment, who there valiantly fighting, died. After this the Viscount understanding that King Henry was incamped in Levels-plain, near the River of Douel in Hexhamshire, marcheth thither by night, and set upon him in his Camp, whose charge the Northern men receive with a desperate resolution, but were in the end with great slaughter overcome. Henry Beaumont Duke of Somerset, the Lord Basse, Molins, Hungerford, Wentworth, Hussey, and Sir John Pindern Knight, with many others are taken prisoners: King Henry himself by the swiftness of his Horse escaped, but very hardly, for one of his Hench-men that followed him was taken, who had on his head, King Henries Helmet, or as some say, his high Cap of Estate, called Auncer, garnished with two rich Crowns, which was presented to King Edward at York the fourth of May. The Duke of Somerset was beheaded presently at Hexam; the other Lords and Knights were had to Newcastle, and there

A there, after a little respite, were likewise put to death. Besides these, divers others, to the number of five and twenty, were executed at York, and in other places. This Duke of Somerset was never married, but had a natural son named Charles Somerset, who was afterward created Earl of Worcester, Sir Humphrey Nevill, and William Talbot calling himself Earl of Kymer, Sir Ralph Grey, and Richard Tunstall, with divers others that escaped from this battle, hid themselves in secret places; but yet not so closely, but that they were espied and taken. The Earl of Kymer was apprehended in Riddesdale, and brought to Newcastle, and there beheaded; Sir Humphrey Nevill was taken in Holderness, and at York lost his head. After this battle called Exam-field, King Edward came to the City of Durham, and sent from thence into Northumberland, the Earl of Warwick, the Lord Montacute, the Lords Fauconbridge and Scrope, to recover such Castles as his Enemies there held; which they effected; and taking in the Castle of Dunstunburgh, they found in it John Goss servant to the Duke of Somerset, who was brought to York, and there beheaded: and taking in the Castle of Bamburgh, they found in it Sir Ralph Grey, whom because he had sworn to be true to King Edward, and was now revolted to King Henry; they degraded from his order of Knighthood at Doncaster, by cutting off his gilt Spurs, renting his Coat of Arms, and breaking his sword over his head, and then beheaded him.

In this mean time, King Henry (upon what occasion, no man knows; but only led by the hand of destiny) venturing in disguise, to come into England, and shifting from place to place, was at length discovered, and taken by one Cantlow, or as others say, by Thomas Talbot, son to Sir Edward Talbot of Bishall, who deceived him, being at his dinner at Wadlington Hall in Lincolnshire, and brought him towards London, with his legs tied under the horse belly; in whose company were also taken Doctor Manning Dean of Windsor, D. Bedle, and one Elerton, whom the Earl of Warwick met by the way, and brought them all to the Tower of London; whilst the distressed Queen with her son, once again is driven to fly for shelter into France; whither the new Duke of Somerset and his brother John failed also, where they lived in great misery; and the Earl of Pembroke went from Countrey to Countrey little better then a Vagabond.

At this time, King Edward to reward his followers, distributeth the Lands and Possessions of those that held with King Henry amongst them, but first made Proclamation that whatsoever of the contrary faction would come in and submit, should be received to Grace, and restored to their Patrimonies.

D In the fourth year of King Edward, in Michaelmas Term were made eight Serjeants at Law, Thomas Toun, Nicholas Geney, Richard Neal, Thomas Brian, Richard Pigot, John Catesby, and Guy Fax; who held their Feast in the Bishop of Ely's place in Holborn, where the Lord Grey of Ruthin then Lord Treasurer of England, was placed before the Lord Mayor of London, being invited to the Feast, which gave such a distaste to the Mayor, that he presently departed with the Aldermen and Sheriffs without tasting of their Feast: and it was registered to be a precedent in time to come.

And now King Edward no less intentive to perform the Office of a King in peace, then he had been before of a Captain in war, considering with himself, that seditions and civil dissensions must needs breed disorders in a State, and that disorders bred by troubled times, are not like troubled waters, that will in time settle of themselves and recover clearness; but are rather like weeds, which once springing up and let alone, will in time over-run the whole ground where they grow: He like a good Gardiner seeks to weed them out before they grow too rank, and endeavours to make a general reformation of abuses; and to that end in Michaelmas Term in the second year of his reign, three daies together he sate publicly with his Judges in Westminster Hall on the Kings Bench, to acquaint himself with the Orders of that Court, and to observe what needed Reformation in it, either at Bench or at Barr: as likewise he ordered the Officers of his Exchequer to take more moderate Fees; and to be more intentive to the benefit of the Subject, then to their own unjust gain: He also daily frequented the Council Table; which he furnished for the most part, with such as were gracious amongst the Citizens, whom he employs about references and businesses of private consequence; whilst mysteries of State were intimated only to such whom he selected to be of his more private Cabinet Council; by whom he being now of the age of three and twenty years, was advised that it was now time to provide for posterity, by taking a Wife, and to provide also for the present time, by taking a fit Wife, which they conceived to be no where so fitly found as in France; both thereby to bury old grudges between the two Nations, and also to avert assistance from Queen Margaret, the only disturber of the State; and this being concluded, it only remained to make choice of a fit man for that employment, for which none was thought so fit as Richard Nevill Earl of Warwick; he therefore is presently sent into France, to treat of a Marriage to be had between King Edward and the Lady Bona, daughter to Lewis Duke of Savoy, and sister to the Lady Carlote then Queen of France; a Lady, no less for beauty and virtuous qualities, then for Nobility of blood, worthy to be a Queen. The Proposition is in France readily embraced, and willingly assented unto on all parts. But in the mean time King Edward being hunting in Vichwood Forrest besides Stony-stratford; he chanced to come to the Manour of Grafton, where the Dutcheff of Bedford then lay, and where her daughter by Sir Richard Wydeville, the Lady Elizabeth Gray, Widow of Sir John Gray of Groby, slain at the last battail of St. Albans; became a suitor to him for some lands which her husband had given her in joynture; with whose beauty and graceful behaviour, King Edward was so taken, that he presently became a Suitor to her; and when he could not obtain his suit by terms of wanton love, he was forced to seek it by terms of Marriage.

And here we may well think there was no small conflict in King Edward's mind, between the two great Commanders, Love and Honour, which of them should be most potent; Honour put him in mind that it was against his Law, to take to wife a meaner person than himself; but Love would take no notice of any difference of degrees, but took it for his Prerogative to make all persons equal: Honour perswaded him that it stood him much upon to make good the Ambassage, in which he had sent the Earl of Warwick to a great Prince; but Love perswaded him, that it stood him more upon to make good the Ambassage sent to himself from a greater Prince: In conclusion, it appeared to be true which one observes, Improbe amor quid non mortalitas petita cogit? What is it that Love will not make a man to do? Whether it be, that Love brings upon the mind a forgetfulness of all circumstances, but such as tend to its own satisfaction; or whether it be that Love is amongst Passions, as Oyls amongst Liquors, which will alwaies be supreme and at the top; Honour may be honoured, but Love will be obeyed: And therefore King Edward though he knew no Superior upon earth, yet he obeys the summons of Love; and upon the first day of May marries the said Lady Gray at Grafton; the first of our Kings Since the Conquest that married his Subject: At which marriage none was present but the Dutchesse of Bedford, the Priest, two Gentlewomen, and a young man to help the Priest at Mass: The year after with great solemnity she was Crowned Queen at Westminster. It is not unworthy the relating the speech which King Edward had with his Mother, who fought to cross this match: "Whereupon" say, (saith he) that she is a Widow, and hath already Children, by Gods blessed Lady, I am a Bachelor, and have some too, and so each of us hath a proof, that neither of us is like to be barren: And as for your objection of Bigamy, (for his Mother had charged him with being contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie) Let the Bishop (saith he) lay it to my charge, when I come to take Orders, for I understand it is forbidden a Priest, but I never with it was forbidden a Prince. Upon this marriage, the Queens Father was created Earl Rivers, and made High Constable of England; his Brother the Lord Anthony, was married to the sole Heir of the Lord Scales, and by her had that Barony; her Son Sir Thomas Gray was created Marquess Dorset, and married Cicely, Heir to the Lord Bonville. It may be thought a happy fortune for this Lady to be thus matched; but let all things be considered, and the miseries accreting to her by it, will be found equivalent, if not over-weighing all the benefits: For first, by this match she drew upon her self the envie of many, and was the cause that her Husband fled the Realm, and herself in his absence glad to take Sanctuary, and in that place to be delivered of a Prince, in a most unprincipally manner. After which, surviving her Husband, she lived to see her two Sons most cruelly murdered; and for a conclusion of all, she lived to see her self confined to the Monastery of Broomfield in Southwark, and all her goods confiscated by her own Son in Law.

And now the Earl of Warwick at his return, found that knot tied in England, which he had laboured to tie in France: His Ambassage frustrated, the Lady Bona deluded, the King of France abused, and himself made a stale, and the disgraceful instrument of all this, which although he resented in a high degree, yet he had not been a Courtier so long, but in that time he had sufficiently learned the Art of dissembling; he passed it over lightly for the present, but yet carried it in his mind till a fit opportunity; and thereupon procures leave to retire himself to his Castle of Warwick.

King Edward in the mean time, having just cause to suspect he had made the French his enemies, seeks to make other Princes his friends: He enters into a League with John King of Aragon, to whom he sent for a Present a score of Cotfall Ews, and five Rams, a small Present in shew, but great in the event; for it proved of more benefit to Spain, and of more detriment to England then could at first sight have been imagined. And to secure himself at home, he took truce with the King of Scots for fifteen years. And where he had married before his two Sisters, Anne the eldest to Henry Holland Earl of Exceter; and Elizabeth to John de la Poole Duke of Suffolk, he now matched Margaret his third Sister, to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, which proved a greater assistance to him, then that which he had lost in France.

By this time the Earl of Warwick's spleen began so to swell within him, that he could no longer contain it; and having with much ado drawn to his party his two Brothers the Archbishop of York, and the Marquess Montacute; he seeks also to draw in the Kings two Brothers, the Duke of Clarence and the Duke of Gloucester; but he found Gloucester so reserved, that he durst not close with him; the Duke of Clarence he found more open, and to him he addresseth himself, complaining of the disgrace he had sustained by the King, in his employment into France, and other wrongs: to whom the Duke presently made answer, in as great complaint of his Brothers unkindness to himself; saying, he had married his Wives Brother Anthony to the Heir of the Lord Scales, and her Son Thomas to the Heir of the Lord Bonville, but could find no match of preference for him being his own Brother: And upon this agreement in complaints, they agree to joyn against King Edward; and to make the knot the firmer, the Duke of Clarence takes to Wife Isabel the Earl of Warwick's Daughter, and with her hath assured unto him half of the Lands the Earl held in right of his Wife, the Lady Anne, Daughter of Richard Beauchamp Earl of Warwick deceased. Upon this marriage the Earl of Warwick discovered to him what hitherto he had concealed, concerning his project for the restoring of King Henry; to which Clarence gave approbation, with promise to assist him in it to his uttermost.

At

A At this time Sir Thomas Cooke late Maior of London, was by one Hankins appeached of Treason, for the which he was sent to the Tower, and his place in London seized by the Lord Rivers. The case was this, the said Hankins came to Sir Thomas, requesting him to lend a thousand Marks upon good surety; who answered, he would first know for whom it should be, and for what intent; matter rested two or three years, till the said Hankins was laid in the Tower, and brought to the Brake, called the Duke of Exeters Daughter; by means of which pain, he confessed amongst others things, the motion he had made to Sir Thomas Cooke, and accused himself to farre, that he was put to death. Sir Thomas Cooke lying in the Tower from Whitsuntide till Michaelmas, had his place in Essex named Gyddihall, spoiled, his Deer in his Park destroyed; and though arraigned upon life and death, he were acquitted of the Indictment; yet could not be delivered till he had paid eight thousand pounds to the King, and eight hundred to the Queen.

B And now the Earl of Warwick sendeth to his Brothers the Archbishop and the Marquess, to prepare all things ready to set on foot the intended revolt from King Edward, and to procure some rebellious commotion in the North, whilst he and his new Son in Law would provide to go forward with the work; which they accordingly did in Yorkshire, an occasion being taken for the breach of an ancient custom there, to give to the poor people of St. Leonards in the City of York, certain quantities of Corn and Grain. This Commotion the Archbishop and the Marquess underhand fomented; yet to colour the matter, the Marquess opposed the Rebels, and cut off the head of Robert Haldon their Captain; but his head being cut off, the Rebels got them other Captains; Henry, Son and Heir to the Lord Fitzhugh, and Sir Henry Nevil Son to the Lord Latimer; the one the Nephew, the other a Cousen-germane to the Earl of Warwick, with whom they joyn the valiant Captain Sir John Conyers: These when they could not enter York, came marching towards London, all the way exclaiming against King Edward as an unjust Prince, and an Usurper. King Edward hearing of this Commotion, sends Sir William Herbert, whom of a mean Gentleman, two years before he had made Earl of Pembroke, and his Brother Sir Richard Herbert, together with the Lord Stafford of Southwick, to suppress the Rebels, and they with an Army of seven thousand, most Welchmen, march towards them; but the Lord Stafford being put from his Inn where he used to lodge, by the Earl of Pembroke, took such a distaste at it, that he withdrew his Archers, and gave over the business; yet the Earl of Pembroke though thus forsaken, with his own Regiment encountered the Rebels, slew Sir Henry Nevil, and divers others; when being upon the point of victory, one John Clappam a servant of the Earl of Warwick, coming in supposing the Earl had been come, turned presently their backs and fled; five thousand of them were slain, the Earl of Pembroke himself, and his much lamented Brother, Sir Richard Herbert, a most goodly personage, were taken prisoners, brought to Banbury, where both of them, with ten other Gentlemen, were put to death. And now the Northamptonshiremen joyning with the Rebels in this fury, made them a Captain named Robert Hiliard, but they named him Robin of Ridesdale, and sodainly came to Grafton, where they took the Earl Rivers Father to the Queen, and his Son Sir John Woodville; brought them to Northampton, and there without Judgement beheaded them. King Edward advertised of these mischances, wrote to the Sheriffs of Somersetshire and Devonshire to apprehend the Lord Stafford of Southwick, (who had treacherously forsaken the Earl of Pembroke) and if they could take him, to put him to death; who being soon after found in a Village within Brentmarsh was brought to Bridgewater, and there beheaded. After this battel fought at Hedgecote, commonly called Banbury field, the Northern men referred to Warwick, where the Earl with great joy received them; and hearing that King Edward with a great Army was coming thither, he sent for his Son in Law the Duke of Clarence, with all speed to repair unto him; who joyning together, and using means cunningly, by having some communication of Peace, to make the King secure, and to take little heed of himself; they took advantage of his security, and in the dead of the night set on his Camp, and killing the Watch, before the King was aware, at a place called Woolley four miles from Berrick, they took him prisoner in his bed, and presently conveyed him to Middleham Castle in Yorkshire, to be there in safe custody with the Archbishop of York. And now they had the prey in their hand, if they had as well looked to keep it, as they had done to get it: But King Edward whether bribing his Keepers, or otherwise winning them by fair promises, got so much liberty, sometimes for his recreation to go a hunting; by which he caused Sir William Stanley, Sir Thomas of Burgh, and divers of his friends at a certain time to meet him, who took him from his Keepers, and set him again at liberty: whilst the Earl of Warwick nothing doubting his Brothers the Archbishops care in safe keeping him, and thinking the brunt of the wars to be now past, dismissed his Army, and intended only to find out King Henry, who was kept a prisoner, but few men knew where.

G King Edward being now at liberty posteth to York, and from thence to Lancaster; where his Chamberlain the Lord Hastings had raised some Forces, with which he marcheth to London, and is there joyfully received: The Earl of Warwick likewise sends to his friends, and makes preparation for a new Army; whilst in the mean time, by the mediation of divers Lords, an interview in Westminster-Hall, is agreed upon, and solemn Oath taken on both sides for safety, between King Edward, the Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick; but each party standing strictly upon terms tending to their own ends; they parted as great Enemies as they met: and so from thence the King went to Canterbury, the Duke and the Earl to Lincoln; whither they had pre-appointed their Forces to repair, under the conduct of Sir Robert Wells, son and heir of the Lord Wells a man of great valor and experience in the wars: King Edward to take off so able a man from the Earls part, sends for his Father the Lord Wells to come unto him; who taking with him his son in Law Sir Thomas Dymock, and coming to attend the Kings pleasure, was told by his friends how wonderfully the King was incensed against them: whereupon for their safety, they take Sanctuary at Westminster. But upon the Kings Princely word, they come unto him, who commandeth the Lord Wells to write to his Son, to desist from adhering to the Earl of Warwick, which the Lord Wells accordingly did: but Sir Robert Wells notwithstanding his Fathers Letters, continuing firm to the Earl still, so much incensed King Edward, that he caused both his Father and Sir Thomas Dymock to be beheaded. He supposed perhaps, that the Lords Wells was himself underhand a friend to the Earl, and had not dealt sincerely with him, in reproaching his Son to leave that party. But now Sir Robert Wells seeing the King draw near to Stamford, where he had pitched his tents, and hearing of his Fathers beheading, was much distracted what to do: to decline battle with the King, he thought would shew too much fear; and to give him battle before the Earl of Warwick were come with his Forces, would shew too much boldness: But his veins were so filled with a desire of revenging his Fathers death, that he thought he could never shew boldness enough; and thereupon encountering with the Kings Army, far greater then his own, oppressed with multitude was taken prisoner, together with Thomas de land, and divers others; who presently in the place, were put to execution: as soon as Sir Robert Wells was taken, the Lincolnshire men to make themselves the lighter to run away, threw off their Coats, for which cause, this battle was afterward called Loss-coat-field, in which, it is reported, were slain above ten thousand men.

The Earl of Warwick hearing of this defeat, and not having present means to raise an Army sufficient to oppose King Edward: when he could by no means draw the Lord Stanley to his party, he determined to sail into France, and hiring ships at Dartmouth in Devonshire, he with his son in Law the Duke of Clarence, and their Wives, took to Sea; and thinking to land at Callice, of which Town he himself was Captain, he was by the Lord Vaneleer a Gascon, whom he had left his Deputy there, repelled; and with so great inhumanity, that the Dutcheff of Clarence, who was then in labour, was fain to be delivered in the Ship, (all the courtessie in that distress shewed, was only to send a flaggon or two of Wine,) which fact of Vaneleer's when King Edward heard of, he was so well pleased with it, that he presently sent him a Patent to be Captain of the Town himself: and the Duke of Burgoyne, for the same service, sent unto him Philp de Camines (who hath written the History of these times) with a grant of one thousand Crowns pension during his life. Never man was better paid for one act of dissembling; for the truth was, Pro amore exclusit foras, it was out of his love that he suffered him not to enter the Town, for he knew there were many great ones in it so addicted to King Edward, and so maliciously bent against the Earl, that if he or any of his company should have come, they would in all likelihood have done them some mischief: And hereof he made a good proof soon after: for when the Earl took to Sea again, the Lord Vaneleer sent him word, he should take heed where he landed; for that the Duke of Burgoyne lay in wait to take him; which advertisement did the Earl more good, then the keeping him out of Callice did him hurt. The Earl upon this advertisement, landed at Diepe in Normandy, whereof when King Lewis heard, he sent and invited him to come to his Court at Ambois, where he received him with no less honour then if he had been a King. In the mean time, King Edward made inquiry for all such as were aiders to the Earl of Warwick; of whom some were apprehended as guilty, some fled to Sanctuary, and some submitted to the Kings mercy; as John Marquess Montacute, whom he courteously received. Queen Margaret, who at this time sojourned with Duke Rayner her Father, hearing of the Earl of Warwicks arrival, with her Son Prince Edward, came to Ambois, and with her also came Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford, lately escaped out of Prison, and fled into France; between whom a new combination is made; and for a foundation of a firm amity, King Henries Son Prince Edward, marries Anne the Earl of Warwicks second Daughter: After which marriage, the Duke of Clarence and the Earls took a solemn Oath, never to leave the war till either King Henry or his Son Prince Edward were restored to the Crown; but now about this time, comes a Gentlewoman out of England, to the dissembling Lord Vaneleer at Callice; and payes him in his own coynt: For she made a shew of intending great good to the Earl of Warwick, but had a purpose indeed to work his ruine; and by this shew she passed unsuspected to the Duke of Clarence, whom she persuaded to forsake the Earl of Warwick, as one that intended wholly the rooting out of the House of York, and only the advancing of the House of Lancaster; which he might well perceive by his marrying his second Daughter to Prince Edward, King Henries only Son; and this reason with some other was so urged by the Gentlewoman, that it sank deeply into the Duke of Clarence his minde. So fit Agents of State are women sometimes; that can transact a business in covert: which if men should attempt, they would soon be discovered. And from this time forward the Duke of Clarence, as if the Gentlewoman had taught him the Art of dissembling, fought secretly to reconcile himself to his Brother King Edward: but made a fair shew still to the Earl of Warwick.

And now the Earl of Warwick having been six months in France, in this time he had procured from the King of France, both Ships, and Men, and Money, and receiving Letters out of England, that many Lords and others were ready to adventure their lives in his quarrel, if he would come,

The extreme melancholy of Sir John Hawksworth or Hawkford.

A (for the people generally held him in such admiration, that they thought the Sun was taken from the World, when he was absent: And this in great part for his great Hospitality, who it is said, used to spend six Oxen at a breakfast) he with the Earls of Oxford and Pembroke, took to Sea; and though the Duke of Burgoyne had a Fleet at Sea, to intercept him, yet his Fleet being by tempest scattered, and King Edward trusting to that Fleet, having provided no other; the Earl had a quiet passage to land at Dartmouth in Devonshire, where being landed, he made Proclamation in King Henry the sixth name, that all good Subjects should prepare to fight against King Edward, who contrary to the right, had usurped the Crown: Upon which Proclamation, it is scarce to be believed, how many thousands of men resorted to him; with which Forces he made towards London: Upon notice of whose approach, on the Sunday next after Michaelmas-day, one Doctor Goddard a Chaplain of his, preaching at Pauls-Cross, did so set forth his Earls pious intention, that many of his auditory were moved to favour the Earls proceeding: infomuch, that the Marquess Montacute, who had in King Edwards behalf, levied six thousand men about London, found them all inclinable to go with him to the Earl of Warwick, and accordingly went and joyned with him. King Edward hearing of the great flocking of people to the Earl, sent forth Letters into all parts of the Realm for raising an Army; but few came, and those few with no great good will: which when he perceived, he began to doubt his safe; and thereupon accompanied with the Duke of Gloucester his Brother, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlain, (who having married the Earl of Warwicks Sister, yet continued ever true to King Edward) and the Lord Scaler Brother to the Queen; he departed into Lincolnshire, and coming to Lyn, he found there an English Ship, and two Hulks of Holland ready to make sail: whereupon he, with the fore-named Lords, and about seven or eight hundred persons entered the Ships, having no provision with him but only the apparel they wore; and so bare of money, that he was fain to reward the Matter of his Ship with one of his garments: and thus making course towards the Duke of Burgoynes Countrey, they were presently chased by eight great Ships of Easterlings, open enemies both to England and France; which drove him before a Town in the Countrey called Alquemare, belonging to the Duke of Burgoyne; where by chance the Lord Gruntrue Governour of that Countrey, at that time was, who defended them from the Easterlings, and brought them to the Hague in Holland, where they had all things ministered to them, by order from the Duke of Burgoyne.

D At this time, upon news of the Earl of Warwicks approach, Queen Elizabeth forsaketh the Tower, and secretly taketh Sanctuary at Westminster, where in great penury forsaken of all her friends, she was brought a bed of a Son called Edward, who like a poor mans childe was Christened: the Godfathers being the Abbot and Prior of Westminster, and the Lady Scroope Godmother.

And now the Earl of Warwick entering the Tower, removes King Henry out of his hold of du-rance, where he had been almost nine years, into his own lodging, where he was served according to his estate; which the Earl did more congratulate then the King himself. Upon the sixth day of October, King Henry accompanied with the Archbishop of York, the Prior of S. Johns, the Bishop of London, the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick and other Noblemen, apparelled in a long Gown of blew Velvet, was conducted through London, to the Bishops Palace, where he rested till the thirteenth of that moneth, on which day he went in solemn procession about Pauls Church, wearing his Imperial Crown; the Earl of Warwick bearing up his train; and the Earl of Oxford the Sword before him. The next day in all usual places about London, King Edward was proclaimed an Usurper, and all his partakers Traitors to God and the King; whereof John Lord Tipstaff Earl of Worcester, as a partaker with King Edward, was made the first example. This Lord had been Lieutenant for King Edward in Ireland, where having done something for which he fled, he was afterward found on the top of an high tree, in the Forrest of Waybridge, in the County of Huntingdon; and being there taken, was brought to London, attainted, and beheaded on the Tower-hill, and after buried at the Black-fryers.

F About this time happened an accident not unworthy to be related: Sir William Hawksworth Knight, one of the chief Justices at the Law, who dwelt at Annory in Devonshire, a man of great possessions; and having no Son; the Lord Fitzwarren, Sir John Sentleger, and Sir William Bollin married his Daughters, and were his Heirs: This man grew into such degree of Melancholy, that one day he called to him the Keeper of his Park, charging him with negligence in suffering his Deer to be stolen; and thereupon commanded him, that if he met any man in his circuit in the night time, that would not stand or speak; he should not spare to kill him whosoever he were. The Knight having thus laid his foundation, and meaning to end his doleful dayes, in a certain dark night secretly conveyed himself out of his house, and walked alone in his Park. The Keeper in his night-walk hearing one stirring, and coming towards him, asked, who was there? but no answer being made, he willed him to stand, which when he would not do; the Keeper shot, and killed him, and coming to see who it was, found him to be his Matter.

G On the twentieth day of November, a Parliament is held at Westminster, wherein King Edward and all his partakers are attainted of high Treason, and all their Lands and Goods seized on to King Henries use. George Plantagenet Duke of Clarence, is by authority of this Parliament, adjudged Heir to Richard Duke of York his Father, and that Dutchy setled upon him and his Heirs, notwithstanding the Primogeniture of Edward: Upon him also was entailed the Crown of England, in case Heirs males of the body of King Henry failed. Jasper Earl of Pembroke, and John Earl of Oxford, are fully restored to their Lands and Honour: and Warwick and Clarence are made Governors of of the King and Kingdom. To this Parliament came the Marquess Montacute, excusing himself that for fear of death he had taken King Edward's part; which excuse was excepted. Queen Margaret is sent into France, but by reason of contrary windes was kept back all that Winter.

About this time, Jasper Earl of Pembroke going into Wales to view his land in Pembroke-shire; found there the Lord Henry, born of Margaret, the only Daughter and Heir of John the first Duke of Somerset, not being then full ten years of age, kept in manner like a Captive, but honourably brought up by the Lady Herbert, him he brings with him to London, and presents him to King Henry; whom when the King had a good while beheld, he said to the Lords about him: Lo, this is he, to whom both we and our adversaries leaving the possession of all things, shall hereafter give place. Which if it be true, it shews a very Propheticall Spirit to have been in King Henry; that could so long before, foretell a thing so unlikely to happen; for this was he that was afterward King Henry the Seventh, before whom at that time there were many lives in being, of both the Houses of York and Lancaster.

Shortly after this, by the Duke of Burgoyne's means, King Edward is furnished with eighteen tall Ships, two thousand Dutchmen, and fifty thousand Florens of Gold; and thus furnished, he took to Sea, and landed at Ravenspurre in York-shire, where he found but cold entertainment; nevertheless he made a wary march to York, where likewise he found no great expression of welcome, so as he was forced to change his pretence, swearing deeply and receiving the Sacrament upon it, that he came not to disturb King Henry, but only to recover his own inheritance; and for the more shew thereof, wearing an Estrich feather, Prince Edward's Livery; which proposition seemed so reasonable, that many who resisted him before, were as ready to assist him now: And if he be blamed for breaking his Oath; it must be considered, it was Regni causa, to recover his Kingdom, which perhaps was the Inheritance he meant, when he took his Oath, that he intended nothing but to recover his Inheritance: and so he brake not his Oath neither. From York he marched towards Wakefield and Sandall, leaving the Castle of Pomfret upon his left hand, where the Marquess Montacute with his Army lay, but did not offer to stop him: from Wakefield he came to Doncaster, and from thence to Nottingham, where there came to him Sir William Parre and Sir James Harrington with six hundred men; also Sir Thomas Burgh, and Thomas Montgomery, with their aids, who caused him to make a Proclamation in his own name: affirming they would serve no man but a King. From Nottingham he came to Leicester, where three thousand able men, and well armed came unto him: From Leicester he came before the walls of Coventry; into which City the Earl of Warwick had withdrawn himself, keeping himself close therein with his people, being about six or seven thousand men; three days together King Edward provoked him to come forth to battell; but he stayed for more forces, and would not do it: whereupon King Edward marched forward to Warwick, eight miles from Coventry, thinking thither at least he should have drawn the Earl of Warwick, but neither would that do it: Indeed the Earl looked for the coming of the Duke of Clarence, with twelve thousand men to joyn with him, but that expectation proved vain, for the Duke was now fully reconciled to his Brother King Edward, and brought all his Forces to joyn with him, only he fought to make amity between King Edward and the Earl: But though King Edward offered general pardon, and other fair conditions; yet none would please the Earl without retorting of King Henry. But now to repair the defection of the Duke of Clarence, there came to the Earl of Warwick at Coventry, the Earl of Oxford, the Duke of Excester, and the Marquess Montacute, by whose coming that side was not a little strengthened; yet all this aid would not make the Earl of Warwick to come to battell: whereupon King Edward marched forwards towards London. Both sides seek to make London their friend; the Earl of Warwick sends to his Brother the Archbishop of York to labour in it; who thereupon caused King Henry to mount on Horseback, and to ride from Pauls through Cheap, down Walbrook, supposing that this shewing of the King would have allured the Citizens to assist him; but this device prevailed little, brought not in above seven or eight thousand men, a small proportion to withstand King Edward; and when the Archbishop of York saw this backwardness in the Citizens, or rather indeed an inclination to King Edward, he secretly sent to him to receive him into grace; which upon promise to continue faithful hereafter, he obtained. The eleventh of April in the year 1471. and the eleventh of his reign, King Edward made his entry into the City of London, riding first to Pauls Church, and from thence to the Bishops Palace, where the Archbishop of York presented himself unto him, and having King Henry by the hand delivered him to King Edward, (six months after his re-adeption of the Crown) and then King Edward being seized of his person, went from Pauls to Westminster, and there gave God most hearty thanks for his safe return. The reasons alleged here by Philip Comines for the Citizens receiving of King Edward, seem scarce worthy of good an Author: One cause (saith he) was, because King Edward being extremely indebted in the City, if they had not received him, they should have lost their debt: Another, because he had won the love of many Citizens wives, who importuned their husbands to receive him.

The Earl of Warwick having intelligence that King Edward was received into London, and King Henry delivered into his hand, marched out, and encamped at St. Albans, and after some refreshing of his Army, removed towards Barnet, and in a large plain there called Cladmore-heath, pitched his Camp; which King Edward hearing, on Easter Eve the thirteenth of April, he marched forth, and came that evening to Barnet, where he would not suffer a man of his Army to stay in the Town, but commanded them all to the field, and lodged with his Army more near to the Enemy then

A then he was aware, by reason of a Mist, (raised some say by one Bungy a Conjuror) which made it so dark, that it could not well be observed where they were encamped. In taking his ground he caused his people to keep as much silence as was possible, thereby to keep the enemy from knowing of their approach. Great Artillery they had on both parts, but the Earl more then the King; and therefore in the night-time, they shot from his Camp almost continually, but did little hurt, because they still overshoot them, as lying nearer, then was conceived. On Easter day, early in the morning, both Armies are ordered for battell; the Earl of Warwick pointed the Command of the Right wing, which consisted of Horse, to his Brother the Marquess Montacute, and the Earl of Oxford; the Left wing consisting likewise of Horse, was left by himself and the Duke of Excester, and the main battell consisting of Bills and Bows was conducted by the Duke of Somerset. On the Kings part, the Vaward was commanded by the Duke of Gloucester; the battell (in which was King Henry) was led by King Edward himself, and the Lord Hastings brought on the Rear. After exhortations for encouragement of their Soldiers, the apparent disadvantage on either side; only the Earls Vaward, by the valiancy of the Earl of Oxford, seemed somewhat to overmatch the Kings, which made some flying towards London, to carry news, that the Earl of Warwick had won the field; and he had perhaps done so, indeed, but fear with streams on their Liveries: as King Edward's men had the Sun, the Earl of Warwick's men, by reason of the Mist, not well discerning the badges so like, shot at the Earl of Warwick's men that were on their part: whereupon the Earl of Oxford cried, Treason, and fled with eight hundred men. At length after great slaughter made on both sides, King Edward having the best men (which he had kept of purpose) to come on; which the Earl of Warwick observing being a man of an invincible courage, nothing dismayed, rushed into the midst of his Enemies, where he adventured so far, that amongst the press he was stricken down and slain. (Though some write, that the Earl seeing the desperate estate of his Army, leapt on a Horse to flee; and coming him to the naked skin.) The Marquess Montacute, thinking to succour his Brother, lost likewise his life, and left the victory to King Edward. On both sides were slain, as Hall saith, ten thousand at the least; Fabian saith, but fifteen hundred, but then he means only of the Kings side. Upon the Kings part, were slain the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Say, the Lord Montjoye, Son and Heir, Sir Humphrey Bourchier Son and Heir to the Lord Berners, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. On the Earls part, were slain the Earl himself, the Marquess Montacute, and three and twenty Knights, of whom Sir William Tirrell was one. The Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Oxford fled into Wales, to Jasper Earl of Pembroke. The Duke of Excester being stricken down, and so wounded that he was left for dead, amongst other the dead bodies, because he was not known; but coming to himself, he got up, and escaped to Westminster, and there took Sanctuary. The dead bodies of the Earl and Marquess were brought to London in a Coffin, and by the space of three daies lay open faced in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul; and then buried with their Ancestors in the Priory of Bisham. This Earl of Warwick was Richard Nevil, Son and Heir of Richard Nevil, Earl of Salisbury, who married the Daughter of Richard Beauchamp the sixth Earl of Warwick, and in her right was Earl of Warwick, in his own, of Salisbury: He was also Lord Montbomer, great Chamberlain, and high Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the North Marches towards Scotland, and High Steward of the Duchy of Lancaster: He had issue two Daughters, Isabella married to George Duke of Clarence, and Anne, first married to Prince Edward King Henry the Sixth's Son, and after to Richard Duke of Gloucester.

We may here observe a Constellation of disastrous influences, concurring all to the overthrow of this great Warwick; whereof if any one had been missing, the wheel of his Fortune had not perhaps turned: For if the City of York had not two credulously believed King Edwards Oath, not to disturb King Henry; or if the Marquess Montacute had stopped (as he might) his passage at Pomfret; or if the Duke of Clarence had not at the very point of the battell, at St. Albans, deserted his party and joyned with King Edward; or if Queen Margaret had not by tempest been kept from coming into England in time; or if the Londoners had not been retrograde and deceived his expectation, he had never perhaps been overthrown as he was: But Fata viam inveniunt; destiny will find waies that were never thought of, will make way where it finds none; and that which is ordained in Heaven, shall be effected by means, of which Earth can take no notice.

Queen Margaret when it was too late, accompanied with John Longstrother Prior of Saint Johns, and the Lord Venlock, with divers Knights and Esquires, took shipping at Harflew, the four and twentieth of March, but by tempest was kept back till the thirtieth of April; and then with her son Prince Edward, she landed at Weymouth, and from thence went to an Abby hard by, called Cern, and then to Bewly in Hampshire, whither there came unto her, Edmund Duke of Somerset, and Thomas Courtney Earl of Devonshire, with divers others; amongst whom it is resolved once more to try their fortune in the Field; but then the Queen would have had her Son Prince Edward to be sent into France, there to remain in safety, till the next battell were tried; but they being of a contrary mind, and especially the Duke of Somerset, she at length consented, though afterward she repented it. From Bewly she with her Son and the Earl of Somerset passeth on to to Bristol, intending with what power they could raise in Gloucestershire, to march into Wales, & to join with Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who was there making preparation of more Forces; King Edward hearing of these things resolves to cross this conjunction; and follows Queen Margaret with a great power to close, that near Tewkesbury in Gloucestershire he overtakes her Forces, who resolutely stand and make head against him; where Somerset, on the Queens part, leading the Vanguard, performed the part of a valiant Commander; but finding his Soldiers through weariness begin to faint, and that the Lord Wenlock, who had the conduct of the battail on the Queens part, moved not, he rode unto him, and upbraiding him with cowardice, or treachery, never said, but with a blow beat out his brains; and now before he could bring in his men, he and the rescue, their Vanguard was routed, and John Earl of Devonshire, with above three thousand of the Queens part were slain: The Queen her self, John Beaufort the Duke of Somerset's Brother, the Prior of Saint John's, Sir Jervis Clifton, and divers others were taken prisoners; all which except the Queen, were the next day beheaded: At which time Sir Richard Cross, presented to King Edward King Henry's Son Edward, whom he had taken prisoner, to whom King Edward at first showed an uncourteous countenance; but demanding of him, how he durst so presumptuously enter into his Realm with Arms? And he answering, though truly, yet unreasonably, To recover my Fathers Kingdom and Heritage; King Edward with his hand thrust him from him, or (as some say) struck him with his Gantlet, and then presently George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Gloucester, Thomas Grey Marquess Dorset, and Will. Lord Hastings standing by, fell upon him in the place, and murdered him. His body was homely interred with other ordinary Corpses, in the Church of the Monastery of the Black-fryers in Tewkesbury. After the victory thus obtained, King Edward repaired to the Abbey Church of Tewkesbury, to give God thanks for his good success; and finding there a great number of his enemies that were fled thither to save themselves, he gave them all free pardon; only Edmund Duke of Somerset, John Longfrotter Prior of Saint John's, Sir Thomas Tresham, Sir Jervis Clifton, and divers other Knights and Esquires, who were apprehended there, and brought before the Duke of Gloucester, sitting that day as Countable of England, and the Duke of Norfolk as Marshal, were all arraigned, condemned and judged to die; and accordingly upon the Tuesday being the seventh of May, they were all, and twelve other Knights more, on a Scaffold set up in the middle of the Town, beheaded, but not dismembered, and permitted to be buried. The same day Queen Margaret was found in a poor house of Holborn, not far from thence, into which she was fled for safeguard of her life; but she was afterwards brought to Dohdon, and there kept a prisoner, till her Father ransomed her with great sums of money. This was the last pitched battel that was fought in England, in King Edward the fourths dates, which happened on the fourth of May, being Saturday, in the eleventh year of his reign, and in the year of our Lord 1471.

King Edward being assured, that as long as any partakers of King Henry lived and were at liberty, he should never be free from plots against his life; sent Roger Vaughan, a Gentleman much reckoned of in his own Countrey, to entrap Jasper Earl of Pembroke, who had escaped from the last encounter; but he having notice of the plot before, prevented it by striking off Vaughans head. After these great clouds were thus dispersed, there arose a little cloud, which gave the Realm, at least the City of London, no small disquiet. For now; Thomas Bastard Fauconbridge, who had been employed by the Earl of Warwick to scowr the Seas, hearing of these defeats; having enriched himself by Piracy, gathered together an Army of seventeen thousand men; and coming to London, imperiously commanded admission into the City, and release of King Henry out of prison: but being denied entrance, and hearing that King Edward with a great power was coming towards him, he brings up his Shipping to Saint Katharines, and taking with him his most desperate men, with them he marched to Kingston-bridge, but finding that Bridge broken down, and all the places of passage guarded, he withdrew his Forces into Saint Georges field, from whence he prepared to assault the City of London; for the effecting whereof he landed all his Ship Ordinance, and planted them all along the Banks-side, with which he battered down many houses, and much annoyed the City; but the Citizens on the other side, lodged their great Artillery against their Adversaries, with which they so galled them, that they durst not abide in any place along the water side, but were driven even from their own Ordinance: Then he appointed his men to set fire on the Bridge, & withal caused three thousand to pass over the Thames, and some of them to assault Aldgate, and some Bishopsgate, but they were in all places by the industry of the Citizens repelled, and chiefly by Robert Bassett and Ralph Jocelyne Aldermen: Upon this he retired to Black-heath and there encamped by the space of three daies, but then hearing that King Edward was coming with a great Army, he got him to his Ship, but the rest fled, some one way, some another. The one and twentieth of May, the King coming to London, thanked the Citizens for their pains and care, and dubbed the Maior, the Recorder Driscwick, and Bassett and Jocelyne Aldermen, Knights.

And now the time was come for King Henry to be delivered out of all his troubles, for the bloody Duke of Gloucester entering the Tower, where he found King Henry nothing at all troubled with all his Crosses; struck him into the heart with his Dagger, and there slew him. And now we have had within the space of half a year, one Parliament proclaiming King Edward an Usurper, and King Henry a lawful King; and another proclaiming King Edward a lawful King, and King Henry an Usurper: That we may know in humane affairs, there is nothing certain, but uncertainty; no thing stable, but instability.

King

A King Edward presently after the interment of King Henry, draws his Forces towards Sandwich in Kent, where some of the followers of Fauconbridge, to the number of eight or nine hundred, had in the Castle there, strongly fortified themselves, but upon their asking pardon, and submitting themselves to the King, with promise to be faithful subjects ever after, they had their pardon granted them, and then they delivered up both Cattle and Ships, to the number of thirteen, to the Kings use. But how this Compollition was observed, may be imagined; when Fauconbridge, who was comprised in the same pardon, was afterward taken and executed at Southampton, Spicing and Quintine the Captains that assailed Aldgate and Bishopsgate, and were in Sandwich Cattle, at the surrender thereof, were presently beheaded at Canterbury; and their heads placed on poles, upon those Gates, and by a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, many both in Essex and Kent were arraigned and condemned for this Rebellion, and more fined.

Fauconbridge
ex-cuted.

And now King Edward, desiring to be secured from all suspected persons; sent the Archbishop of York, Brother to the Earl of Warwick, over to Guisnes, there to be kept in safe custody; and there he remained a long time, till at length by friendship he was delivered, and shortly after dyed. Likewise John Earl of Oxford, who after Burnet Field yielded himself to King Edward, had his life pardoned; but yet was sent over Sea to the Cattle of Hammes, where for the space of twelve years he was shut up in a strong Prison, and narrowly looked to; whose Lady all that time was not suffered to come unto him; nor had any thing to live upon, but what people of their charities gave her; or what she could get by Needle or other work. As for the Earls of Pembroke and Richmond, who were fled out of the Realm, to the Duke of Britain, King Edward sent to the Duke, requiring to have them delivered up to him, upon promise of great rewards; to which the Duke made answer, that he could not with his honour deliver them up, whom he had taken into his Protection; but that for King Edward's sake, he would take such care of them, that he should need to take no care for them; and to that end, he sequestered their own servants from them, and appointed Britains to attend upon them.

It was now the thirteenth year of King Edward's reign; in which a Parliament was called at Westminster: wherein all Acts formerly made by him, are confirmed or revived; and all their Lands and Goods confiscated, that had taken part against him and were fled, and all their Lands and Goods restored to such as had taken part with him.

B King Edward being desir'd to be always in troubles; now that he had quietness at home, was drawn into new broyls abroad; for the Duke of Burgoyne at this time having wars with France, thought he could no way make a better harvelt to himself, then by sowing seeds of dissention between France and England: and to this end he sends Ambassadors to King Edward, to solicit him to set on foot his Title to the Crown of France; making great offers, with protettation to assist him in it, both with Purse and Person. This Proposition being seriously debated by the Kings Privy Council, is at last approved of, as being both lawful and behoefeful; for the honour of the King, and good of the Kingdom. Only means to bear the charges of the war, were wanting; to supply which by a Parliamentary course, would ask too much time: A new course therefore is devised, to procure money from the Subject by way of Benevolence; and this course was taken.

About this time Henry Holland Duke of Excester and Earl of Huntington disinherited by Act of Parliament, in the fourth year of this King, (though he had married King Edwards Sister) yet grew to so great misery, that passing over into Flanders; I there saw him (saith Commynes) running bare legged after the Duke of Burgundies train, begging his bread for Gods sake; whom the Duke of Burgundy at that time not knowing (though they had married two Sister) but hearing afterward who he was, gave him a small Pension to maintain him; till not long after, he was found dead upon the shoar of Dover, and stripped all naked, but how he came to his death, could never by any inquiry be brought to light.

Provision for this French expedition being thoroughly made, and order taken for the quiet Government of the Kingdom in his absence, and the stop of incursions, if any by the Scots should be made: King Edward with an Army of fifteen hundred men at Arms, if any by the Scots should be made: King Edward with an Army of fifteen hundred men at Arms, all of the Nobility and Gentry, fifteen thousand Archers on Horseback, eight thousand common Soldiers, and three thousand Pioners, came down to Dover; whither the Duke of Burgoyne had sent five hundred flat bottom'd Boats, to transport the Horse to Calice; yet for all that help, it was two, and twenty days before the Kings Forces were all past over. Before the Kings departure from Dover, to the end he might not seem to surprize him, he sent an Herald named Garter, a Norman by birth, with a Letter of Defiance to the French King, (so well written, saith Commynes, that he thought it not of any English-mans inditing; as though English-men could not indite as well as the French) requiring him to yield unto him the Crown of France, his unquestionable Inheritance; which if he should dare to deny, he would then endeavour to recover it by the Sword.

This Letter the French King read; and thereupon withdrawing himself, caused the Herald to be brought to his presence, to whom in private he gave this answer: That the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Earl of Saint Paul the Constable; (by whose intigation he knew the King of England was drawn to this design) would but delude him, for that they were Dissemblers and Impostors; and therefore said, it would condice more to the honour of the King of England to continue in League with him; though an old Adversary; then to hazard the fortune of the wars, upon the promised assistance of new-come Deceivers: And so commend me (saith he) to the King thy Master, and say what I have told thee; and then with an honourable reward of three hundred Crowns,

Crowns, dismiss him: The Herald promised to do all that in him lay, and (beyond his Commission) shewed the French King ways, (by working upon the Lords Howard and Stanley) by which he might enter into a Treaty for Peace, which he doubted not would fort to a good Conclusion. The French King glad to hear it, gave the Herald, besides the other Reward, a piece of Crimson Velvet of thirty yards long; and withal sent to King Edward the goodliest Horse he had in his Stable, as also an As, a Wolf, and a wild Bore, Beasts at that time rare in England: And then the Herald returning to Callice, delivered to King Edward the French Kings answer.

And now to make good the French Kings allegation to the Herald; the Duke of Burgoyne, who had promised in the word of a Prince, to bring to Callice by this time two thousand Launces, and four thousand Sadiors or light-Horse, failed to come: Whereupon the Lord Scales is by King Edward sent to the Duke, to put him in minde of his promise, and to hasten his coming with his promised Forces: But the journey was too little purpose; only it occasioned the Duke with a small troop of Horse to come to the King, formally to excuse himself for having been so backward; but the cause (he said) was, for that having been embroiled in the siege of Ambs, he could not depart thence, without infinite disgrace, if neither composition nor submission were enforced; which now notwithstanding, because he would not too much trespass upon his patience, he was enforced to do, by the obstinacy of the besieged; but promised to supply all defects, both with his presence and power, and that speedily. The Constable likewise by his Letter persuades the King of England to proceed in the action, and not to doubt both from the Duke and himself, to be sufficiently every way accommodated.

King Edward thus encouraged, passeth on, but in his way found no performance of promises, either on the Dukes or Constables part; for the Duke did not accommodate the Souldiers at their coming to Peronne, with Victuals or Lodging in such manner as was requisite and expected; and the Constable in stead of surrendering up St. Quintins according to agreement, made a fallie out upon such as were sent from the King of England, to take possession, and plaid upon them with his great Ordinance; whereupon King Edward began to suspect the truth of the French Kings description of the Dukes and Constables conditions; and from thence forward stood upon his own guard, and gave no further credit to their protestations; which the Duke of Burgoyne, pretending occasions for the halting forward his Forces, and promising speedy return together with them, taketh his leave and departeth, which did not a little increase the King's suspicion.

The French King having intelligence of the Duke of Burgoyne's departure; fore-casting the danger, if they should unite their Forces; resolved with himself, to assay what might be done to mediate a Peace in the Dukes absence; and yet so to treat, that if it took not effect, he might disclaim the knowledge of the overture: Whereupon he privately dispatcheth a messenger, in shew an Herald; but was indeed a fellow of no office or estimation, and not known to any of the Kings household, but to Villiers the Master of the Horse, who only was acquainted with the plot and party. This counterfeit Pursuivant at Arms, with a Coat made of a Trumpets Banner-rowl, addressed himself to the King of England, and upon admission to his presence, insinuates the French Kings desire, which was, to have Commissioners on both parts assigned, to confer of the means to reconcile the differences between the two Kings; or at least to conclude a cessation from Arms for sometime: And so well this Messenger delivered his errand, that it was credited, and the Kings request granted; and thereupon Letters of safe conduct, are sent of both sides, for such Commissioners as to this purpose should meet at Amiens. For King Edward, came the Lord Howard, Sir Anthony Senteleger, and Doctor Morton, after made Lord Chancellor of England: For King Lewis, came the Admiral of France, the Lord Saint Piers, and Heberg Bishop of Evreux.

After long Conference, Articles of Peace were concluded on to this effect: That the French King should pay presently to the King of England, threescore and fifteen thousand Crowns, and from thence forth, annually, fifty thousand Crowns, during the life of King Edward; That within one year, the French King should send for the Lady Elizabeth the King of England's Daughter, and joyne her in marriage to the Dauphin: That the Lord Howard, and Sir John Cheyny Master of the Horse, should remain in Hostage there, till the English Army had quitted France, and a general Peace for nine years; wherein the Dukes of Burgoyne and Britain, are included, if they will accept thereof: This Conclusion was the more easily compassed by the King of France his following the Heralds counsel; for he distributed sixteen thousand Crowns amongst King Edward's Counsellors and Favorites; two thousand Crowns to the Lord Hastings the Kings Chamberlain; and to the Lord Howard, Sir John Cheyny, Sir Anthony Senteleger, and Montgomery, the residue; besides great store of Plate and Jewels, distributed amongst inferior Officers of the Court. The Duke of Gloucester only opposed this accord, as not suiting with his design; nevertheless it proceeded, and notice thereof is presently sent to the Duke of Burgoyne; who thereupon only with fifteen Horse, comes posting to the English Camp, whom King Edward persuadeth to enter into the Peace, according to the reservation; but he in great chafe, reproacheth King Edward for entering into it himself; saying, that his Predecessors had by many brave exploits gotten them the Country, and return as they came, adding withal, that to make it appear he was able without help of the English to subdue himself, he utterly disclaimed any benefit by that Truce, until three moneths after the English were returned to their own Countrey; and so in a great stiffe returned home.

For

For the better confirmation of what is agreed upon between the two Kings, an interview is desired; but before the same is effected, the French King sends the English Army an hundred Tonne of Gascoigne wine, to be drunk out amongst the private Souldiers, and therewithall, free license for Commanders and Gentlemen to recreate themselves in Amiens, where they were lovingly entertained by the Burgers of the Town, by the Kings express command. The place of interview of these two Kings, is agreed on to be at Plequiny, a Town three miles distant from Amiens, seated in a bottom, through which the River of Some runneth; over which a strong Bridge was built, and in the midst thereof a grate made overthwart with bars, no wider asunder then a man might well thrust in his arm; covered with boards over head, to avoid the rain: four of the Bed-chamber on both sides, are appointed to search the rooms, to prevent traps or Instruments of treachery: and being by them certified that all was clear, the Kings advance themselves. King Edward being come in light of the place, made a stand; being told, that the circumstance of coming first to the place, was a matter of great disparagement in point of State: but the French King more regarding substance then circumstance, gave the King of England the advantage to come at his pleasure, and went first to the bar appointed for conference, and there did attend K. Edward's leisure. He had in his company, John Duke of Bourbon, with his Brother the Cardinal, and eight hundred men at Arms. King Edward had with him, his Brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Northumberland, the Lords Chamberlain and Chancellor, and at his back his whole Army in battell. The Kings lovingly salute each other, and complements of courtesie reciprocally pass: which finished, they, with their Noblemen there present, take all their Oaths upon the holy Evangelists; in all their power; to observe the Articles of Accord agreed on. After which, in private, the French King importunes King Edward that the Duke of Britain might be left out of these Articles; but after much urging to that purpose, King Edward gave this resolute answer, that if King Lewis desired the friendship of England, he should not molest the Duke of Britain: for that he was resolved, at any time to come in person to relieve him, if he were disturbed: King Edward pretended the many kindness he had formerly received of the Duke of Britain; but it was conceived, that the desire of compassing the Earls of Richmond and Pembroke, now in the Duke of Britains Countrey, were the greatest motives of his standing so firmly for him. After more serious discourse, King Lewis told King Edward, that he would one day invite him to Paris, there to court his French Ladies, with whom, if he committed any sin, he merrily told him, that Cardinal, Bourbon should be his Confessor; who (he might be sure) would assign him an easie penance; as one that loved to kiss fair Ladies himself: but when King Edward seemed not unwilling to accept his offer, he was then glad to put it off with other discourse, for that (as he told Commence) too many English Princes had been there before.

The money to be paid to King Edward by the Articles, is accordingly paid; and thereupon the French Hostages are delivered, and the English Army retires to Callice, and from thence is transported into England: and then the English Hostages are likewise delivered. This Peace was said to be made only by the Holy Ghost; because on the day of meeting, a white Dove came and sat upon the King of England's Tent: though the Dukes of Gloucester and Burgoyne thought it was made by no good spirit.

King Edward being returned into England, had his mind running still upon the danger that might grow from the Earl of Richmond: he therefore dispatched D. Stillington and two other his Ambassadors to the Duke of Britain, to send him over to him, under this subtle pretence, that he meant to match him in marriage with the Lady Cicelle his younger Daughter; and withal, sent also no small store of Angels to speak for him: which so prevailed with the Duke, that he delivered the Earl of Richmond to the Ambassadors, who conducted him thence to Saint Malo, where whilst they stayed for a wind, the young Earl by the cunning plotting of Peter Landois the Dukes Treasurer (more out of scorn that he was not gratified by the English Ambassadors, to the proportion of his place, then for any love to the Earl) escapes into the Sanctuary; from whence neither prayers nor promises could get him out: Nevertheless upon Peter Landois's promise he should be safely kept there, the Ambassadors departed, and returned home, acquainted King Edward with the Duke of Britains courtesie in delivering him, and their own negligence in suffering him to escape, only making amends with the promise of Peter Landois; which might be to King Edward some contentment, but was no satisfaction.

At Christmas following, being the sixteenth year of his Reign, he created his eldest Son Edward, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester: his second Son he made Duke of York; giving the order of Knighthood to the Son and Heir of the Earl of Lincoln, and many others. He created also four and twenty Knights of the Bath, whereof Brian Chief Justice, and Littleton a Judge of the Common Pleas were two.

About this time, there were two examples of severity seen; not unworthy the relating, if but only to make us see how dangerous a thing it is Under tum sanctis, to speak words that may be taken as reflecting upon the King. The first was of one Walter Walker, a wealthy Citizen, dwelling at the Sign of the Crown in Chappside: This man one day when his child cried, bid him be quiet; and he would make him Heir of the Crown: which words being subject to interpretation, he was called in question about them, arraigned, condemned, and put to death. The other was of Thomas Burdet of Arrow in Warwickshire Esquire: It happened that King Edward hunted in his Park, he being from home, and there killed a white Buck, whereof Mr. Burdet made special account: so as coming home, and finding that Buck killed, he wished it horns and all in his belly belly that had counselled the King to kill it; and because none counselled the King to kill it but himself; it was thought those words were not spoken without a malignant reflecting upon the King; and thereupon Burden was arraigned and condemned, drawn to Tiburn, and there beheaded: though Markham then Chief Justice, chose rather to lose his place, then assent to the Judgment.

And now began ambition to boyl in Richard Duke of Gloucester; whereof the first heat fell upon his Brother the Duke of Clarence, how to rid him out of the way; to which end, he seeks to raise jealousies in King Edward's head against him, telling him, that some of Clarence's followers, were Sorcerers and Necromancers, and had given forth speeches; that one whose name begun with G. should disinheric his Children and get the Crown: and for a colour of this suggestion, one of the Duke of Clarence's servants, who came with him out of Ireland from Dublin, where the Duke was born; is in his Masters absence, by the procurement underhand of the Duke of Gloucester, indicted, arraigned, condemned and executed at Tiburn for a Conjuror, and all within the space of two daies; and the Duke of Gloucester, to make shew that he had no hand in this fellow's death, seque the Duke of Clarence to complain of it to King Edward; and in the meantime finds matter, at least colour of matter, to make him be committed to the Tower; and then again to make shew he had no hand in his imprisonment, bids him be of good cheere, for it should not be long ere he would see him released: and he kept his word; for not long after, by his procurement, was drowned in a Butt of Malmesey, (and this was his releasement) and then laid in his bed, to make the people believe that he died of discontent; whose death King Edward though perhaps consenting to it, so much resented, that afterwards, when he was sued to for any man's Pardon, he would sighing break out into such words: Oh unfortunate Brother! for whose life not one man would open his mouth. Being dead, he was buried at Wewkesbury in Gloucestershire; by the body of his Dutcheffe, who great with child, died of Poyson a little before.

A match treated on between the K. of Scots eldest Son and a Daughter of K. Edward.

Whereupon K. Edward enters Scotland with an Army.

And brings the Scots to submission.

Cause of K. Edward's discontentments.

He falls sick and dies.

It was now the two and twentieth year of King Edward's Reign, when James King of Scotland sent Ambassadors to treat of a marriage between his eldest Son James Duke of Rothsay, and Clary King Edward's second Daughter. This overture for a Match, was by the King and his Council readily embraced, and a great part of the Portion was delivered to the Scots, with this Proville, That if the marriage did not proceed, the Provost and Merchants of Edinburgh should be bound to repay it again. But the Scottish King who had other phantasies in his head, and would take counsel of none but his own will, and diverted also perhaps by the King of France; not only dallied the proceeding in the match, but affronted those of the Nobility that perswaded him to it; in so much that his Brother the Duke of Albany was enforced to abandon the Countrey, and to flee for refuge into England: by whom King Edward being informed of King James's his fickle disposition, was so much incensed, that under the conduct of the Duke of Gloucester, accompanied with the Duke of Albany, he sent an Army of twenty thousand against Scotland; who in their way, took in Barnwick, and besieged the Castle; which being resolutely defended by the Earl Bothwell, the Duke left the Lord Stanley to continue the siege, whiles he with the rest of the Army, marcheth toward Edinburgh; where within the Castle of Maydens, King James had immured himself. But the Nobility of Scotland, seeing the danger they were in, endeavoured by humble submission to procure a peace, at least a cessation from war; which with much importunity they obtained, upon these conditions: That full satisfaction should be presently given, for all damages sustained by the late incursions: That the Duke of Albany should be fully restored to grace and place, with an abolition of all discontents between his Brother King James and him: That the Castle of Barnwick, (which had been now out of the possession of the English, one and twenty years) should immediately be surrendered into the Generals hands; and from thence no reduction of that, or the Town attempted: That all such sums of money as upon proposition of the marriage had been delivered, should be repaid. All which except the first Article, were accordingly performed.

When this business with Scotland was indifferently accommodated; King Edward receives intelligence from his Ambassador Leiger in France, that the French King not only denied the payment of the annual Tribute of fifty thousand Crowns, agreed upon and sworn to, upon the ratification of the late concluded Peace, but had also married the Dauphin of France to the Lady Margaret Daughter of Maximilian Son of the Emperour; which so much incensed King Edward, that he resolves to revenge it; and by the advice of his Council, open war was presently proclaimed against France: But whilest King Edward is making preparation, and intente to the business, he is attacked by the hand of death; and upon the ninth of April, in the year 1483. at Westminster ended his mortal life.

Of his Taxations.

IN his second year, he sent his privy Seal through England, to move men to give him a certain sum of money towards resisting the Scots, which was granted and given liberally. In his seventh year, in a Parliament at Westminster, were refused all manner of gifts, which the King had given from the first day he took possession of the Realm, to that time. In his eighth year, at a Parliament, were granted two Fifteens and a Demy. In his thirteenth year, a Parliament was holden, wherein a Subsidy was granted; and the year following, towards war to be undertaken

A in France, a new way of raising of money is devised, called a Benevolence, by which great sums of money were gotten of the Subject: And it is not unworthy the relating, what an old rich Widow at this time did; whom King Edward amongst others having called before him, merrily asked, what she would willingly give him towards his great charges? By my troth (quoth she) for thy lovely countenance, thou shalt have even twenty pounds. The King looking scarce for half that sum, thanked her, and lovingly kist her; which so wrought with the old Widow, that she presently swore, he should have twenty pound more; and paid it willingly. Not long before his death, he was by ill Counsellors put upon a distastful course for raising of money; which was, by fining men for delinquencies against Penal Statutes, by which course some money was gathered, but before it came to full execution, he dying, that also died with him.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

IN his fourth year, he newly devised the Coyn both of Gold and Silver, as at this day it is; the Gold, he named Royals and Nobles, the Silver, Groats, and half Groats: the new Groat weighing scanty three pence; and the Noble of six shillings eight pence, appointed to go for eight shillings four pence. In his fifth year it was proclaimed in England, that the Beaks or Pykes of Shooes and Boots should not pass two inches, upon pain of Curling by the Clergy, and forfeiting twenty shillings, to be paid, one Noble to the King, another to the Cordwayners of London, and the third to the Chamber of London; and for other Countreys and Towns the like order was taken. Before this time, and since the year 1382. the Pykes of Shooes and Bobts were of such length, that they were fain to be tied up to the knees with Chains of Silver and gilt, or at least with filken laces.

New Coyn ordained.

The length of Beaks and Pykes of Shooes limited.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN this Kings time, the Jubile which was before but every fiftieth year, was by Pope Sixtus the fourth, brought to be every five and twentieth year. Also, where before this time, the Scottish Bishops had no Metropolitane, but the Bishop of York was Metropolitane and Primate of Scotland; now in this Kings time, Pope Sixtus appointed the Bishop of Saint Andrews to be Metropolitane of Scotland, who had twelve Bishops under his obedience.

The year of Jubile brought from fifty, to five and twenty.

Works of Piety done in his time.

THIS King laid the foundation of the new Chappel at Windsor, and his Queen Elizabeth founded the Queens College in Cambridge, and endowed it with large Possessions. About his fiftieth year, Doctor Woodlark Provost of Kings College in Cambridge, founded Katharine-hall there. In his seventeenth year, the Wall of the City of London, from Cripplegate to Bishopsgate, was builded at the Charges of the Citizens; also Bishopsgate it self was new built by the Merchants Almans of the Steelyard. Also in this year dyed Sir John Crosby Knight, late Maior of London; who gave to the repairing of the Parish Church of St. Helens in Bishopsgatestreet where he was buried, 500 Marks: to the repairing of the Parish Church of Henworth in Middlesex, forty pounds: to the repairing of London Wall, an hundred pounds: to the repairing of Ruebester Bridge, ten pounds: to the Wardens and Commonalty of the Grocers in London, two large Pots of silver chased half gilt, and other Legacies. About this time also, Richard Rawson one of the Sheriffs of London, caused an house to be builded in the Church-yard of St. Mary Hospital without Bishopsgate; where the Maior and Aldermen use to sit and hear the Sermons in Easter Holy-daies. In his nineteenth year, William Tailour Maior of London, gave to the City certain Tenements; for which the City is bound to pay for ever, at every Fifteen granted to the King, for all such as shall dwell in Cordwainers-street, seised at twelve pence apiece, or under. And about the same time, one Thomas Ilam Sheriff of London, builded at his costs, the great Conduit in Cheapside. In his three and twentieth year, Edward Shaw Goldsmith, who had been Maior of London, at his own costs re-edified Cripplegate in London, which Gate in old time had been a Prison.

Queens College in Cambridge founded.

Katharine-hall in Cambridge founded.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

IN his third year, the Minster of York, and the Steeple of Christs Church in Normich were burnt. In his seventeenth year, so great a Pestilence reigned in England, that it swept away more people in four moneths, then the Wars had done in fifteen years past: Also in his nineteenth year was another Pestilence; which beginning in the latter end of September, continued till the beginning of November twelve-moneths following; in which space of time innumerable people died.

Two great Plagues.

Of his Wife and Issue.

King Edward had been contracted to Eleanor Daughtor to John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, married after to Sir Thomas Butler Baron of Sudley: but he married Elizabeth the Widow of Sir John Grey, daughter of Richard Woodville by his Wife Jaqueline Dutcheff of Bedford: she lived his Wife eighteen years and eleven moneths; by whom he had three Sons and seven Daughters. Edward his eldest Son, born in the Sanctuary at Westminster: Richard his second Son, born at Shrewsbury: George his third Son, born also a Shrewsbury, but died a child. Elizabeth his eldest Daughter, promised in marriage to Charles Dauphin of France: but married afterward to King Henry the seventh: Cicely his second Daughter promised in marriage to James Duke of Rothsay, Prince of Scotland; but was married afterward to John Viscount Wells, whom she outlived, and was again remarried, but by neither Husband had any Issue: she lieth buried at Quarrenden in the Isle of Wight. Anne his third Daughter was married to Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal and High Treasurer of Edward; by whom she had two Sons, both dying without Issue: she lieth buried at Framingham in Norfolk. Bridget his fourth Daughter, born at Eltham in Kent, became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dartford in Kent, which King Edward had founded. Mary his fifth Daughter, was promised in marriage to the King of Denmark, but died in the Tower of Greenwich, before it could be solemnized: she lieth buried at Windsor. Margaret his sixth Daughter, died an Infant: Katherine his seventh Daughter, was married to William Courtney Earl of Devonshire; to whom she bare Lord Henry, who by King Henry the eight was created Marquess of Exeter.

King Edward's three special Concubines.

Shore's Wife.

The late Lord Lumley, from whom descended.

Concubines he had many, but three specially; and would use to say, that he had three Concubines, who in their several properties excelled: One, the merriest; another, the wyldest; the third, the holiest Harlot in his Realm; as one whom no man could lightly get out of the Church to any place, unless it were to his bed: The other two were greater personages then are fit to be named: but the merriest was Shore's Wife; in whom therefore he took special pleasure: This woman was born in London, worshipfully defended, and well married: but when the King had abused her, anon her Husband (as he was an honest man, and did know his good, not presuming to touch a Kings Concubine) left her up to him altogether.

By these he had natural Issue; Arthur surnamed Plantagenet (whose mother, as is supposed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucy) created Viscount Lisle, by King Henry the eight, at Bridewell in London: and Elizabeth, who was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight; to whom she bare Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did descend.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was (saith Comines) the goodliest personage that ever mine eyes beheld; exceeding tall of stature, fair of complexion, and of most Princely presence: and we may truly say, he was of full age before he came to one and twenty; for being but eighteen years old when his Father died, he sued out his Livery presently; so as he began the race of his fortune just like Augustus Caesar, each of them at the same age succeeding an Ancestour after a violent death; and each of them left to set on a roof, where but only a foundation was laid before. For his conditions, he was of an erected composure both of body and minde; but something fagging on the Fleashes side; and never any man that did marry for love, did so little love marriage; for he took as much pleasure in other mens Wives as in his own. He was never more confident, then when he was in danger, nor ever more doubtful then when he was secure. Of the four Cardinal virtues, Fortitude and Prudence were in him naturally; Temperance and Justice, but to serve his turn. He was politick even to irreligion; for to compass his ends he would not stick to swear what he never meant. Yet he was Religious beyond Policy; for before Battails, he used to make his Prayers to God: after Victories, to give him Thanks. He was far from being proud, yet very ambitious; and could use familiarity, and yet retain Majesty. He was a great Briber; and what he could not get by Force, he would by rewards; as much as what he could not get by Battery, he would by Mines. He was too credulous of Reports, which made him be in error, sometimes to the hurt of himself, oftentimes of others. He had made the White Rose to flourish as long as Henry the fourth made the Red, if he had not made it change colour with too much blud. He had been fortunate in his Children, if he had not been unfortunate in a Brother: but he was well enough served, that would think a Wolf could ever be a good Shepherd. He had an excellent art in improving his favours; for he could do as much with a small courtesie, as other men with a great benefit: And that which was more, he could make advantage of disadvantages; for he got the love of the Londoners by owing them money; and the good will of the Citizens by lying with their Wives.

Of his Death and Burial.

Whether it began from his minde, being extremely troubled with the injurious dealing of the King of France; or from his body by intemperance of diet, to which he was much given; he fell into a sickness, (some say a Catarrhe, some a Fever) but into a sickness whereof he died. In the time of which sickness; and at the very point of his death, Sir Thomas More makes him to make a speech to his Lords; which I might think to be the speech of a sick man, if it were not so found; and of a weak man, if it were not so long: But it seems Sir Thomas More delivers rather what was fit for him to say, than what he said, the Contents being only, to exhort his Lords, whom he knew to be at variance, to be in love and concord amongst themselves; for that the welfare of his Children, whom he must now leave to their care, could not otherwise be preferred but by their agreement. And having spoken to this purpose as much as his weakness would suffer him, he found himself sleepy; and turning on one side, he fell into his long sleep, the ninth of April, in the year 1483. when he had lived one and forty years, reigned two and twenty and one moneth, and was buried at Windsor, in the new Chappel, whose foundation himself had laid.

Of Men of Note in his time.

MEN of valour in his time were many, but himself the chiefest; the rest may be observed in reading his story. For men of Letters, we may have leave at this time to speak of some strangers, having been men of extraordinary fame; as Johannes de Monte Regio, Purbachius and Bianchini, all great Astronomers; Ludovicus Pontanus, Paulus Castrensis, and Antonius Russellanus, all great Lawyers; Servissanus, Savanarola, and Barzizius, all great Physicians; Bassarion and Cassanus, both great Cardinals; Argypole, Philiphus, Datus, Leonardus, Arctinus, and Peggius, all great men in humane Literature. And of our Countrey-men; John Harding an Esquire, born in the North parts, who wrote a Chronicle in English Verse, and among other special points therein touched, hath gathered all the Submissions and Homages made by the Scottish Kings, even from the dayes of King Athelstan: whereby it may evidently appear, how the Scottish Kingdom, even in manner, from the first establishing thereof here in Britain, hath been appertaining unto the Kings of England, and holden of them as their chief and superior Lords. Julian Beme, a Gentleman of excellent gifts, who wrote certain Treatises of Hawking and Hunting; also a book of the Laws of Arms, and knowledg appertaining to Heralds. John Fortescue a Judge, and Chanceller of England, who wrote divers Treatises concerning the Law and Politick Government: Rochus, a Charter-house Monk, born in London, who wrote divers Epigrams. Walter Hunt a Carmelite Fryer, who for his excellent learning, was sent from the whole body of the Realm, to the General Councell holden first at Ferrara, and after at Florence, by Pope Eugenius the fourth; where he amongst others disputed with the Greeke, in defence of the Order and Ceremonies of the Latine Church. William Caxton, who wrote a Chronicle called Fruitus Temporum, and an Appendix unto Trevisa, besides divers other Books and Translations. John Milverton, a Carmelite Fryer of Brisford, and Provincial of his Order, who because he defended such of his Order as preached against endowments of the Church with Temporal possessions, was committed to prison in the Castle of Saint Angelo in Rome, where he continued three years. David Morgan a Welchman, who wrote of the Antiquities of Wales, and a description of the Countrey. John Tiptoft, a Nobleman born, who wrote divers Treatises, but lost his head in the year 1471. Robert Huggon born in Norfolk, who wrote certain vain Prophecies. Thomas Norton born in Brisford, an Alchymist. Scogan a learned Gentleman, and a Student for a time in Oxford; who for his pleasant wit and merry conceits, was called to Court. But most worthy of all to be remembered, Thomas Littleton a reverend Judge of the Common Pleas, who brought a great part of the Law into Method, which lay before confusedly dispersed; and his Book called Littleton's Tenures.

William Caxton
Chronicle.

Scogan at this time lived.

Thomas Little-

THE REIGN OF KING EDWARD THE FIFTH.

King Edward the fourth being dead, his eldest Son Edward, scarce yet eleven years old, succeeded in the Kingdom, but not in the Crown; for he was Proclaimed King, but never Crowned: And indeed it may not so properly be called the Reign of Edward the Fifth, as the Tyranny of Richard the Third; for from the time of King Edward's death, though not in name, yet in effect, he not only ruled as King, but raged as a Tyrant. Prince Edward when his Father died, was at Ludlow in VVales, where he had lived some time before, the better by his preference to keep the Welsh in awe; he had about him of his Mothers kindred many; but Sir Anthony VVoodville, the Earl Rivers, his Uncle, was appointed his chief Counsellor and Director. The Duke of Gloucester was at this time in the North, but had word presently sent him, from the Lord Hastings Lord Chamberlain, of his Brother King Edward's death; who acquainted him withall, that by his Will, he had committed the young King, his Queen and other children, to his care and government; and thereupon putting him in minde, how necessary it was for him speedily to repair to London: But the Duke of Gloucester needed no spur to set him forward, who was already in a full careere; for he had long before projected in his mind, how he might come to attain the Crown; and now he thought the way was made him. For as it is said, the very night in which King Edward died, one Miffelbrook, long ere morning, came in great haite to the house of one Potter dwelling in Redcross-street without Cripple-gate; where he shewed unto Potter that King Edward was departed; to whom Potter answered, By my troth man, then will my Maister the Duke of Gloucester be King; What cause he had so to think, is hard to say; but surely it is not likely he spake it of nought. And now the young King was coming up to London with a strong guard, partly to make a first expression of his greatness, and partly to oppose any disorders that might be offered. But the Duke of Gloucester finding this proceeding like to be a rub in his way, at least, not fit for his designs, he presently falls to undermining; writes most loving Letters to the Queen, protesting all humble and faithfull service to the King and her; but withall perswading her, that this great guard about the King, might be presently dismissed; which did but minister matter of suspicion, and would be apt to breed new jealousies, in them who were now thoroughly reconciled. The Queen of a nature easie to be wrought upon, gives credit to his glozing Letters; and thereupon sends in all haite, to her Son, and to her Brother the Lord Rivers; requiring them by all means, for some causes to her known, to dismiss their guard, (not mentioning by whose advise she writ them; which if she had done, they would never have done it) but now upon her Letters, they presently did; and came forward with only a sober company. And now is Gloucesters first work done; but he knowing that the work yet behinde was too great to be done by himself alone, gets the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord Hastings, two of the greatest men of power at that time in the Kingdom, to joyn with him in opinion, that it was not fit the Queens kindred should be so wholly about the King; and others of better blood and desert, to be estranged from from him, and therefore by all means fit, to endeavour to remove them: To which the Duke of Buckingham is easily wrought, upon a promise to have the Earldom of Hartford conferred upon him: and the Lord Hastings not hardly, upon a hope by this means to cut off many whom in King Edwards dayes he had justly offended. And now another great work was done; it remains in the next place to put in it execution, which was presently thus effected: The young King had been at Northampton, and from thence was gone to Stony-stratford, whither the two Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham arrived; but pretending the Town to be too little for the entertainment of their Companies, they went back to Northampton, and alighting at the same Inn where the Earl Rivers had taken up his lodging for that night, intending the next morning early to overtake the King. Upon this their accidental meeting, great shews of courtesie passed between them; and Supper ended; the Dukes pretending weariness, retire to their lodgings, the Earl to his; but the Dukes being entred into their Chambers, enter into consultation with their private friends, in which they spent a great part of the night, and then secretly get the Keyes of the Inne Gates, suffering none to pass either in or out; whereof the Earl having notice by his Host, though he suspected the worst, yet setting a good countenance upon the matter, and trusting to his own Innocency, he boldly went to the Duke of Gloucesters Chamber, where he found the Duke of Buckingham and the rest closely set in counsel; with whom he expostulates the reason of this course, to imprison him in his Inne against his will: But they instead of answer, command presently to lay hands on him, charging him with many crimes, whereof themselves were only guilty: And then taking order for his safe imprisonment, they speedily took Horfe, and came to Stony-stratford, at such time as the King was taking horse, whom in all reverent manner they saluted: But presently in the Kings presence, a quarrel is pickt against the Lord Richard Gray, the Kings half-Brother: The Duke of Buckingham making relation to the King, that he and the Marquess his Brother, with the Earl Rivers the Queens Brother, had endeavoured and almost effected to draw to themselves the whole managing the affairs of the Kingdom, and to set variance between the Peers of the Realm: and particularly, that the Lord Marquess without any Warrant, had taken out of the Tower of London both Treasure and Armour, to a great quantity; but to what purpose though they were ignorant, yet there was just cause to suspect it was to no good end: And therefore it was thought expedient by the advice of the Nobility, to attach him at Northampton, to have him forth coming to make his answer for these and many other his over-bold actions: The King unable to found the depth of these plots, mildly said unto him: What my Brother Marquess hath done, I cannot say; but for my Uncle and Brother here, I dare answer, that they are ignorant of any unlawfull practises either against me or you. Oh (saith the Duke of Buckingham) that hath been their cunning to keep their treachery from your Graces knowledge: And thereupon instantly in the Kings presence, they arrested the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, Sir Richard Hall, and brought the King and all his company back to Northampton, putting away all his old Servants, and placing in their rooms creatures of their own, whom they had power to command. At which dealing, the young King wept, but it booteth nothing; and to colour the matter, the Duke of Gloucester at dinner sent a Dish from his own Table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good cheer, for all shortly should be well: but the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Messenger to carry it to the Lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such adversity was strange; but as for himself, he had all his dayes been acquainted with it, and therefore could the better bear it. But for all this comfortable courtesie of the Duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Countrey, into divers places to prison, and afterward to Pomfret, where in conclusion they were all beheaded.

And now the Duke of Gloucester having thus gotten the custody of the King, set forwards toward London, giving out by the way, that the Marquess and the Queens kindred had plotted the destruction of the King, and of all the ancient Nobility of the Realm, and to alter the Government of the Common-wealth; and that they were only imprisoned to be brought to their tryall according to Law: And the better to settle these suggestions in the apprehension of the Vulgar, they brought along with them divers Carts laden with Armour, (of their own providing) with Dry-fats and great Chefts, wherein they reported to be Treasure for the payment of Souldiers; with which they so possessed the Common-people, that all was believed for truth which was thus rumored: But the finest device of all was, to have five of the Duke of Gloucesters instruments manacled and pinioned like Traitors; and these in every place where the King lodged, to be dispersed and given out to be men of great birth, drawn into this vile plot of Treason by the Queens Brother; who must seem to be penitent for their offence, and to confess their own guilt: And this device continued acting till the King came to London, where their Vizards were pulled off, and the disguise was soon discovered.

The Queen in the mean time having intelligence of these dolefull accidents, and fearing there were worse to follow; with her second Son and five Daughters takes Sanctuary at Westminster; and the young King hearing of these things, with tears and sighs expressed his grief; but the Dukes making Protestation of their fidelity, and care of his safety, seemed only to marvel why he should be melancholy.

At this time a messenger came from the Lord Chamberlain, to the Archbishop of York Lord Chancellor of England, to signifie to him, that there was no fear of any thing, for that he assured

A assured him all should be well. Well (quoth the Archbishop) be it as well as it will; I assure him, it will never be so well as we have seen it. And thereupon, presently after the messengers departure, he calleth up his Servants (being then in the night) and taking the great Seal with him, came before day, to the Queen, whom he found sitting alone on the Rushes, all desolate and dismayed; whom he comforted the best he could, assuring her, that if they Crowned any King but her Son, whom they had with them, he would presently after Crown his Brother whom she had with her; and therewithall delivering to her the great Seal, departed: but soon after, bechinking himself better, he thought he had done too rashly, to deliver the great Seal to the Queen; and therefore sent for it again, and had it delivered him; yet shortly after reproved for delivering it by the Councel Table, he had it taken from him; which was then delivered to Doctor Ruffel Bishop of Lincoln, the most learned man of that time.

B And now the Duke of Gloucester for respectively carries himself towards the King, with so much shew of care and faithfulness, that by a general consent of the Councel, he is appointed and established Protector of the King and Kingdom; and by this means, he hath the King in his custody: It remains now how to get his Brother the Duke of York, for without having both, he were as good (as to his purpose) have neither: And to effect this, he makes the effect to become a cause: for whereas by his undue dealings he had made the King melancholy, he now makes that Melancholy a cause to require his Brothers company to make him merry; and therefore wishes some course may be taken, either by perswasion or otherwise, to procure the Queen to send the Duke of York to keep his Brother the King company: Here the Archbishop of York the Lord Cardinal, the man thought most fit to be sent in this employment, riseth up and saith, he would do his best endeavour to persuade her; but if he could not, he then thought it was not to be attempted against her will, for that it would turn to the high displeasure of God, if the priviledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many years inviolably been kept, which both Kings and Popes for good, had granted, so many had confirmed; and which holy ground was more then five hundred years ago, by Saint Peter in his own person, accompanied with great numbers of Angels by night, so specially hallowed and dedicated to God; and for proof whereof, there is yet in the Abby Saint Peters Cope to shew: that from that time thitherward, there never was so undevout a King, that durst violate that sacred place, nor so holy a Bishop that durst presume to consecrate it: and therefore (saith he) God forbid, that

D any man, for any earthly thing, should enterprize to break the immunity and liberty of that sacred Sanctuary; and I trust with Gods grace, we shall not need it, at least my endeavours shall not be wanting; if the Mothers dread and womanish fear be not the ler. Womanish fear, nay womanish frowardness, (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it upon my Soul, the well knoweth there is no need of any fear, either for her Son, or for her self: and prosecuting his discourse, declareth at large, that as there was no just cause for the Queen to keep her Son, so there was great cause for them to require him; and that for breach of Sanctuary in this case there could be none; for that he had often heard of Sanctuary men, but never heard of Sanctuary children. And to this purpose having spoken much, it was all assented to by the Lords that were present, and with this Instruction, is the Archbishop (upon whom the E Queen specially relied) sent unto her; who after humble salutations, acquaints her with his message, earnestly perswading her not to oppose the Lord Protector's request, and giving her many reasons, first that she ought not, and then that she could not keep him in Sanctuary: she answered all his reasons, though with great mildness, yet with great earnestness; so as the Archbishop finding little hope to prevail with her by perswasion, turns the tenor of his speech another way; telling her plainly, that if she did not consent to send her Son, he doubted some sharper course would speedily be taken. This warning sank so deep into the Queens mind, that after a little pausing, taking her Son by the hand, she said, My Lord Archbishop, here he is, for my own part I will never deliver him; but if you will needs have him, take him; and at your hands I will require him: and therewith weeping bitterly, Dear childe (saith she) let me kiss thee before we part, God knows whether ever we shall meet again; and so the child weeping as fast as she, went along with the Archbishop to the Star-chamber, where the Lord Protector and other Lords had stayed all the while looking for his coming back: and as soon as he was entred the room, the Protector spying the child, riseth up and embraceth him, saying, Dear nephew, now welcome with all my heart: next to my Sovereign Lord your Brother, nothing gives me so much contentment as your Presence: and we may believe him, he spake as he thought; for now he had the prey which he so much desired. A few daies after, pretending to have them lodged in a place of more security, until the distempers of the Common-wealth might better be quieted; he caused them in great pomp and state, to be conveyed through London, to the Tower, there at pleasure to remain, till the time of Coronation; whereof

G there was great shew of preparation made.

But now the great work is to be done; the Princes are to be made away: and how to have it done, Hoc opus, hic labor est: there must be potent Instruments; and none so potent as the Duke of Buckingham; and he, by a match to be concluded betwixt their children, and an equal partition of the Treasure of the Realm betwixt them two; not only is drawn to consent, but is most forward to contrive and plot stratagems to effect it. The first rub in the way was the Lord Hastings, who being found so firm to his old Master King Edwards Sons; that nothing could remove him, it was fit to remove him out of the way; which was done in this manner: All the Lords of the Privy Council, in the Protector's name, are convoked to the Tower; where sitting preparations for the Coronation of the young King, are proposed, until the Protector came in; who taking his chair, very affably saluted them, merrily jetting with some, and more then ordinarily pleasant with them all: when after a little talk, he said to the Bishop of Ely; My Lord, I hear you have very good Strawberries at your Garden in Holborn; I pray let us have a mess of them. Most gladly (said the Bishop) and presently sent for some: and then the Protector rising up, prayed the Lords to spare his absence a little; and so departed: Within the space of an hour he returned; but so changed in countenance, and with such inward perturbations, which with sighings and other passionate gestures he expressed so, that it made them all to marvel. After long silence (the better to prepare them to the more attention) he confusedly interrogates, What they deserved that nefariously had practised his destruction? This unexpected interrogation struck such amazement amongst the Lords, that they all sat gazing on one another, and were, as it were, stricken dumb: At length the Lord Hastings, by Buckingham's instigation, as one presuming of his intimacy with the Protector, boldly answered, that they deserved the punishment of Traytors; which all the rest by their silence approved: Whereat the Protector rifest up, and with a stern look upon the Lord Hastings, replied: Why it is the old Sorceress my Brothers Widow, and her partner that common Strumpet Joan Shore, that have by incantation conspired to bereave me of my life: and though by Gods grace I have escaped the end of their malice, yet see the mischief they have done me; for behold (and then he bared his left arm to the elbow, and shewed it) how they have caused this dear limb of mine to wither, and grow useless; and so should all my body have been ferved, if they might have had their will a little longer. Those to whom the Queens religious counsels were not unknown, and who knew his withered arm to have been such from his birth, sat gazing one upon another, not knowing what to think or say; until the Lord Hastings, thinking thereby to leave all blame upon the Queen, and excuse his Paramour Mistress Shore, (whom ever since the death of King Edward, he had entertained for his bed-fellow, and had but that morning parted from her) with a sober look submissively said, If the Queen have conspired---: which word was no sooner out of the Lord Hastings' mouth, then the Protector clapping his hand upon the board, and frowningly looking upon him, said: Tellest thou me of If and And? I tell thee, They, and none but they have done it; and thou thy self art partaker of the villany. Who I my Lord, quoth he? Yeathou Traytor, quoth the Protector; and therewith, upon a watch-word given, those prepared before for that purpose, in the outer Chamber, cried, Treason, Treason! when presently a great number of men in arms came rushing in as it were to guard the Protector, one of which with a Pollax strook a main blow at the Lord Stanley and wounded him on the head; and had slain him outright, if he had not avoided the stroke by slipping backward, and falling down to the ground. Forthwith the Protector arrested the Lord Hastings of high Treason; and wisht him to make haste to be Confessed, for he swore by S. Paul (his usual Oath) that he would not touch bread nor drink till his head were off. It booted not to ask, why; for he knew the Protector's actions were not to be examined. So he was led forth unto the Green before the Chapel within the Tower, where his head was laid down upon a long log of Timber, and there stricken off. His body afterward with his head were interred at Windfor, besides the body of King Edward. In this mans death we may see how inevitable the blowes of Destiny are; for the very night before his death, the Lord Stanley sent a secret Messenger to him at midnight, in all haste to acquaint him with a Dream he had, in which he thought that a Boar with his tusks so goared them both by the heads, that the blood ran about their shoulders: and forasmuch as the Protector gave the Boar for his Cognifance, this Dream made so fearful an impression in his heart, that he was thoroughly resolved to stay no longer: and had made his Horse ready, requiring the Lord Hastings to go with him, and that presently, to be out of danger, before it should be day. But the Lord Hastings answered the messenger: Good Lord! I can tell you Master so much to such trifles, to put such faith in Dreams, which either his own fear fantasie, or else do rise in the nights rest, by reason of the daies thoughts? Go back therefore to thy Master, and commend me to him, and pray him to be merry, and have no fear; for I assure him, I am as sure of the man he wotteth of, as of my own hand. The man he meant, was one Catesby well learned in the Lawes of the Land; who by his favour was grown into good authority in Leicestershire, where the Lord Hastings estate lay. Of this man he made himself so sure, that he thought nothing could be plotted against him, which he would not presently reveal unto him. But this man deceived him; and was grown so inward with the Protector, that being set by the Protector to draw him to be a party in his designs, and finding he could not do it, was himself the first mover to rid him out of the way. Another warning the Lord Hastings had: the same morning in which he was beheaded, his Horse twice or thrice stumbled with him, almost to falling; which though it often happen to such to whom no mischance is toward, yet hath it of old been observed as a token foregoing some great misfortune. Also at the Tower-wharf, near to the place where his head soon after was stricken off, he met with one Hastings a Pursuivant of his own name; to whom he said, Ah, Hastings, dost thou remember I met thee here once with a heavy heart! Yeamy Lord, saith he, I remember it well; and God be thanked that time is past. In faith, man, said the Lord Hastings, I never stood in so great dread of life, as I did when thou and I met here: and low how the world is changed! now stand my Enemies in the danger, as thou mayst hap to hear hereafter; for the Enemies he meant, were the Lord

A Rivers, and other of the Queens kindred, who that very day were beheaded at Pomfret) and I never so merry, nor in so good surety as now I am. That we may know, there is not a greater Omen or sign of ill fortune, then to presume of good. And indeed, such is the uncertainty of our estate in this life, that we seldom know when we are in a tempest at Sea, nor when we are in a Calm on shore; thinking our selves oftentimes most safe, when we are most in danger; and oftentimes to be in danger, when we are most safe: He only is in the true Haven that can say as Christ teacheth us, Thy will be done in Earth as it is in Heaven.

But this Lord being thus put to death; the Lord Protector, to colour the matter, immediately after dinner, in all haste, sent for many substantial Citizens; at whose coming, himself with the Duke of Buckingham stood harnessed in old rusty Brigandines, to make a show they were forced by the sudden danger to take such as they could first come by: and withall, a Herald of Arms is sent with a Proclamation in the Kings name, signifying that the Lord Hastings, with some others, had conspired the same day to have slain the Lord Protector and the Duke of Buckingham, as they sat in Council; and after to have taken upon them to rule the King and Kingdom at their own pleasures. Now was this Proclamation made within two hours after the Lord Hastings was beheaded; and was so curiously indited, and so fair written in Paragraphs, and withal so long, that every child might perceive it was prepared before: which made one that was School-master of Pauls, standing by when the Proclamation was read, to say, Here is a gay goodly Cast; foul cast away for hast! To whom a Merchant answered, It was written by Prophecy. And now by and by, as it were in revenge of her offence, the Protector sent the Sheriffs of London into the house of Shore's Wife, and spoiled her of all her goods, above the value of three thousand Marks; and then conveying her, through London to the Tower, there left her prisoner: where he laid to her charge, that she went about to bewitch him, and was of counsel with the Lord Hastings to destroy him. In conclusion she was laid into Ludgate, and by the Bishop of London put to open Penance for incontinency; going before the Crosse in Procession, upon a Sunday, with a Taper in her hand: in which, although she were out of all array, save her Kirtle only; yet went she so fair and lovely, and withal so womanly and demurely, that many who hated her course of life, yet pityed her course of usage, and were not a little grieved to see her misery. And indeed, this may be said in her behalf, that being in extraordinary favour with King Edward, yet she never used it to the hurt of any, but to the relief of many; and was ever a Mediator, an Oppressor never.

Now it was so contrived by the Protector, that the very day in which the Lord Hastings was beheaded at London, and about the very same hour, there were beheaded at Pomfret, the Lord Rivers, and the other Lords and Knights that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stony-stratford; which was done in the presence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whose service the Protector specially used in that business; who bringing them to the Scaffold, and not suffering them to declare their innocence, lest their words might have inclined men to hate the Protector, caused them hastily without Judgement or Order of Process to be beheaded.

When these were thus rid out of the way, then thought the Protector, that now was the time to put himself in possession of the Crown, but all the study was, by what means this matter being so hainous in it self, might be broken to the people, in such wise as that it might be well taken: for which purpose, it was thought fit to call to this Counsel Edmund Shaw Knight, then Maier of London; who upon promise of advancement, should frame the peoples inclination to it. And because Spiritual men are best hearkned to, for matters of Conscience, some of them were used also; amongst whom, choice was made of John Shaw Clerk, Brother to the Maier; Fryer Penker, Provincial of the Order of the Augustine Fryers: both great Preachers, both of more learning then vertue, of more fame then learning. These two were appointed to preach, the one at Pauls Crosse, the other at the Spittle, in praise of the Protector: Penker in his Sermon so lost his voice, that he was fain to leave off and come down in the midst: Shaw by his Sermon lost his reputation, and soon after his life, for he never after durst come abroad, for very shame of the world.

But now was all the labour and study, to find out some convenient pretext, for which the people should be content to have the Prince deposed, and the Protector be received for King; to which purpose many things were devised: the chief was to alledge Bastardy either in King Edward himself, or in his children, or in both. To lay Bastardy to King Edward, sounded openly to the reproach of the Protector's own Mother, who was Mother to them both; he would therefore that point should more favourably be handled: but the other point concerning the Bastardy of his children, he would have enforced to the uttermost: The ground whereof was, that King Edward had been formerly contracted to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie, by whom he had a Child; though the said Lady, having been examined about it, confessed plainly, they were never assured. Yet upon this pretext, Doctor Shaw taking for his Text, Bastard Plants shall take no deep root; in his Sermon declared, that King Edward was never lawfully married to the Queen, but was before God, Husband to the Lady Elizabeth Lucie, and so his Children Bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himself, nor the Duke of Clarence were reckoned very sure for the Children of the noble Duke Richard, as those that by their favours more resembled other known men; but the Lord Protector (saith he) is the Fathers own figure, his own countenance, the very print of his visage, the plain expresse likeness of that noble Duke. Now, it was before devised, that just at the speaking of these words, the Protector should have come, to the end that these words meeting with his presence, might be taken among the hearers, as though the Holy Ghost had put them in the Preachers mouth, and so should move the people even then to cry, King Richard, King Richard! that it might be after said, he was specially chosen by God, and in a manner by Miracle: But this device failed; for whether by the Protector's slackness in coming, or the Doctors haste in preaching, he had passed those words, and was gone clean to another matter before the Protector came; so as afterward seeing him come, he was fain to leave the matter he had in hand, and out of all order and frame begin to repeat those words again: This is the very noble Prince, the Fathers own figure, his own countenance, the very print of his visage, the plain express likeness of that noble Duke. While these words were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, passed through the people into the place where the Doctors sit; and there fared to hear the Sermon: But the people were so far from crying King Richard, that they cried shame on the Preacher, for abusing his sacred function with so shameful a Sermon.

The Duke of Buckingham at Guildhall, propounding the Duke of Gloucester for the rightful Heir to the Crown.

The Tuesday following this Sermon, the Duke of Buckingham with divers Lords and Knights came to the Guildhall in London; and there before the Maior and whole assembly of Citizens, made a very solemn and long Oration, wherein he recited many grievances of the late King Edward's Government, his many unnecessary Taxations and unjust severities; thereby to bring his Children into hatred: and then remembered them of the late Sermon made at Pauls Cross, by a learned Doctor; who clearly shewed the Bastardy of King Edward's Children, and that Richard Duke of Gloucester was the only rightful and indubitate Heir to the Crown of England: which the Lords of the Kingdom having taken into their consideration, had thereupon agreed to accept him for their King; and now himself was come to acquaint them with it, and to require their consents. Which Oration ended, all men stood wondering at the motion, but no man offered to speak a word. At which the Duke marvelling, as supposing the Maior had prepared them before; he asked the Maior privately, what this silence meant? who answered, that perhaps they had not heard or understood what it was he said. Whereupon the Duke with a more audible voice repeated the same matter again, in a more earnest and plain expression; yet neither did that move them to shew any inclination to the motion. Then the Duke whispering with the Maior, It was thought that the Citizens being used to have such motions made them by their Recorder, they would better hear it from him; and thereupon the Recorder is commanded to move them in it: but the Recorder (called Fitzwilliams) being an honest man, and newly come to his place; repeated only as near as he could the words of the Duke, but added nothing of his own; so as neither did this move the people to break their silence. At last, the Duke seeing their resolved fullness, told them plainly, that all the Nobility and Commons of the Realm were agreed to choose the Protector for their King, as the true and undoubted Heir; so as he needed not to have moved them to it, but only for the great respect they all bear to this Honourable City; and therefore required them plainly to speak their minds, whether they would joyn with them in this choice or no. At this, certain servants of the Dukes, and other of their procuring, standing at the lower end of the Hall, cast up their Caps, and cried aloud, King Richard, King Richard; whereat, though the whole multitude of Citizens marvelled what they meant; yet the Duke taking advantage of it, as of an unanimous consent: A goodly cry (saith he :) and thanked them all for their universal approbation; promising he would acquaint the Protector with the great love they shewed toward him: and then requiring the Maior and chief Citizens to meet him the next morning at Baynards Castle, where the Protector then lay: there to joyn with him, in petitioning the Protector to accept of this their freely proffered subjection; he took his leave and so departed.

The Duke of Buckingham and the Maior of London make suit unto the Protector, to take the Crown upon him.

The next morning according to appointment, they all meet at Baynards Castle; where the Duke of Buckingham sends up word to the Lord Protector, that himself with the Lord Maior and his Brethren, were come to present a supplication to him, concerning a business of great importance: But the Protector (though pre-acquainted with all passages, yet) made it strange what their supplication should be; and answered, that though he suspected nothing which the Duke of Buckingham presented to him, yet he desired at least some slight intimation to what it might tend. To this it was answered, that the business they came about was to be made known to himself in Person; and therefore humbly besought him of admission in his presence: Upon this, as if not yet well assured of their well meaning towards him; he appears unto them in an upper Gallery, making semblance as though he would prevent all danger, by standing something aloof and in his Fort: To whom the Duke of Buckingham, in behalf of the Maior and Nobility there present; in most respectful and reverent manner makes request, that his Grace would pardon what he should deliver to him: and much circumstance he used, before he would discover their cause of coming: but though long first, yet at last he told it: That in respect of the urgent necessities of the Common-wealth, they all humbly intreated him to take upon him the Government of the Kingdom, as in his own Right, to whom they all tendered their Allegiance. At which words, the Protector starting back, as if he had heard something most displeasing to him, passionately answered: I little thought good Cousen, that you of all men would have moved me to a matter which of all things in the world I most decline: Far be it from me to accept of that, which without apparent wrong to my dear deceased Brothers sweet Children, and my own upright Conscience, I cannot well approve of. And then being about to proceed in his premeditated dissimulation; the Duke in a seeming abrupt passion, kneeling upon his

The Protector started at their motion.

A knee, said: Your Grace was pleased to give me free liberty to deliver unto you in the name of this worthy assembly, the tender of their dutiful obedience to you: but I must further add, that it is unanimously resolved on, that your late Brother King Edward's Children, as being generally known to be Illegitimate, shall never be admitted to the Crown of England; and therefore if your Grace shall neither regard your self, nor us so much, as to accept it, we are directly determined to confer it upon some other of the House of Lancaster, that will be more sensible of his own and our good. These words wrought so powerfully upon the Protector's passions, that with some change of Countenance, and not without seeming reluctance, he said: Since I perceive the whole Realm is so resolved, by no means to admit my dear Nephews, being but Children, to reign over you; and seeing the Right of succession belongs justly to me, as the indubitate Heir of Richard Plantagenet Duke of York, my illustrious Father; We are contented to condescend to your importunities, and to accept of the Royal Government of the Kingdom, and will, to the uttermost of my power, endeavour to procure and maintain the welfare thereof. And having so said, he came down from his Gallery, and very formally saluted them all: which so pleased the giddy multitude, that presently they fell to acclamations, Long live King Richard our dread Sovereign Lord! and then every man departed.

But yet accepted it.

THE REIGN OF KING RICHARD THE THIRD.

It was now the eighteenth day of June, in the year 1483. when Richard Duke of Gloucester took upon him the Crown: so as the imaginary Reign of Edward the fifth, continued but just ten weeks. The next day, King Richard with a great train went to Westminster Hall, and placed himself in the Court of the Kings Bench, saying, he would take the Crown upon him in that place where the King himself siteth and ministereth the Law; because he considered that it is the chiefest duty of a King to administer the Laws: And here to get the love of the people by a feigned clemency, he sent for one Fogge out of Sanctuary, who for fear of his displeasure was fled thither; and there in the sight of all the people, caused him to kiss his hand.

After his return home, he took to wife the Lady Anne, youngest Daughter of the great Warwick, and the relict of Prince Edward, Son of Henry the sixth. King Richard marries the relict of Prince Edward, Son of Henry the sixth.

Against his Coronation he had sent for five thousand men out of the North; and these being come under the leading of Robin of Riddestale, upon the fourth of July; together with his new Bride, he went from Baynards Castle to the Tower by water, where he created Edward his Son a child of ten years old, Prince of Wales; John Lord Howard Duke of Norfolk, his Son Sir Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey; William Lord Berkeley Earl of Nottingham, Francis Lord Lovell Viscount Lovell, and his Chamberlain, and the Lord Stanley (who had been committed prisoner to the Tower, in regard his Son the Lord Strange was reported to have levied Forces in Lancashire) not only that day was released out of prison, but was made Lord Steward of his Household. The Archbishop of York was likewise then delivered; but Morton Bishop of Eli (as one that could not be drawn to the disinheriting of King Edward's children) was committed to the Duke of Buckingham, who sent him to his Castle of Brecknock in Wales, there to be in custody. The same night were made seventeen Knights of the Bath, Edmund the Duke of Suffolk's Son, George Gray the Earl of Kent's Son, William the Lord Zanches Son, Henry Burgavenny, Christopher Willoughby, Henry Balington, Thomas Arundell, Thomas Boleyn, Gervois Clifton, William Say, Edmund Bedingfield, William Erdrby, Thomas Lewknor, Thomas of Ormond, John Brown, and William Berkeley. The next day, being the fifth of July, the King rode through the City of London to Westminster, being accompanied with the Dukes of Norfolk, Buckingham, and Suffolk; the Earls of Northumberland, Arundell, Kent, Surrey, Wiltshire, Huntington, Nottingham, Warwick, and Lincoln; the Viscounts, Lisle, and Lovell; the Lords, Stanley, Audley, Daures, Ferrers of Chartley, Poyntz, Scroope of Upsale, Scrop of Bolton, Gray of Codner, Grey of Wilton, Sturton, Cobham, Morley, Burgavenny, Zouch, Ferrers of Croby, Wills, Lumley, Matrevers, Herbert and Beckham, and fourscore Knights. On the morrow, being the sixth of July, the King, with Queen Anne his Wife, came down out of the Whitehall, Morton Bishop of Eli committed to the Duke of Buckingham.

King Richard and his Queen in great State are Crowned, and the manner of it.

A hall, into the great Hall at Westminster, and went directly to the Kings Bench; and from thence, going upon Ray-cloth, bare-footed, went to St. Edwards Shrine, all his Nobility going with him, every Lord in his degree. The Bishop of Rochester bore the Cross before the Cardinal: Then followed the Earl of Huntington, bearing a pair of gilt spurs, signifying Knighthood: Then followed the Earl of Bedford, bearing St. Edwards Staffe for a Relique: After him came the Earl of Northumberland bare-headed, with the pointlesse Sword in his hand, signifying Mercy: The Lord Stanley bare the Mace of the Contableship: The Earl of Kent bare the second Sword, on the right hand of the King, naked, with a point; which signified Justice to the Temporality: The Lord Lovell bore the third Sword on the Kings left hand, with a point, which signified Justice to the Clergy: The Duke of Suffolk followed with the Scepter in his hand, which signified Peace: The Earl of Lincoln bore the Ball and Cross, which signified Monarchy: The Earl of Surrey bore the fourth Sword before the King, in a rich Scabbard; which is called the Sword of Estate: Then went three together; in the midst went Garter King of Arms, in his rich Coat; and on his right hand went the Mayor of London, bearing a Mace; and on his left hand went the Gentleman-Usher of the Privy Chamber: Then followed the Duke of Norfolk, bearing the Kings Crown between his hands: Then followed King Richard in his robes of Purple-velvet, and over his head a Canopy, born by four Barons of the Cinque-ports: and on each side of the King went a Bishop; on one side, the Bishop of Bath; on the other, of Durham: Then followed the Duke of Buckingham, bearing the Kings train, with a white Staffe in his hand, signifying the office of High Steward of England. Then followed the Queens train; before whom was born the Scepter, the Ivory Rod, with the Dove, (signifying innocency) and the Crown: her self apparelled in robes like the Kings, under a rich Canopy, at every Corner thereof a Bell of Gold: On her head she wore a Circlet, set full of precious Stones, the Countess of Richmond bearing her train; the Dutcheffes of Norfolk and Suffolk in their Coronets, attending; with twenty Ladies of estate most richly attired. In this order they passed the palace into the Abbey: and going up to the High Altar, there shifted their Robes; and having other Robes open in divers places from the middle upward, were both of them Anointed and Crowned: and then after the Sacrament received, (having the Host divided betwixt them) they both offered to St. Edwards Shrine; where the King left St. Edwards Crown, wherewith he had been Crowned, and put on his own: and this done, in the same order and state as they came, they returned to Westminster Hall, and there held a most Princely Feast: at the second course whereof, there came into the Hall Sir Robert Dymock the Kings Champion, making Proclamation, that whosoever would say that King Richard was not lawful King of England, he was there ready to prove it against him; and thereupon threw down his Gantlet: and then all the Hall cried, King Richard, King Richard. And thus with some other Ceremonies, the Coronation ended; and the King and Queen returned to their lodgings.

Presently after this, King Richard sent a solemne Ambassage to Lewis King of France, to conclude a League and Amity with him: but the French King so abhorred him and his cruelty, that he would not so much as see, or hear his Ambassadors; but sent them away with shame, in disgrace of their Master.

At this time, with his Queen, he made a Progress to Gloucester, under colour to visit the place of his old Honour; but indeed to be out of the way, having a special villany to be acted: for though he had satisfied his Ambition, by depriving his dear Nephews of their livelihoods; yet it satisfied not his Fear, if he deprived them not also of their lives. For effecting whereof, his old friend the Duke of Buckingham was no fit instrument; it must be one of a baser metal: and to find out such a one he needed not go far; for upon inquiry, he was told of two that lay in the next Chamber to him; Sir Thomas and Sir James Tyrrell, two Brothers like Jacob and Esau, not more near in blood, then different in conditions; of equal goodlines of personage both, but not of equal goodness of mind; Sir Thomas a man of an honest and sober disposition; but Sir James of a turbulent spirit, and one who gaping after preferment, would not stick to make a fortune out of any villany. Being told of this man as he was sitting at the Close-stool, he presently rose and went to him: where being met, the match is soon made up between them; for he found Sir James more ready to undertake the work, then he was himself to set him about it. It only remained to procure him free passage to the place where the work was to be done: for King Richard had formerly sent a trusty Privado of his named John Green, to Sir Robert Brackenbury then Lieutenant of the Tower; thinking that he, having been raised by him, would not have refused to do the deed himself: but when he heard how averse he was from it, Good Lord (saith he) whom may a man trust? Once he saw plainly, that whilst he was Lieutenant, there was no possibility to effect it. To remove therefore this Rub, he sends his Letters Mandatory to Brackenbury, to deliver presently the Keyes of the Tower to Sir James Tyrrell, who being now Lieutenant for the time, and having the two innocent Princes under his custody, gets two other, as very Villains as himself; the one Miles Forrest, the other James Dighton his Horse-keeper, a big sturdy Knave: and these he makes his under-agents; who coming into the childrens chamber in the night, (for they were suffered to have none about them, but one black Will, or William Slaughter, a bloody Rascal) they suddenly lapped them up in their clothes, and keeping down by force the feather-bed and pillows hard under their mouths, so stifled them, that their breath failing, they gave up their innocent soul to God: whom when the Murderers perceived, first by their struggling with the Pains of death, and then by their long lying still, to be thoroughly dead; they laid their bodies out upon the bed, and then fetched Sir James to see them; who presently caused their bodies to be buried under the stairs, under a heap of stones: from whence they were afterward removed to a place of Christian burial, by a Priest of Sir Robert Brackenbury; who dying within a few daies after, and none knowing the place but himself, was cause that it hath not been known to this day: and gave occasion afterward to the Imposture of Perkin Warbeck in King Henry the Seventh's Reign. Some report, that King Richard caused their bodies to be taken up, and closed them in lead, and then to be put in a Coffin full of holes, hooked at the ends with Iron; and so cast into a place called the Black Deep, at the Thames mouth; to be sure they should never rise up, nor be seen again. And now see the Divine revenge upon the Actors of this execrable murder: Adiles Forrest, at S. Martins le Grand, piece-meal rotted away: Dighton lived at Calice a long time after; but detested of all men, died in great misery: Sir James Tyrrell was beheaded afterward on the Tower-hill for Treason: and King Richard himself, after this abominable fact done never had a quiet mind; troubled with fearful Dreams, and would sometimes in the night start out of his bed, and run about the Chamber in great fright, as if all the Furies of Hell were hanging about him: that it was verified in him, Ulix Tisiphone vocat agmina sua furoribus.

Confederacies in evil are seldom long-lived, and commonly end in a reciprocal destruction: and so was it now with King Richard and the Duke of Buckingham: They had confederated together to the destruction of many; and now their confederacy dissolves in both their ruins: but what the cause was of their dissolving, is not so certain: whether it were that the Duke thought not himself so well rewarded, as his great services had deserved; or whether it were, that King Richard thought not himself absolute King, as long as the Duke, by whose means he came to be King, was in such a height of greatness; or whether it were (as was rather thought) that the Duke being a man ambitious, and of an aspiring spirit; though he had himself been the means to bring King Richard to the Crown; yet when the Crown was put upon his head, so envied at it, that he turned his head another way, as not enduring the sight; and for the same cause, was willing not to have been present at the Coronation, pretending sickness in excuse of his absence; but that King Richard sent him a sharp message, requiring him to come, or he would fetch him: whereupon the Duke went, but with so ill a mind, that he bore it in mind ever after. Whatsoever it was, certain it is, that presently after the Coronation, there grew great jealousies between them, and the Duke retired himself to his Castle at Brecknock, where he had the Bishop of Ely in custody. And here we may observe the unfathomable depth of the Divine Providence; the bottom whereof, the soundest judgment of man can never find, as working effects by contrary causes: for where King Richard had committed the Bishop to the Duke, as to one that would have a most watchful eye over him; this which the King did for the Bishops greater punishment, proved a means afterward of the Bishops greater advancement, and a means at the present of King Richard's ruine. For the Duke being retired home, and having his head full of thoughts, that of necessity it required vent; for his own recreation, would sometimes fall in talk with the Bishop; with whose discourse (as he was a man of great wit and solid judgement) the Duke was so taken, that he grew to delight in nothing more, then to be conferring with him. One time it happened that the Duke had opened his mind something freely to him; and the Bishop following him in his own way, and cunningly working upon that humour of the Duke, which he found most working in the Duke; which he perceived to grow out of envy to King Richard, he said to this purpose; My Lord, you know I followed first the part of King Henry the sixth, and still could have had my wish, his Son should have had the Crown, and not King Edward: But after that God had ordained King Edward to reign; I was never so mad, that I would with a dead man strive against the quick. And so was I to King Edward also a faithful Chaplain, and glad would have been that his child had succeeded him: Howbeit, if the secret Judgment of God have otherwise provided, I purpose not to labour to set up that which God pulleth down. And as for the Lord Protector, and now King; --- and even there he left: saying, he had already meddled too much with the world; and would from that day meddle with his Books and his Beads, and no further. Then longed the Duke exceedingly to hear what he would have said; because he ended with the King, and there suddenly stopped: and thereupon intreated him to be bold to say whatsoever he thought; whereof he faithfully promised there should never come hurt, and peradventure more good then he would think; and withall, that himself intended to use his secret Counsel; which (he said) was the only cause for the which he had procured of the King to have him in his custody. The Bishop humbly thanked him, and said: In good faith my Lord, I love not to talk much of Princes, as a thing not all out of peril, though the word be without fault, for so much as it shall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleareth the Prince to construe it. And ever I think on Aesop's Tale, that when the Lyon had proclaimed on pain of death, that no horned beast should abide in a certain Wood, one that had in his forehead a bunch of flesh, fled away a great pace: the Fox that saw him run so fast, asked him whither he made all that haste? who answered, in faith I neither wot nor reck, so I were once hence, because of the Proclamation made of horned beasts: Why fool, (quoth the Fox) thou mayest abide well enough, the Lyon meant it not by thee, for it is no horn that is in thy head: No marry (quoth he) that wot I well enough; but what if he call it a horn, where am I then? The Duke laughed at the Tale, and said: My Lord, I warrant you, neither the Lyon nor the Boar shall pick any matter at any thing here spoken; for it shall never come near their ear. Then said the Bishop, In good faith Sir,

A did, the thing I was about to say, taken as well as afore God I meant it, could deserve but thanks; and yet taken as I ween it would, might happen to turn me to little good, and you to less. Then longed the Duke much more, to hear what it was: whereupon the Bishop said, My Lord, as for the late Protector, with he is now King in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title; but for the weal of the Realm I could wish he had in him those excellent virtues which God hath planted in the person of your Grace; and there left again. The Duke somewhat marvelling at his sudden pause, said, My Lord, I cannot but note your sudden stopping in your speech, so as your words come not to any direct sentence, whereby I may have knowledge, either what your inward intent is now toward the King, or what your affection is toward me: I therefore intreat you to use no more such obscurity, but plainly to disclose your mind unto me, who upon mine honour will be as secret in the case, as the deaf and dumb person is to the finger, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bishop then upon confidence of the Dukes promise, said, My Lord, I plainly perceive, the Kingdom being in the case as it is, under such a King as now we have, must needs decay and be brought to confusion; but one hope I have, that when I consider and daily behold your noble Personage, your Justice, your ardent Love towards your Country, and in like manner the great love of your Country towards you; I must needs think this Realm fortunate, that hath such a Prince in store, meet and apt to be a Governour; in whose person consisteth the very undoubted Image of true honour. And then taxing the present King with many cruelties and oppressions, he concluded, saying: And now my Lord, if either you love God, your Linage, or your native Country, you must yourself take upon you the Crown and Imperial Diadem of this Realm; but if your self will refuse to take it upon you, I then adjure you, by the faith you own to God, and by the love you bear to your native Country, to devise some way how the Realm may by your Princely policy be reduced to some convenient regiment, under some good Governour by you to be appointed: And if you could devise to set up again the Linage of Lancaster, or advance the eldest daughter of King Edward to some puissant Prince: not only the new Crowned King should little enjoy the glory of his dignity, but all Civil War should cease, and Peace and Profit should again flourish. When the Bishop had ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake not of a good while; which sore abashed the Bishop, and made him change colour: which the Duke perceiving, he said: Be not afraid my Lord, all promises shall be kept: so for that time they parted. The next day, the Duke sent for the Bishop, and having rehearsed unto him the Communication had between them the day before, he went on and said: My Lord of Ely, since I perceive your true heart and sincere affection toward me, I will now discover unto you all that hath passed my own imaginations. After I had found the dissimulation and falseness of King Richard, and specially after I was informed of the murder of the two young Princes, to which (God be my Judge) I never condescended; I so much abhorred the sight, and much more the company of him, that I could no longer abide in his Court; but feigning a cause to depart, I took my leave of him, (he thinking nothing less, then that I was displeased) and so returned to Brecknock to you; but in that returning, whether it were by inspiration, or else through some melancholick disposition, I had divers imaginations how to deprive this unnatural and bloody Butcher of his Royal seat and Dignity. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take upon me the Crown, now was the time, when this Tyrant was abhorred and detested of all men; and knowing not of any that could pretend Title before me: In this imagination I rested two daies at Temkesbury; in my journey from thence, I mused and thought, that it was not best nor convenient to take upon me as a Conquerour, for then I was sure that all men, and specially the Nobility would oppose me; but at last there sprung up a branch in my head, which I surely thought would have brought forth fair flowers, but they turned indeed to dry weeds: for I suddenly remembered that the Lord Edmund Duke of Somerset, my Grandfather, was with King Henry the sixth, in two or three degrees of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster; so that I thought certainly, my Mother being eldest Daughter to Duke Edmund, that I was next Heir to King Henry the sixth, of the House of Lancaster: This Title pleased well such as I made of my Counsel, and much more it elevated my ambitious intent; but while I was in a maze, whether I were best suddenly to set this title open amongst the Common people, or else keep it secret a while, see what chanced: As I rode between Warminster and Bridgenorth, I met with the Lady Margaret Countess of Richmond, now Wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the Daughter & sole Heir to John Duke of Somerset my Grandfathers elder Brother (which was as clean out of my mind, as if I had never seen her) so that she and her Son the Earl of Richmond have both of them Titles before mine; and then I clearly saw how I was deceived: whereupon I determined, utterly to relinquish all such fantastical imaginations concerning the obtaining the Crown my self; and found there could be no better way to settle it in a true establishment, then that the Earl of Richmond, very Heir of the House of Lancaster, should take to wife the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward, the very Heir of the House of York; that so the two Roses may be united in one: and now (faith the Duke) I have told you my very mind. When the Duke had said this, the Bishop was not a little glad, for this was the mark he had himself aimed at: and thereupon, after some complements of extolling his device, he said: Since by your Graces incomparable wisdom, this noble conjunction is now moved; it is in the next place necessary to consider, what friends we shall first make privy of this intention. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with the Countess of Richmond the Earls Mother; who knoweth where he is, either in captivity, or at large in Britain. And thus was the foundation laid of a league, by these two great men; by which the death of the two young Princes was fully revenged: and it was not talk-of only, but presently put in execution; for now is Reynold Bray employed by the Bishop, to his Mistress the Duchesse of Richmond; Doctor Lewis the Duchesse's Physician was employed by her to the Queen Elizabeth; Hugh Conway and Thomas Rame were employed to the Earl of Richmond to acquaint them, but in most secret manner, with the intended plot; and to procure their promises to the propounded marriage; which was no hard matter to make them all willing to their own wives. This done, Instruments are employed to draw in parties to the confederacy; Bray by his credit drew in Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir John Cheyne, Richard Guildford, Thomas Rame and others; Arswick likewise drew in Hugh Conway, Thomas Colepepper, Thomas Roper, with some others; Doctor Lewis drew in Edward Courtney and his Brother Peter Bishop of Exeter. It is memorable that Thomas Conway being sent most part by Sea, and Thomas Rame most part by Land; yet came to the Earl of Richmond in Britain, within the space of little more than an hour; upon whose information of the plot, the Earl acquaints the Duke of Britain with it, who, though by Hutton King Richard's Ambassador, he had by many great offers been solicited to detain him in prison; yet he both readily promised, and really performed both his advice and aid to the Earls proceedings. In this mean time Bishop Morton, not without asking the Dukes leave, though without obtaining it, secretly in disguise, gets him into his Isle of Ely; and there having done the Earl good Offices by procuring of friends, he thence passeth into Britain to him, from whence returned no more, till afterward the Earl being King, sent for him home and made him Archbishop of Canterbury.

But though all these things were carried closely, and Oath taken by all for secrecy, yet came it to King Richards knowledge; who notwithstanding dissembling it, sends for the Duke of Buckingham to come unto him; and he putting off his coming with pretended excuses, is at last peremptorily sent for to come upon his Allegiance: when he returned this resolute answer, that he owed no Allegiance to such a perjur'd inhumane Butcher of his own Fleish and Blood; and so from that time preparation for Arms is made on both sides. The Duke had gotten a good power of Welshmen; and the Marquess of Dorset having gotten out of Sanctuary, was labouring in Yorkshire to raise Forces; the like did the two Courtneys in Devonshire and Cornwall, and Guilford and Rame in Kent. King Richard setting forward with his Forces; the Duke of Buckingham doth the like, intending at Gloucester to have passed the Severn; and so to have joyned with the two Courtneys; but such abundance of rain at that time fell, that the Severn was broken out, and impossible to be passed over; which the Welshmen seeing, and taking it for an ill sign, they secretly Aipt away: so as the Duke left well-neer alone, without either Page or so much as a Foot-man, repaired to the house of one Humphrey Bannister neer to Shrewsbury; who having been raised by him, and his Father before him; he thought himself safe under his roof: But Bannister, upon Proclamation made by King Richard, that whosoever could apprehend the Duke, should have a thousand pound for his labour; like an ungrateful and perfidious wretch, discovered him to John Mitton High Sheriffe of Shropshire, who took him in a pill'd black Cloak, as he was walking in an Orchard behind the house; and carried him to Shrewsbury, where King Richard then lay; and there without Arraignment or Legal proceeding, was in the Market-place beheaded. Whether Bannister received the Proclaimed reward from the hand of the King, is uncertain; but certain it is, that he received the reward of a Villain from the hand of Divine Justice, for himself was afterward hanged for man-slaughter, his eldest Daughter was deflowered by one of his Carters, or as some say, stricken with a foul Leprosie; his eldest Son in a desperate Lunacy murdered himself, and was found to have done so, by the Coroners Inquest; and his younger Son in a small puddle was strangled and drowned.

Upon this dyaster of the Duke of Buckingham, his complices shifted for themselves; some taking Sanctuary, some keeping themselves in unknown places, but many conveyed themselves into Britain to the Earl of Richmond; of whom the Marquess Dorset, John Lord Wells, the Bishop of Exeter and his Brother Sir John Bourchier, Sir Edward Woodville Brother to Queen Elizabeth, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Cheyne and his two Brethren, Sir William Brackley, Sir William Brandon, and his Brother Thomas, Sir Richard Edgecome, Hollowell and Poynings Captains, were the chief. While these things are in doing, King Richard receives intelligence from Hutton his Ambassador lieger in Britain; that the Duke not only refused to refrain the Earl of Richmond, but intendeth also to give him assistance: whereupon the King took present order for preparing his Navy to stop the Earls landing in any Port of England. He apprehended also in divers parts of the Realm, certain Gentlemen of the Earl of Richmond's confederation; but coming himself to the City of Exeter, and to the Castle there, and understanding that it was called Rugefont, he suddenly fell into a dump, and as one astonished, said: Well, I see my daies be not long: He spake this of a Prophecy told him, that when he came once to Richmond, he should not live long after: which fell out to be true, not in respect of this Cattle; but in respect of Henry Earl of Richmond.

Upon the twelfth day of October in the year 1484. the Earl of Richmond with forty Ships, and five thousand waged Britains took to Sea; but that evening by tempest of weather, his whole Fleet was dispersed, so as only the Ship wherein the Earl himself was, with one little Bark, was driven upon the Coast of Cornwall; where discovering upon the shore great store of armed Souldiers, to resist his landing; he hoysed sayl, and returning toward France, arrived in Normandy; from whence sending Messengers to Charles the Eighth King of France, he was by him not only kindly invited to come to his Court, but was aided also with good sums of money to bear his charges. After this, the Earl returning into Britain, received there the news of the Duke of Buckingham's death, and the dispersing of the Confederates Forces; with which though he was at first much troubled, yet was he as much comforted afterward, when he saw the Marquess Dorset, and those other Lords and Captains come unto him: soon after whose coming, upon Christmas day before the high Altar in the great Church of Rheims, the Earl of Richmond gave Oath, to marry the Lady Elizabeth, as soon as he should be quietly settled in the Government of England; and thereupon all the Lords and Knights there present, did him homage, and in the same place, each to other religiously Vowed, taking the Sacrament upon it; never to cease prosecuting war against King Richard, till either his Deposition or Destruction.

King Richard being informed of these things, makes diligent enquiry after all such as might be suspected to be favourers of Richmond's association; of whom Sir George Brown, and Sir Roger Clifford with four other Gentlemen are apprehended and executed at London: Sir Thomas Sentleger, who married Anne the Duke of Exeter's Widow, this Kings own Sister, and Thomas Rame Esquire were executed at Exeter. Thomas Marquess Dorset, and all such as were with the Earl of Richmond, were at Parliament then holden attainted of Treason, and all their Goods and Lands seized on to the Kings use: Besides these, a poor Gentleman called Collingborn, for making a small ryme of three of his wicked Counsellors; the Lord Lovell, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby: which ryme was thus framed: The Cat, the Rat, and Lovell the Dog; rule all England under a Hog: was put to death, and his body divided into four quarters.

At this time, a Truce is concluded betwixt England and Scotland, for three years; and for feeling a firmer Amity between the two Kingdoms, a marriage is treated of between the Duke of Rohsay, eldest Son to the King of Scots; and the Lady Anne de la Poole, Daughter to John Duke of Suffolk, by Anne Sister to King Richard: which Sister he so much favoured, that after the death of his own Son, who died some time before; he caused John Earl of Lincoln, her Son and his Nephew, to be proclaimed Heir apparent to the Crown of England.

And now King Richard, to take away the root of his fear, once again sent Ambassadors to the Duke of Britain, with order (besides the great gifts they carried with them). to make offer, that King Richard should yearly pay and answer the Duke of all the Revenues and Profits of all lands and possessions, as well belonging to the Earl of Richmond, as of any other Nobleman or Gentleman that were in his company; if he after that time would keep them in continual prison, and restrain them from liberty. But the Duke of Britain being at that time fallen into such infirmity, that the Ambassadors could have no audience; they addressed themselves to Peter Landois the Dukes chief Treasurer: and he taken with this golden hook, faithfully promised to satisfy their Request; and had done so indeed, but that Bishop Morton sojourning then in Flanders, had by his friends intelligence of his purpose, presently informed the Earl thereof. The Earl was then at Vannes; who, upon the Bishops information, taking with him only five Servants, as though he went but to visit some friend; when he was five miles forward on his way, suddenly turned into a Wood adjoining; and there changing apparel with one of his Servants, followed after as their attendant; and never returned, till by waies unknown he came to his company abiding at Angiers: yet was not his departure so secret nor so sudden, but that Peter Landois had notice of it; who sending Poits after him, was so neer overtaking him, that he was scarce entered one hour into France, when the Poits arrived at the Confines, and then durst go no further. In the mean time, Sir Edward Woodville and Captain Poynings, who with their companies were left behind in Vannes, had been in danger of Peter Landois his malice; but that the Duke being informed by the Chancellor of their case, not only protected them, but furnished them with all necessaries for their journey to the Earl: and was so incensed against Landois for this action of his, that for this and some other over-bold presumptions, he was afterward hanged.

The Earl having passed this danger in Britain, and being arrived in France, addresseth himself to the French King, imploring his aid; and hath it promised and performed: and in this time John Vere Earl of Oxford, who had long time been kept prisoner in the Castle of Hammes, so far prevailed with James Blunt Captain of the Fortrefs, and Sir John Fortescue Porter of the Town of Callice; that not only they suffered him to be at liberty, but accompanied him also to the Earl of Richmond, to whom Captain Blunt gave assurance that the Fortrefs remained wholly at his devotion. At this time also there resorted to the Earl, divers young Gentlemen that were Students in the University of Paris, proffering him their service; amongst whom was Richard Fox, at that time famous for his learning; with whom afterward the Earl advised in all his affairs, made him one of his most Privy Council, and at last Bishop of Winchester.

But now King Richard having been disappointed of his design in Britain, hath another way in his head to disappoint the Earl of Richmond of his marriage with the Daughter of Queen Elizabeth; and to this end, he sent to the Queen (being still in Sanctuary) divers messengers, who should first excuse and purge him of all things formerly attempted and done against her; and then should largely promise promotions innumerable, not only to her self, but also to her Son that not only she began to relent, but at last was content to submit her self wholly to the Kings pleasure. And thereupon putting in oblivion the murder of her innocent Children, the butchering of her own Brother and Son, the infamy of her royal Husband, the asperion of Adultery cast upon her self, the imputation of Bastardy laid to her Daughters, forgetting also her Oath made to the Earl of Richmond's Mother; seduced by flattering words, she first delivered into King

The Queen is brought to give her consent.

King Richard's hands her five Daughters, and after sent Letters to the Marquess her Son, being then at Paris with the Earl of Richmond; willing him by any means to leave the Earl, and with all speed to repair into England; where for him were provided great Honours and Promotions: Assuring him further, that all offences on both parts were forgotten and forgiven; and both he and she incorporated in the Kings favour. If we wonder at this credulity in the Queen, we may conceive she was moved with the two great motives of Fear and Hope: she feared (no doubt) that if she denied the Kings request, he would presently take some sharp course both against her and her Daughters; and she hoped that if she yielded to his request, he would undoubtedly perform his promise, seeing it was as easie for him to keep it as to break it.

King Richard
rids himself of his present Wife: and by what devices.

But now King Richard's purpose being to marry one of his Brother King Edward's Daughters: there was one impediment which directly hindered it; that he had a wife living, and how to be rid of her, that he might not bring new aspersions upon himself, he could not well tell; yet this he resolved, that he rid of her he would by some way or other: but before he would use extremity, he would first try milder waies; and first he abtained both from her bed and company, and complained to divers of her barrenness; which coming to her ear, he hoped might cause her to die with grief: And when this device failed, he then caused a rumour to be spread among the people, that she was suddenly dead; hoping the very conceit thereof would kill her: when this device also failed, (for the Queen hearing of it, and mistrusting the worst, with a most sorrowful countenance came unto him, demanding what she had done, that he should judge her worthy to die? who answered with fair words, bidding her be of good cheer, for (to his knowledge) she should have no other cause) he then made sure work; for within few daies after, whether by poison, or by what other means, it is not certainly known, she departed this life; and with all solemnity, not without some formal tears of King Richard, was interred in St. Peter's Church at Westminster.

He makes love
Elizabeth.

King Richard now by his wives death, having made himself way to marry another; used all the alluring means he can devise, to win the love of the Lady Elizabeth his Niece; but meaning at last to purchase his desire by Rape, if he could not otherwise; and had perhaps done it, but that the storms threatened from beyond the Seas, growing every day more strong then other, forced him to prorogue the execution of his desires, and look to the prevention of his present danger. The Lord Stanley is commanded presently to levie Forces for the Kings aid, as he will justify his integrity to him; but yet is not permitted to go down into the Countrey, until he had left George Lord Strange his eldest Son, as a pledge of his Loyalty behind him. And now King Richard being informed (though the information was craftily suborned by his enemies) that the Earl of Richmond was out of hope of any great assistance from France; discharged the Ships which he had appointed to guard the Seas, and likewise all the Souldiers; only order is given for diligent watching of the Beacons.

Which makes
coming over.

At this time, one Morgan Kidwelly, a Student at the Inns of Court, with great hazard of his life, passed over to the Earl; informing him, that King Richard by all means laboured to match himself with the Lady Elizabeth: which so wrought with the Earl, that he saw there was no lingering: and the more, being by him further informed, that Rice ap Thomas and John Savage, two powerful men in their Countreys, were ready with great Forces to assist him: Whereupon, not having above two thousand Mercenaries, and but indifferent Shipping to convey him over; about the middle of August he put to Sea, and by the advice of the said Kidwelly, steered his course for Wales, and on the seventeenth day after his departure from Harflew, arrived at Milford Haven; and there landing his Forces without trouble or impeachment, from thence marched peaceably to Hereford, where by the Inhabitants he was joyfully received. Here he receiveth news by Captain Arnold Butler, that the Earl of Pembroke with all his retinue was upon the way to joyn with him; also thither came to him Richard Griffith and John Morgan, with a band of brave Welsh men; and the same day Sir Gilbert Talbot with all the Earl of Shrewsbury's Tenants, (being about two thousand well appointed men) came unto him: with these he marched towards Shrewsbury; at which time word is brought him, that Sir Robert Herbert and Rice ap Thomas, were ready with a great power to stop his passage: which somewhat troubled him, that his friends so suddenly should revolt: but it was but a trick of Rice ap Thomas to make his bargain the surer; soon after, Rice ap Thomas meets him, and offers him his service, so as the Earl will pledge his faith to perform his promise formerly made; which was, that having once obtained the Crown, he would make Rice sole Governour of Wales; which was now assented to, and afterward performed. At this time the Lord Stanley with five thousand men had taken up his lodging at the Town of Leicester; but hearing of the Earls march that way, he left Leicester and went to Adderton, not daring to shew himself openly for the Earl; for fear the King should put his Son the Lord Strange to death, whom he had left an Hostage with him.

All this time King Richard lay at Nottingham, and was as it were fatally taken with a spirit of security, hearing that the Earl had but small assistance either from France or in England; and therefore slighting him as little able to do any greater matter: but when he heard that part of his own Forces was revolted to him, then he began to look about him, and sends present direction to the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Northumberland and Surrey, with Sir Thomas Brackenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, with all speed to bring their Forces to him at Lutetworth, from whence upon their arrival, hearing that the Earl was encamped at Lichfield, he marcheth thitherward: At which time,

A time, Sir Walter Hungerford and some others, withdrew themselves from King Richard's part: and Sir John Savage, Sir Bryan Stanford, and Sir Simon Digby, with their several Forces, joyned with the Earl.

King Richard took the advantage of a large Plain near Bosworth, adjoining to a hill called Anne Beame; where he encamped: And observing by his Adversaries manner of approach, that they meant to give him battel, he the next morning put his Forces in order: The Vanguard was led by the Duke of Norfolk, which consisted of one thousand two hundred Bow-men, flanked with two hundred Cuyrassiers, under the conduct of the Earl of Surrey: The Battail King Richard led himself, which consisted of a thousand Bill-men, empaled with two thousand Pikes: The Rereward was led by Sir Thomas Brackenbury, consisting of two thousand mingled weapons, with two wings of Horsemen, containing fifteen hundred, all of them cast into square maniples; expecting the Lord Stanley's his coming with two thousand, most of them Horsemen: But the Lord Stanley carried himself so warily, that he might neither give cause of suspicion to the King, nor yet cause of disadvantage to the Earl: that when early in the morning the Earl sent unto him, desiring his present repair; he answered, that he must look for no aid from him, till the Battails should be joyned; and therefore advised him, with all possible speed to give the Onset. This answer somewhat staggered the Earl, because his number did but little exceed one half of the Kings: Yet to make the best shew he could, by the advice of his Council of War, he made his Vaward open and thin; of which John Earl of Oxford had the leading: the Earl himself led the Battail: Sir Gilbert Talbot commanding the right wing, and Sir John Savage the left: whose Souldiers being all alike clad in white Coats and Hoods of Frize, by the reflexion of the Sun upon them, made them appear in the view of their Enemies, double the number. The Rereward was governed by the Earl of Pembroke, which consisted most of Horse, and some Pikes and black Bills. King Richard to encourage his Souldiers, made a solemn speech unto them: But alas! what hope could he have to put them in heart, whose hearts he had lost? or to raise alacrity in others, who had none in himself? For now the remembrance of his fore-passed villanies, and specially a fearful Dream he had the night before, (wherein it seemed to him, he saw divers Images like Devils, which pulled and haled him, not suffering him to take any rest or quiet) so damped his spirits, that although he set a good face upon the matter, yet he could not choose but have a prefiging fear that the date of his daies was not far from expiring. The Earl of Richmond on the other side, having a clear conscience in himself, and speaking to men that followed him for love; had the easier means to give them encouragement: which he did with so cheerful a countenance, as though already he had gotten the victory. After their military exhortations ended, King Richard commanded to give the onset. Between both Armies there was a great March; which the Earl left on his right hand, that it might be a defence for his Souldiers on that side; and besides by so doing, he had the Sun at his back, and in the faces of the enemy. When King Richard saw that the Earls company was passed this March, he commanded with all speed to set upon them. Then were the Arrows let fly on both sides, and those spent, they came to hand-strokes; at which encounter comes in the Lord Stanley, and joyns with the Earl. The Earl of Oxford in the mean time, fearing lest his company should be compassed in with the multitude of his enemies, gave charge in every rank, that no man should go above ten-foot from the Standard: whereupon they knit themselves together, and ceased a while from fighting: which the Enemy seeing, and mistrusting some fraud, they also paused and left striking. But then the Earl of Oxford, having brought all his Band together, set on the enemy afresh; which the enemy perceiving, they placed their men slender and thin before, but thick and broad behind; and resolutely again began the fight. While these two Vanguards were thus contending, King Richard was informed, that the Earl of Richmond with a small number was not far off: whereupon he presently makes towards him; and being of an invincible courage, whereof he was now to give the last proof, he made so furious an assault, that first with his own hands he slew Sir William Brandon who bore the Earls Standard; next he unhorsed and overthrew Sir John Cheyney, a strong and stout man at Arms; and then assaunted the Earl of Richmond himself, who (though no man would have thought it, yet) for all the Kings fury held him off at his Launces point, till Sir William Stanley came in with three thousand fresh men: and then oppressed with multitude, King Richard is there slain. It is said that when the Battail was at the point to be lost, a swift Horse was brought unto him, with which he might have saved himself by flight, but out of his undaunted courage he refused it, saying, He would that day make an end of all Battels, or else lose his life. In this Battel, Henry Earl of Northumberland, who led King Richard's Rereward, never struck stroke; as likewise many other, who followed King Richard more for fear then love: and so King Richard who had deceived many in his time, was at this time deceived by many: which was not unforeseen by some, who caused a Rhyme to be set upon the Duke of Norfolk's gate the night before the Battel; which was this:

Jack of Norfolk be not too bold,
For Dickon thy Master is bought and sold.

Yet notwithstanding this warning, the noble Duke continued firm to King Richard; and more considering what he was towards him, then what towards others; followed him at the last, and in his quarrel lost his life. This John Howard was the Son of Sir Robert Howard Knight, and Margaret eldest Daughter of Thomas Monbray Duke of Norfolk, in whose right he was created Duke of Norfolk by King Richard the Third, in the year 1483. having been made a Baron before by King Edward the Fourth. The whole number slain in this battel on King Richard's part, was not above a thousand persons; whereof of the Nobility, besides the Duke of Norfolk, only Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir Robert Brackenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more. Sir William Catesby, one of the chief Counsellors of King Richard, with divers others, were two daies after beheaded at Leicester. Amongst those that ran away, were Francis Viscount Lovell, Humphrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his Brother, who took Sanctuary in Saint Johns at Gloucester. Of Captives and Prisoners there were great number. Henry Earl of Northumberland, who though on King Richard's side, intermeddled not in the battel, was incontinently taken into favour, and made of the Council: But Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, though he submitted himself, yet as having been specially familiar with King Richard, was committed to the Tower; where he remained a long time: but at last was delivered and highly promoted. On the Earl of Richmond's part, were slain scarce a hundred persons; (some say, but ten) of whom the principal was Sir William Brandon, the Earls Standard-bearer. This battel was fought at Bosworth near Leicester-shire, the two and twentieth day of August, in the year 1485. having continued little above two hours. Presently after the battel, the Earl Knighted in the field, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir John Mortimer, Sir William Willoughby, Sir Rict ap Thomas, Sir Robert Poynts, Sir Humphrey Stanley, Sir John Turberville, Sir Hugh Pershall, Sir R. Edgecombe, Sir John Pykenill, and Sir Edmund Carem: and then kneeling down, he rendered to Almighty God his hearty Thanks for the Victory he had obtained; and commanded all the hurt and maimed persons to be cured: whereat the people rejoicing, clapped their hands and cried, King Henry, King Henry: which good will and gladness of the people when the Lord Stanley saw, he took the Crown of King Richard, which was found amongst the spoils in the field, and set it on the Earl's head, as though he had been elected King by the voice of the people. It may not be forgotten, that when King Richard was come to Bosworth, he sent to the Lord Stanley to come presently to his presence; which if he refused to do, he swore by Christs Passion, that he would strike off his Sons head before he dined: whereto the Lord Stanley answered, That if he did so, he had more Sons alive, and he might do his pleasure; but to come to him, he was not then determined. Which answer when King Richard heard, he commanded the Lord Stanley immediately to be beheaded; but being at the very time when both Armies were in fight of each other; his Lords persuaded him, it was now time to fight, and not to put to execution; and so the Lord Stanley escaped.

Of his Taxations.

WE must not look for Taxations in kind, in this Kings Reign; for he drew from his Subjects not money so much as bloud; and the money he drew was moft by bloud, which drew on Confiscations: whereof let never any Prince make a Precedent: for where Taxations properly do but Tondere, these did Deglwhere. Yet in his second year, he called a Parliament, wherein, besides the great confiscations of those that were then attainted, he imposed upon the people a great Tax, which what it was, is not Recorded.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

HAVING gotten the Crown by Pestilent courses, he sought to establish it by wholesome Laws: for in no Kings Reign were better Laws made, then in the Reign of this man. Amongst other of his Laws, it was enacted, that from thenceforth, the Commonalty of the Realm should in no wise be charged by any imposition called a Benevolence, nor any such like charge; and that such actions called a Benevolence, before this time taken, shall be taken for no example to make any such like charge hereafter; but shall be damned and annulled for ever. Many other good Laws were by him made; that we may say, he took the waies of being a good King, if he had come to be King by waies that had been good.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN his time, the troubles of the Temporalty kept the Clergy at quiet; and though there were complainings in the Streets, there was none in the Church. Only Shores Wife might complain, why he should do Penance for offending lightly against only the seventh Commandement; and King Richard do none for offending heavily against all the ten; but that perhaps he had gotten some good fellow to be his Confessor.

The Lord Stanley takes the Crown from King Richard's head, and puts it on the Earl of Richmond.

No Benevolence to be required.

Works of Piety done by him.

AS bad as this King was, yet some good works he did: he founded a Colledge at Middleham beyond York; and a Collegiate Chauntry in London, near unto the Tower, called our Lady of Barking: He endowed the Queens Colledge in Cambridge, with five hundred Marks of yearly revenue; and disforested the great field of Whitchwood, which King Edward his Brother had inclosed for Deer.

Of Casualties happening in his time.

IN his second year, at the time when the Duke of Buckingham meant to pass with his Army over Severn, so great an inundation was of water, that men were drowned in their beds, houses were overturned, children were carried about the fields swimming in Cradles, beasts were drowned on hills: which rage of water continued ten daies; and is to this day in the Countreys thereabout, called the Great water, or the Duke of Buckingham's water.

Of his Wife and Issue.

HE married Anne the second Daughter of Richard Nevil the great Earl of Warwick, being the Widow of Edward Prince of Wales, the Son of King Henry the sixth: she lived his Wife to the last year of his Reign; and then to make way for another, was brought to her end, and laid at rest in the Abby of Westminster: By her he had only one Son, born at Middleham near Richmond in the County of York; at four years old, created earl of Salisbury by his Uncle King Edward the fourth; at ten years old created Prince of Wales by his Father King Richard, but dyed soon after.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

THERE never was in any man a greater uniformity of Body and Minde then was in him; both of them equally deformed. Of Body he was but low, crook-backt, hook-shouldered, splay-footed, and goggle-eyed, his face little and round; his complexion swarthy, his left arm from his birth dry and withered: born a Monster in nature, with all his teeth, with hair on his head, and nails on his fingers and toes. And just such were the qualities of his minde: One quality he had in ordinary, which was, to look fawningly when he plotted, sternly when he executed. Those vices which in other men are Passions, in him were Habits: and his cruelty was not upon occasion, but natural. If at any time he shewed any vertue, it was but pretence; the truth of his minde was only lying and falshood. He was full of courage, and yet not valiant; valour consisting not only in doing, but as well in suffering, which he could not abide. He was politick, and yet not wise; Policy looking but to the Middle, Wisdom to the End: which he did, and did not. And it was not so much Ambition that made him desire the Crown, as Cruelty, that it might be in his power to kill at his pleasure: And to say the truth, he was scarce of the number of men who consist of flesh and bloud, being nothing but bloud. One Miracle we may say he did; which was, that he made the truth of History to exceed the fiction of Poetry, being a greater Harpy than those that were feigned. He would fain have been accounted a good King, but for his life he could not be a good Man; and it is an impossible thing to be one without the other. He left no Issue behind him: and it had been pity he should, at least in his own Image; one such Monster was enough for many Ages.

Of his Death and Burial.

BEING slain in the battell at Bosworth, as before is related; his body was left naked and despoiled to the very skin, not so much as a clout left about him to cover his privy parts: and taken up, was trussed behinde a Pursuivant at Arms, one Blanch Senglyer, or White-bear; his head and arms hanging on one side of the Horse, and his legs on the other; and all besprinkled with mire and dirt, he was brought to the Gray-Fryers Church within the Town of Leicester, and there for some time lay a miserable spectacle; and afterward, with small Funerall-pomp, was there interred. But after this, King Henry the seventh caused a Tomb to be made, and set up over the place where he was buryed, with a picture of Alabaster, representing his person; which at the suppression of that Monastery was utterly defaced: Since when, his grave overgrown with Nettles and Weeds, is not to be found; only the Stone-chelt wherein his Corps lay, is now made a Drinking-trough for Horses, at a common Inne in Leicester, and retaineth the only memory of this Monarchs greatness. But his body (as is reported) was carried out of the City, and contemptuously temptuously bestowed under the end of Bow-bridge, which giveth passage over a branch of Stowe, upon the West side of the Town. Upon this Bridge (the like report runneth) stood a Stone of some height; against which King Richard, as he passed toward Bisworth, by chance strook his Spur: and against the same Stone, as he was brought back, hanging by the Horse side, his head was dashed and broken: as a wife Woman (forsooth) had foretold; who before his going to battel, being asked of his success, said, that where his Spur strook, his head should be broken. But these are but reports. He had lived seven and thirty years, reigned two, and two moneths.

And now to take away a root of danger, before his departure from Leicester, he sent Sir Robert Willoughby to the Cattle of Sheriffhaton in the

In the same Castle also King Richard had left residing the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter to King Edward the fourth: and her now King Henry appoints honourably attended to be brought up to London, and to be delivered to the Queen her Mother. This done, he took his journey towards London; where at his approaching near the City, Thomas Hill the Maior, Thomas Britain and Richard Chester Sheriffs, with other principal Citizens, met him at Shore-ditch, and in great state brought him to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, where he offered three Standards: In the one was the Image of St. George; in the other was a red fiery Dragon, beaten upon white and green Sarcenet; in the third was painted a dun Cow, upon yellow Tartern. After Prayers said, he departed to the Bishops Palace, and there sojourned a season: And in the time of his stay here, he advised with his Council and appointed a day for solemnizing his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth: before which time notwithstanding, he went by water to Westminster, and was there with great solemnity Anointed and Crowned King of England, by the whole consent as well of the Commons as of the Nobility, by the name of Henry the Seventh, on the thirtieth day of October, in the year 1485. and this was his second Title. And even this was revealed to Cadwalader last King of the Britains, seven hundred ninety and seven years past; That his Off-spring should reign and bear Dominion in this Realm again.

Edward Plantagenet, Son and Heir of George Duke of Clarence, shut up in the Tower.

The Earl of Richmond is Crowned King.

On the seventeenth day of November following, he called his high Court of Parliament; where, at the first sitting, two scruples appeared: One concerning the Burgesses; for that many had been returned Burgesses and Knights of Shires, who by a Parliament in King Richard's time, stood attainted still: and it was thought incongruous, for men to make Laws, who were themselves out-lawed: For remedy whereof an Act was presently passed for their restoring; and then they were admitted to sit in the House. The other concerning the King himself, who had been attainted by King Richard: but for this, it was resolved by all the Judges in the Chequer Chamber, that the possession of the Crown takes away all defects; yet for Honours sake, all Records of his Attainder were taken off the File. And so these scruples thus removed, the Parliament began; wherein were Attainted, first Richard late Duke of Glocester, calling himself Richard the

Dukes and Earls created.

And now King Henry considering that Pena & Premio Respublica contingitur ; after punishing for Offences, he proceeds to rewarding for Service : and first, Jasper Earl of Pembroke his Uncle, he created Duke of Bedford : Thomas Lord Stanley he created Earl of Darby : the Lord Chandon of Britain, his special friend, he made Earl of Bathe : Sir Giles Daubeny was made Lord Daubeny : Sir Robert Willoughby was made Lord Brook : and Edward Stafford eldest Son to Henry late Duke of Buckingham, he restored to his Dignity and Possessions. Besides, in this Parliament an Act was made, for setting the Crown upon the person of King Henry and the Heirs of his body successively for ever. And then with all speed he sent and redeemed the Marquess Dorset, and Sir John Bourchier, whom he had left Hostages in France for money : and called home Morton Bishop of Ely, and Richard Fox ; making Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fox Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, and Bishop of Winchester. Besides these, he made also of his Privy Council, Jasper Duke of Bedford, John Earl of Oxford, Thomas Stanley Earl of Darby, John Bishop of Ely, Sir William Stanley, Lord Chamberlain of his Household ; Sir Robert Willoughby Lord Brook, Lord Steward of his Household ; Giles Lord Daubeny ; John Lord Dynham, after made Lord Treasurer of England ; Sir Reginald Bray, Sir John Cheyney, Sir Richard Guilford, Sir Richard Tussell, Sir Richard Edgcombe, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Edmund Poyning, Sir John Rifeley, with some other.

King Henry marries the Lady Elizabeth.

These things thus done, as well in performance of his Oath, as to make his Crown sit the surer on his head ; on the eighteenth day of January, he proceeded to the solemnizing his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth ; which gave him a third Title. And indeed this conjunction made a wreath of three so indissoluble, that no age since hath ever questioned it : and it is fixt upon a Tree planted so happily by the waters side, and hath at this day so many flourishing branches, that there is good hope it will continue as long as the World continues.

The Kings Guard first ordained.

And now whether King Henry doubted any sudden attempt upon his person, or whether he did it to follow the example of France ; in the very beginning of his Reign, he ordained a band of tall personable men to be attending upon him, which was called the Kings guard ; which no King before, and all Kings since, have alwaies used. But though he provided a guard for defence of his own body, yet for the bodies of his people he could provide none ; for at this time a sickness (of the symptome called the sweating sickness) seized so violently upon them, that within a short time many thousands perished ; particularly in London, two Maiors successively, and six Aldermen within eight daies died : and for this sickness no Physick afforded any cure ; till at last, this remedy was found : If a man were taken with the sweat in the day time, that then he should presently lie down in his cloaths, and so lie still the whole four and twenty hours ; if he were taken in the night, then he should not rise out of his bed, for the space of four and twenty hours ; not provoking sweat, nor yet eating or drinking at all, at least but very moderately. In this sickness there was one good circumstance ; that though it were violent, yet it lasted not long : for beginning about the one and twentieth of September, it cleared up before the end of October following.

The Lord Lovell raises an Army against the King, but upon Proclamation of Pardon is dispersed.

And now all things being set in good order in the South parts, there ariseth a little storm in the North, but was soon dispersed. For King Henry making a journey into the North parts, to shew himself there where he had not yet been ; and where the respect to King Richard might have left some opposites : at his coming to Lincoln, was certified that the Lord Lovell and Humphrey Stafford were gone out of Sanctuary in Colchester ; but whether, no man knew. The King therefore not much regarding it, went forward to York ; and being come thither, it was then plainly told him, that the Lord Lovell with a strong power was at hand, and would presently invade the City. This made the King in a great straight ; for neither had he any Army ready ; nor if he had men, had he any Weapons or Munition for them. Yet in this straight, he commanded the Duke of Bedford, with three thousand men to set out against him, but so ill armed, that their Armour for the most part were but of tanned Leather ; who being come near the Camp of the Rebels, caused Proclamation to be made, that whosoever would submit themselves as loyal Subjects, should have their Pardons, and be received into grace : which Proclamation so prevailed, that it made the Lord Lovell secretly in the night to flee away ; and then the Army left without a head, submitted themselves to the Kings mercy. The Lord Lovell fled into Lancashire ; and there for a time lurked with Sir Thomas Bronghton, a man powerful in those parts. Humphrey Stafford took Sanctuary in a Village called Cuiham two miles from Abington : but the Sanctuary being judged by the Justices of the Kings Bench, to be no lawful defence for Traytors ; he was taken from

A Sanctuary no defence for Traytors.

A from thence by force, and conveyed to the Tower, afterward to Tyburn, and there hanged. His Brother Thomas was pardoned, because it was thought, he was drawn in by his Brother Humphrey.

In this year, John Perseval the Maior of London's Carver, waiting at his Table, was chosen one of the Sheriffs of London, only by Sir John Collets, then Maior, drinking to him in a cup of Wine, (as the custom is, to drink to him whom he list to name Sheriffe) and forthwith the said Perseval late down at the Maiors Table, and covered his head, and was afterward Maior himself.

At this time a mean instrument attempted a great work ; by which we may see, how far imagination may out-go reason : One Richard Simond a Priest, a man of base birth, though some learning ; had a Scholar of baser birth, the Son of a Shoemaker (some say a Baker) named Lambert B Symmel ; but of a pregnant wit, and comely personage : Him he gives out to be Edward Earl of Warwick, lately (as was said) escaped out of prison ; both of them being of like years and stature : with this Scholar of his, he falls into Ireland, and so sets forth the matter, that not only the Lord Thomas Fitz-Gerard Earl of Kildare, and Deputy of Ireland ; but many other of the Nobility gave credit to his words ; and as those that affected the House of York, were ready to take his part ; and even already saluted the young Symmel King. Withal they sent into Flanders to the Lady Margaret, Sister to the late King Edward, and Widow of Charles Duke of Burgoyne, requiring aid and assistance from her. This Lady being of the House of York, bore an inward grudge against King Henry, being of the House of Lancaster ; and therefore though the well understood it was but a coloured matter, yet was willing to take advantage of it : and thereupon promised her assistance.

C King Henry being advertized of these things, advised with his Council ; by whom it was agreed, that two things presently should be done. First, to grant a Pardon to any that would submit themselves, for any offence whatsoever, though it were for High Treason ; the next, that the Earl of Warwick should be openly shewed abroad in the City, and other publick places ; whereby, the report spread abroad of his being in Ireland, might appear plainly to be false. Withal, the Queen Elizabeth, Widow of King Edward the fourth, and Mother to the present Queen, was adjudged to forfeit all her Lands and Possessions, and to live confined in the Abbey of Bermondsey in Southwark ; where in great penitiveness within a few years she dyed. But for what cause this severity was used against this Queen, is not altogether certain : To say, (as was commonly said) that it was for rendering her self and her Daughters into the hands of King Richard, were manifest injustice, to punish her for doing a thing out of fear, which else she should have been compelled to do by force : and to say (as some also have said) that it was for giving aid, under hand to Perkin, were a manifest unlikelihood, that she should aid a Counterfeit against her own Son in law : we must therefore content our selves with knowing the bare colourable pretext, and leave the true reason as a secret of State. But this shewing abroad of the true Earl of Warwick, though it satisfied some, yet not all : for some gave out that it was but a trick of the King, and not the true Warwick. At least the Earl of Lincoln, Son to John de la Poole Duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth Sister to King Edward the fourth, would not omit to take the advantage, though he knew that Symmel was but a Counterfeit. And thereupon, as soon as the Parliament was dissolved, he fled secretly into Flanders, to his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutchess of Burgoyne ; between whom it was concluded, that he and the Lord Lovell should go into Ireland ; and there attend upon the Counterfeit Warwick, and honour him as a King ; and with the power of the Irish men bring him into England : but it was concluded without, that if their actions succeeded, then the Counterfeit Warwick should be deposed, and the true be delivered out of Prison, and anointed King. And to this purpose, the Earl of Lincoln, by the aid of the Lady Margaret, had gotten together two thousand Almains, with one Martin Swart a valiant and expert Captain : to be their Leader. With this power, the Earl sailed into Ireland, and at the City of Dublin, caused young Lambert the Counterfeit Warwick, in most solemn manner, first to be Proclaimed, and after to be Crowned King of England : and then with a great number of haggardly and armed Irish men, under the conduct of the Lord Thomas Gerardine Earl of Kildare, they sailed into England ; and landed at a place called the Pile of Fowdrey, not far from Lancaster ; hoping thereby by the means of Sir Thomas Bronghton, a powerful man in that Country, to have their Army both furnished and increased. King Henry hearing that the Earl of Lincoln was landed at Lancaster, assembled a great Army, conducted by the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford ; and with these he marched to Nottingham, and there by a little Wood called Bowser, he pitched his field ; whither there came unto him, the Lord George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lord Strange, Sir John Cheyney, and divers other Knights and Gentlemen. In which mean time the Earl of Lincoln being entred into Yorkshire, passed quietly on his journey, without doing spoyl or hurt unto any ; trusting thereby to have won the people to come to his aid ; but when he perceived few or none to resort unto him, he then determined to venture a battel with the Army he had already ; and thereupon took his way from York to Newark upon Trent. King Henry understanding which way he took, came the night before the battel to Newark ; and going three miles further, near to a Village called Stoke, there waited the approach of the Earl of Lincoln ; so the next day they joyned battel ; where after a long fight, of at the least three hours ; though the Almains, and specially their Captain Martin Swart behaved themselves most valiantly ; yet their Irish, being in a manner but naked men, were at last overthrowen, four thousand slain, and the rest put to flight ; but not one of their Captains ; for the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Lovell, Sir Thomas Bronghton, Martin Swart, and the Lord Gerardine were all found dead in the very place where they had flood fighting, that though they lost the battel, yet they won the reputation of hardy and stout Souldiers. Only of the Lord Lovell, some report, that attempting to save himself by flight, in passing over the River of Trent, was drowned. On the Kings part, though some were slain, yet not any man of note. This battel was fought on a Saturday (observed as always fortunate to King Henry) being the sixteenth of June, in the second year of King Henries Reign. The young Lambert, and his Master Simond the Priest, were both taken; and both had their lives saved; Lambert, because but a Child; Simond, because a Priest; yet Simond was kept in Prison, Lambert was taken into the Kings Kitchen, to turn the Spit in the turn of his fortune, and at last made one of the Kings Faulkners.

In the beginning of his third year, King Henry having been in Yorkshire, to settle the mindes of that people, about the midst of August came to New-castle upon Tyne, and from thence sent Ambassadors into Scotland, Richard Fox lately before made Bishop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgcombe Controller of his Houfe, to conclude a Peace or Truce with James King of Scots: A Peace, by reason of the peoples backwardness, could not be obtained: but a Truce was concluded for the term of seven years; with a promise from the King, that it should be renewed before the first seven years should be expired.

At this time, Ambassadors came from the King of France, to King Henry; who declared, that their Master King Charles was now at war with Francis Duke of Brittain, for that he succoured the Duke of Orleans and others Rebels against the Realm of France; and therefore requested, that for the old familiarity that had been between them, he would either assist him, or not assist the Duke, but stand Neuter. King Henry answered, that having received courtesies from them both, he would do his uttermost endeavour to make them friends: and to that end, as soon as the French Ambassadors were departed, he sent Christopher Twisick his Chaplain over into France, who should first go to the French King, and after to the Duke of Brittain, to mediate a Peace between them.

In the time of Twisicks Ambassage, King Henry caused his Wife the Lady Elizabeth to be Crowned Queen, on Saint Katherine's day in November, with all solemnity; and at the same time delivered the Lord Thomas Marquess Dorset out of the Tower, and received him again into his former favour.

Twisick travailed between the two Princes to procure Peace; but they, though making a shew to incline to Peace, yet prepared for War, and offers on neither side would be accepted. In which time, Edward Lord Woodville Uncle to the Queen, made suit to the King, for leave to go over with a power of men, in aid to the Duke of Brittain; which suit though the King denied, yet the Lord Woodville would venture it; and with a power of four hundred able men, got secretly over, and joyned with the Britains against the French. This the French King took ill at King Henries hand; but being informed, that it was against the Kings will, he seemed satisfied; and a Peace was concluded between France and England, to endure for twelve moneths. But in conclusion, King Henry finding that the French King dealt not really with him, but only held him on with pretences; he called his high Court of Parliament, requiring their advice what was fit to be done: where it was concluded, that the Duke of Brittain should be aided; and to that end great sums of money were by Parliament granted: This determination of the Parliament, King Henry signifies to the French King, hoping, it would have wrought him to some terms of Peace. But the King of France little regarding it, proceeded on in his violent courtes against the Britains; so as at last, on the eight and twentieth day of July, the Britains gave battel to the French, neer to a Town called St. Aubyn; having apparelled seventeen hundred of the Britains in Coats with red Crosses after the English fashion, to make the French men believe they were all English, although indeed they had no more English then the four hundred of the Lord Woodvilles. But notwithstanding this device, the Victory fell to the French; so that all the English men almost were slain; with the Lord Woodville himself; besides six thousand Britains. The Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange, who were on the Britains part, were taken Prisoners. The French lost twelve hundred men; and amongst other, that valiant Italian Captain James Galesot.

This news being brought into England, caused King Henry to make haste to send forth his Army; and thereupon, the Lord Brooke, with Sir John Cheyny, Sir John Middleton, Sir Ralph Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Eaton, and Sir Edmund Cornwall, are sent over with all speed into Brittain; having with them eight thousand men, to aid the Duke of Brittain against the French. But while this War was thus set forward, the Duke of Brittain dyed; leaving in effect, one only Daughter, the Lady Anne (for the other being the younger, died soon after) and then the chief Rulers of Brittain falling at dissention amongst themselves, little regarded the defence of the Country: whereupon the English returned home, within five moneths after their setting forth: and the French King getting the upper hand of the Britains, and marrying the Lady Anne sole Daughter of the Duke of Brittain, incorporated that Duchy to the Crown of France.

In the last Parliament, a Subsidy was granted, for the furnishing out an Army into Brittain; and it was agreed, that every man should be taxed after the rate of his substance; to pay the tenth penny of his goods: which Tax the most part of Yorkshire and the Bishoprick of Durham refused to pay: whereof the Collectors complained to Henry Earl of Northumberland, President of the North parts: The Earl signifies it to the King; and the King commands him to levy the same, by distress or otherwise (without sparing of any) as he should think most meet. The rude mul-

A multitude, hearing of this Command from the King, with great violence set upon the Earl, by the exciting of a simple fellow named John a Chamber; and alledging all the fault to be in the Earl, as chief author of the Tax; they cruelly murdered both him and divers of his household servants. And to make good their seditious fact, they assembled a great number, and made one Sir John Egremond their Captain: Declaring, that in defence of their liberties, they would bid the King battel. In this bravery they stood, as long as none opposed them: but when Thomas Earl of Surrey appeared with an Army, though they skirmished a while, yet they were soon discomfited, and their Ring-leader John a Chamber was taken, and at York on a Gibbet set upon a square pair of Gallows, like an Arch-traytor was hanged, and many of his Complices on a lower Gallows; the innocent people for the most part pardoned. But Sir John Egremond fled into Flanders, to the Lady Margaret Dutcheff of Burgundy; the common and sure refuge for all Rebels against King Henry. After this, the King appointed Sir Richard Tunstall to gather the Subsidy, and would not spare the payment of a penny. This year, notwithstanding this Tax, the King borrowed of every Alderman of London two hundred pounds, and of the Chamber nine thousand eighty two pounds seventeen shillings and four pence, which was paid again at the time with great thankfulness; which he did at a time he needed not, to the end perhaps he might do it another time, when he needed.

At this time, James the third, King of Scotland, having by some errors of Government incurred the hatred of his Nobility and people; laboured with King Henry, as also with the Pope, and the King of France, to make an Accord between him and his people, who had compelled Prince James his Son, to be the Titular head of those Arms which they assumed against him. The Kings accordingly interposed their mediations by Ambassadors; but could receive no other but this outrageous answer, That there was no talking of Peace, unless he would resign his Crown. Which answer the Kings protested against, declaring by their Ambassadors, that they thought it a common injury to themselves, and that the Example was not sufferable, for Subjects to lift their hands against their Sovereign. Hereupon it came to a Battel, at Bannocks-burn by Strivelin; where King James, rashly beginning the fight, before his whole Forces were come, was (notwithstanding the contrary commandment of the Prince his Son) slain in the Mill of that field, whither he fled, after the Battel ended.

About this time, a Difference fell out which grew to a War, between the Emperour Frederick, and some Towns of his in Flanders, especially Gaunt and Bruges: In this war, the Lord Ravenstein a principal person about Maximilian, not only forsook the Emperour and his Son Maximilian his Lord, (corrupted as was thought from France) but made himself head of the popular party, seizing upon the Towns of Ipre and Sluce; and not this only, but forthwith sent to the Lord de Cordes Governour for the French King in Picardie, to aid him against some Towns in Flanders: To which the Lord de Cordes, willing of any occasion to set foot in Flanders, was easily drawn. But King Henry not liking to have the French to near his English pale, sent over the Lord Morley with a thousand men, who should joyn with the Lord Dawbeny then Deputy of Callice, to resist them. Amongst other Acts by them performed, this was chief; That the Lord Dawbeny, with the Lord Morley, Sir James Tyrrell Captain of Gasfines, Sir Henry Willoughby, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and Sir Humphrey Talbot Marshal of Callice, and others to the number of two thousand, issued secretly one night out of Callice, and came to Newport, and from thence to Dixmme; where the Lord Dawbeny commanded all men to send back their Horses: which the Lord Morley only refusing to do, was cause that he only of all the Captains was slain with a Gun: for the rest, after their arrows discharged, fell prostrate to the ground; by which means the Enemies Ordinance overshot the number of eight thousand; of the English part was slain the Lord Morley, and not above a hundred more. This victory so enriched the English, that they who went forth in cloth, came home in silk; and they who went out on foot returned back on Horse-back. Upon this defeat, the Lord de Cordes lying at Ipre with twenty thousand, and thinking to be revenged, besieged the Town of Newport; and so strongly assaulted it, that one day his men entered, and set up his Banner upon a Tower of the Town: when suddenly a Bark arriving with only fourscore fresh English Archers, so terrified them, thinking their number to be far greater, that the French were glad to leave their Banner behind them, and give over the assault; and the night following, the Lord de Cordes (who so much longed for Callice, that he would commonly say, he would be content to lie seven years in Hell, so that Callice were in the possession of the French) brake up his siege, and returned to Holding with as much shame, as the English to Callice with honour.

A little before this time, Francis Duke of Brittain dying, left only one Daughter, the Lady Anne, affianced to Maximilian King of the Romans; and in so solemn a manner, that she taking upon her to be the Bride, and being laid in her bed, was contented to permit Maximilian's Deputy, in presence of many Noble witnesses, as well men as women, to put his leg stript naked to the knee, between the spousal sheets; accounting that Ceremony to amount to the Consummation. The King of France likewise had been contracted to the Lady Margaret Daughter to the forefard Maximilian, and had received her to that end: Yet all this notwithstanding, out of a violent desire to joyn the Duchy of Brittain to the Crown of France, he dissannulled and made void both the Contracts: But to the end he might do it without opposition of the King of England, he sent Ambassadors, the Lord Francis of Lutsemburg, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gaguine, to King Henry; partly to conclude a Peace, but chiefly to procure King Henry's

Danby was made Lord Chamberlain. This was that Sir William Stanley, who came in to rescue the Earl of Richmond, when he was in danger of his life, who set the Crown upon his head, and was the cause of his being saluted King: And could it enter into his breast, to put him to death, that had saved his life, and done him so many great services besides? But it may be said, it was not the Earl of Richmond that did it, but the King of England; for certainly, in many cases, a King is not at liberty to shew mercy, so much as a private man may. Though there be that affirm, the cause of his death was not words only, but real acts, as giving aid to Perkin underhand by money. And it seems there was some conflict in the mind of King Henry, what he should do in this case; for he stayed six weeks after his Accusation, before he brought him to his Arraignment. However it was, the Summer following, the King went in Progress to Leamham, to the Earl of Dorset, who had married his Mother, and was Brother to Sir William Stanley: perhaps to congratulate his own safety; perhaps to condole with him his Brothers death; but certainly to keep the Earl from conceiving any sinister opinion of him: For to think that Sir William's suing to be Earl of Chester, (an Honour appointed to the Kings Son) or his great wealth, (for he left in his Castle at Holt, in ready money forty thousand Marks, besides Plate and Jewels) were causes that procured or set forward his death; are considerations very unworthy of so just a Prince, against a servant of so great deserving.

A hundred and sixty of Perkin's followers executed.

Perkin received by the King of Scots, marries the Earl of Huntly's daughter. The King of Scots in Perkin's quarrel, enters and spoils Northumberland.

A Commotion in Cornwall by the Instigation of Thomas Flambeck, a Lawyer, and Michael Joseph a Smith.

The Lord Audley confederate with the Rebels.

The Rebels are overthrown.

But in this mean while, Perkin having gotten a Power of idle loose fellows, took to Sea, intending to land in Kent; where though he were repelled, yet some of his Soldiers would needs venture to go on Land, of whom a hundred and sixty persons were taken Prisoners, whereof five were Captains; Mortford, Corbet, Whitebolt, Quintyn, and Gemyne: The hundred and sixty persons were brought to London, rayled in Ropes, like Horses drawing in a Cart, who upon the Arraignment, confessing their offence, were executed, some at London, and some in Towns adjoining to the Sea-coast. Perkin finding no entertainment in Kent, sayled into Ireland, and having stayed there a while, and finding them also, to be no competent assistants for him, from thence he sayled into Scotland, where he so moved the King of Scots with his fair words and colourable pretences (made no doubt before by the Dutches of Burgoyne) that he received him in great state, and caused him to be called the Duke of York: and to persuade the World that he thought him so indeed, he gave him in marriage the Lady Katherine Gordon, Daughter to Alexander Earl Huntley, his own near kinswoman; and soon after, in Perkin's quarrel, entered with a puissant Army into England; making Proclamation, that whosoever would come in and aid the true Duke of York, should be spared; but none coming in, he then used all kind of cruelty, and the whole County of Northumberland was in a manner wasted: whereat Perkin at his return, expressed much grief, saying, It grieved him to the heart, to see such havoc made of his people: To whom the King answered, Alas, alas, you take care for them, who for any thing that appears are none of yours; for not one of the Countrey came in to his succour. King Henry incensed with this bold attempt of the King of Scots, called his High Court of Parliament, acquainting them with the necessity he had of a present war to revenge his indignity offered him by the Scots, and thereupon requiring their aid by money, had a Subsidy of six score thousand pounds readily granted him; and then in all haste a puissant Army is provided, and under the conduct of the Lord Danby sent into Scotland; but before he arrived there, he was suddenly called back by reason of a commotion begun at Cornwall, for payment of the Subsidy lately granted, which though it were not great, yet they grudged to pay it. The Ring-leaders of this Commotion were, Thomas Flambeck a Gentleman learned in the Laws, and Michael Joseph a Smith; who laying the blame of this exaction upon John Morton Archbishop of Canterbury, and Sir Reynold Bray, as being chief of the Kings Council, exhorted the people to take up Arms, and having assembled an Army, they went to Taunton, where they slew the Provost Peryn, one of the Commissioners for the Subsidy, and from thence came to Wells intending to go to London, where the King then lay, who having revoked the Lord Danby, appointed Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey after the death of the Lord Dinham, made Lord Treasurer of England to have an eye to the Scots, and if they made invasion, to resist them. In the mean time James Twichel Lord Audley confederated himself with the Rebels of Cornwall, and took upon him to be their Leader, who from Wells went to Salisbury, and from thence to Winchester, and so to Kent, hoping there to have had great aid, but found none; for the Earl of Kent, the Lord Aubergain, John Brook, Lord Cobham, Sir Edmund Poyning, Sir Richard Guilford, Sir Thomas Bourchier, John Peachy, and William Scot, were ready in Arms to resist them; whereupon the Rebels brought their Army to Blackheath, four miles distant from London, and there in a plain on the top of a hill encamped themselves; whereof when the King had knowledge, he presently sent John Earl of Oxford, Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, Edmund de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, Sir Rice ap Thomas and Sir Humfrey Bowcher to environ the hill on all sides, that so all hope of flight might be taken from them; and then set forward himself, and encamped in S. George's fields; where for encouragement he made divers Bannerets. The next day he sent the Lord Danby to set upon the Rebels early in the morning, who first got the Bridge at Debitford Strand, though strongly defended by the Rebels Archers, whose Arrows were reported to be full Cloth-yard in length; but notwithstanding the Lord Danby coming in with his company, and the Earls assailing them on every side, they were soon overcome: In which conflict were slain of the Rebels above two thousand; taken prisoners a very great number, many of whom the King pardoned, but of the chief Authors none; for the Lord Audley was drawn from Newgate to Tower-hill, in a Coat of his own Arms painted upon upon paper, reversed and all torn; and there, on the four and twentieth day of June was beheaded. Thomas Flambeck and Michael Joseph were hanged, drawn and quartered, and their heads and quarters pitched upon stakes, set up in London and others places. Of the Kings Army were slain not above three hundred. It is memorable, with what comfort Joseph the Black-smith cheered up himself at his going to execution, saying, That yet he hoped by this that his name and memory should be everlasting: so dear even to vulgar spirits is perpetuity of Name, though joyed with infamy; what is it then to Noble spirits, when it is joyed with Glory?

In the mean time the King of Scots taking advantage of these troubles in England, invaded the Frontiers, foraged the Bishoprick of Durham, and at last besieged the Castle of Norham, whereof Richard Fox then Bishop of Durham was owner; who thereupon sent presently to the Earl of Surrey, acquainting him with this Invasion: Whereupon the Earl, taking with him Ralph Earl of Westmerland, Thomas Lord Barnes, Ralph Lord Nevil, George Lord Strange, and many other Lords and Knights, and an Army of little less than twenty thousand men; besides a Navy, whereof the Lord Brook was Admiral, set forward against the Scots, and not only forced the Scots to raise their siege of Norham Castle, but followed them also into Scotland, where he overthrew and defeated the Castle at Camelfrains, the Tower of Heten-hall, the Tower of Edington, the Tower of Fulden, and at last by composition took the strong Castle of Hayton, and raised it to the ground. At the Earls being at Hayton, the King of Scots sent to him Marchmont and another Herald, requiring him at his election, either to fight with him with their whole Armies, or else they two to fight in single combat; upon condition, that if the victory fell to the Scottish King, the Earl should deliver for his Ransome the Town of Barwick: Whereunto the Earl made answer, that the Town of Barwick was the King his Masters, and therefore not for him to dispose of; but for his offer of single combat, he willingly accepted it, and thought himself highly honoured by such a match: But King James of Scotland had no meaning to perform either one or other, but privily in the night fled back into Scotland; and then the Earl returned to Barwick. In the mean time, one Peter Hyalae, a man of great learning and policy, was sent Ambassador to the King of Scots, from the King of Spain, to mediate a Peace between the two Kings of England and Scotland; who finding the King of Scots conformable to his motion, found after the King of England (who was never averse from Peace upon honourable Conditions) no less inclining to it: and so a Truce was concluded for certain years; upon condition, that Perkin Warbeck should be sent out of the Scottish Dominions.

About this time, the Lord Camphyre and others sent from Philip Archduke of Austria and Duke of Burgundy, came to King Henry for a conclusion of Amity, and to procure the English Merchants resort again to his Countrey, for King Henry sometime before, upon displeasure with the Flemings, but specially with the Lady Margaret, for abetting Perkin Warbeck, not only had banished all Flemish wares and Merchandizes out of his Dominions, but had also retrained all English Merchants from having any Traffick in any of their Territories, causing the Mart for all English Commodities to be kept at Callice: but now, upon this invitation, and having found it had been a great hinderance to his own Merchant-adventurers, and thereupon some insurrections had risen, he willingly condiscended to their Request, and so the English resorted again to the Archdukes Dominions, and were received into Antwerp with general Procession; so glad was that Town of the English mens returns.

In his eleventh year of the Kings Reign, dyed Cicely Dutches of York; Mother to King Edward the fourth, at her Castle of Berkhamstead, being of extreme age; who had lived to see three Princes of her body Crowned, and four Murdered: she was buried at Fotheringham by her Husband.

Shortly after the Truce concluded between England and Scotland, Perkin Warbeck was commanded to depart out of the Scottish Dominions: who thereupon with his Wife and Family sailed into Ireland: where understanding that the Cornish men were ready to renew the war again, he thought best not to let pass so fair an occasion; and thereupon, having with him four small Ships, and not above sixscore men, he sailed into Cornwall, and there landed in the month of September, and came to a Town called Bodmin; where with fair words and large promises, he so prevailed with the people, that he had gotten to him above three thousand persons to take his part; and then made Proclamations in the name of King Richard the fourth, as Son to King Edward the fourth: and by the advice of his three Counsellors, John Heron a bankrupt Mercer, Richard Skelton a Tailour, and John Astley a Scrivener, determined to attempt first the winning of Exeter; which with great violence he assaulted, and the Townsmen with as great valiantness defended: whereof when the King heard, he sent the Lord Danby to their rescue: but before he came, the Lord Edward Courtney Earl of Devonshire, and the valiant Lord Williams his Son, accompanied with Sir Edmund Carew, Sir Thomas Trenohard, Sir William Courtney, Sir Thomas Falsford, Sir John Haleswell, Sir John Crier, Walter Courtney, Peter Edgecombe, William St. Maure with others came to their aid: upon whose coming, Perkin left the siege, and retired to Taunton; where he mustered his men, as though he meant to prepare for battle: but finding his number to be much diminished (for of six thousand which he had at Exeter, many were fled from him, when they saw no great ones to take his part) he began to distrust his cause; and hearing withall, that the King with a great Power was at hand, about midnight with three score Horsemen in his company, he departed in post from Taunton, and took Sanctuary in a Town called Beaulieu near to Southampton. When King Henry heard that Perkin was fled; he sent after him to the Sea-side, to stop stop his passage and apprehend him: But the Messengers that were sent, when they came to St. Michaels Mount, though they found not Perkin, yet there they found his wife the Lady Katherine Gordon, whom they presently brought to the King; a beautiful young Lady: to whom, in honor of her birth, and commiseration of her beauty, the King allowed a competent maintenance, which she enjoyed during the Kings life, and many years after. King Henry being come to Exeter, stayed there a few days, about examination of the Rebellion, and execution of the chief Offenders: of whom there being a great multitude, and all of them craving pardon, the King caused them all to be assembled in the Church-yard of St. Peter, where they all appeared bare-headed in their shirts, and halters about their necks: whom the King viewing out of a window made for the purpose; after he had paused awhile, made a speech unto them, exhorting them to obedience; and then, in hope they would afterward be dutiful Subjects he pardoneth them all: whereat they made a great shout, crying all, God save King Henry! though some of them afterward, like ungrateful wretches, fell into new Rebellions.

All this while Perkin was in Sanctuary: and the King thinking himself in danger as long as he was in safety, set a guard about the place, to keep him from escaping; whereby Perkin was restrained, that at last he submitted himself to the Kings mercy, and was thereupon sent to the Tower, to be there in safe custody. This done, King Henry appointed Thomas Lord Darcy, Sir Amyas Pawlet, and Robert Sherborn Dean of Pauls, to be Commissioners for making inquiry of the Offenders, and for assailing their Fines; which they did with great severity to some, with great mildness to others, to all with equity.

It was now the fourteenth year of the Kings Reign, when one Sebastian Gabato, a Genoveses Son, born at Bristow, periwaded the King to man and victual a Ship at Bristow, to search for an Island, which (he said) he knew to be replenished with rich Commodities, who setting forth with three other small Ships of London Merchants, returned home two years after, when he had made a large discovery Westward, and would have gone to Cataia, if the Mariners had not forced him to return: as likewise six years before, one Christopher Columbus a Spaniard, made the first discovery of America.

Perkin being in the Tower and carefully guarded, yet found means to escape; and fled to the Priory of Sheen near Richmond; where discovering himself to the Prior of that Monastery, he begged of him for Gods sake, to get the Kings Pardon for his life; which the Prior effected: but then was Perkin brought to the Court at Westminster, and was one day set fettered in a pair of Stocks before Westminster-Hall, and there stood a whole day; the next day he was set upon a like Scaffold in Cheapside, and there standing the whole day also, he then read openly his confession, written with his own hand; wherein he declared his Parentage, and the place of his Birth, and all the passages of his Life, and by what means he was drawn to make this attempt. After this, he was committed again to the Tower, and care taken he should be better looked to than he was before. But all the care notwithstanding once again Perkin attempted to escape, and drawing into a Confederacy with him the young Earl of Warwick; by fair words and large promises corrupted his Keepers, Strangwith, Blewet, Afwood, and long Roger, Servants to Sir John Digby Lieutenant of the Tower, that they intended to have slain their Master, and set Perkin and the Earl of Warwick at liberty. But this practice was soon discovered, so that Perkin and John a Water, sometime Mayor of Cork in Ireland, one of Perkins chief founders, were on the sixteenth day of November arraigned at Westminster and condemned, and both of them on the two and twentieth day were drawn to Tyburn and there hanged; where Perkin took it upon his death, that the Confession he had formerly made, was true: soon after also Blewet and Afwood, two of the Lieutenant men, were in the same place executed. On the one and twentieth day of the same month, Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick was arraigned at Westminster before the Earl of Oxford, then High Steward of England; not for consenting to break Prison, but for conspiring with Perkin to raise Sedition, and destroy the King; and upon his Confession, had Judgement, and on the eight and twentieth day of the same month, in the year 1499, was brought to the Scaffold on the Tower-hill, and there beheaded. This Earl of Warwick was the eldest Son of the Duke of Clarence, and was the last Heir-male of the name of Plantagenet, and had been kept in the Tower from his very Infancy out of all company of Men and sight of Beasts; so as he scarcely knew a Hen from a Goose, nor one Beast from another; and therefore could never know how to practise his escape of himself, but by Perkins subtilty: for which cause the King favoured him so far; that he was not buried in the Tower, but at Bissum by his Ancestors. And thus ended the designs of Perkin Warbeck, which had troubled both the Kingdom and the King, the space of seven or eight years, a great part of the Kings Reign.

But in the time of Perkins being in the Tower, another like practice was set on foot: for an Augustine Fryer called Patrick, in the County of Suffolk; having a Scholar named Ralph Wilford a Cordwayners Son, he caused him to take upon him to be the Earl of Warwick, lately by great chance gotten out of the Tower; and they going together into Kent, when the Frier perceived some light credit to be given to him, he then stuck not to declare it openly in the Pulpit, desiring all men to assist him. But this practice was soon discovered, and both the Master and the Scholar were apprehended and attained; the Scholar Wilford was hanged on Shrovetides day at S. Thomas Waterings, and the Frier was condemned to perpetual Penitence: for at that time so much reverence was attributed to Holy Orders, that a Priest though he had committed Treason against the King, yet had his life spared: And this practice was some cause to exasperate the King against the Earl Another practice to set up one Ralph Wilford, to be the Earl of Warwick.

But the practice discovered, and Wilford hanged.

A Earl of Warwick, who though innocent in himself, yet was nocent in pretenders: and besides, King Ferdinand of Spain, with whom at this time there was a Treaty for marriage of his Daughter to Prince Arthur, had written to the King in plain terms, that he saw no assurance of his Sons succession, as long as the Earl of Warwick lived: and thus all things unfortunately concurred to bring this innocent Prince to his end.

In the fifteenth year of his Reign, partly to avoid the danger of the Plague, then reigning in England; but chiefly to confer with the Duke of Burgoyne about many important businesses: the King and Queen sayled over to Callice; where at an interview between him and the Duke, at Saint Peters Church without Callice, the Duke offered to hold the Kings Stirrup at his alighting, which the King by no means would permit; but descending from Horse-back, they embraced with great affection: and after Communication had between them, the King and Queen in the end of June returned into England.

In his seventeenth year, two great Marriages were solemnized: the Lady Katherine of Spain was sent by her Father King Ferdinand, with a puissant Army of Ships into England, where she arrived at Plimouth, the second day of October; & on the fourteenth of November after, she espoused openly to Prince Arthur, both being clad in white; he of the age of fifteen years, she of eighteen: at night they were laid together in one Bed, where they lay as Man and Wife all that night: when morning appeared, the Prince (as his Servants about him reported) called for drink, which before time he had not used to do; whereof one of his Chamberlains asking him the cause, he answered merrily, saying: I have been this night in the midst of Spain, which is a hot Country, and that makes me so dry: though some write, that a grave Matron was laid in Bed between them, to hinder actual Consummation. The Ladies portion was two hundred thousand Duckats; her joynture; the third part of the principality of Wales, Cornwall, and Chester. At this Marriage was great solemnity and Royal Justings; during which time there came into London an Earl, a Bishop, and divers other Noble personages sent from the King of Scots for a conclusion of Marriage (before treated of) between the Lady Margaret the Kings eldest Daughter, and him; where the Earl by Proxy in the name of King James his Master, affianced and contracted the said Lady, which Contract was published at Pauls Cross, the day of the Conversion of Saint Paul; for joy whereof, Te Deum was sung, and great fires were made through the City of London; and if such joy were made when the match was made, what joy should be made now at the issue of the Match, when by the Union of those persons is made an Union of these Kingdoms; and England and Scotland are but one great Britain? The Ladies portion was ten thousand pounds, her joynture two thousand pounds a year, after King James his death; and in present one thousand. When this Match was first propounded at the Council Table, some Lords opposed it; objecting, that by this means the Crown of England might happen to come to the Scottish Nation. To which King Henry answered, What if it should? It would not be an accession of England to Scotland, but of Scotland to England: and this answer of the King passed for an Oracle: and so the Match proceeded, and in August following was consummated at Edinburgh, conducted thither in great state by the Earl of Northumberland.

Prince Arthur after his marriage, was sent again into Wales, to keep that Country in good order; to whom were appointed for Counsellors, Sir Richard Poole, his kinsman and chief Chamberlain, Sir Henry Vernon, Sir Richard Crofts, Sir David Phillips, Sir William Adall, Sir Thomas Englefeld, Sir Peter Newton, John Willeston, Henry Marton, and Doctor William Smith President of his Council: but within five months after his marriage, at his Cattle at Ludlow he deceased, and with great solemnity was buried at the Cathedral Church at Worcester. His Brother Henry Duke of Tork was staid from the Title of Prince of Wales, the space of half a year; till to women it might appear, whether the Lady Katherine, the Relict of Prince Arthur was with childe, or no. The towardliness in learning of this Prince Arthur is very memorable; who dying before the age of sixteen years, was said to have read over all or mozt of the Latine Authors, besides many other.

And now Prince Arthur being dead, and the Lady Katherine of Spain left a young Widow; King Henry loth to part with her Dowry, but chiefly being delirous to continue the Alliance with Spain: prevailed with his other Son Prince Henry, though with some reluctance, such as could be in those years (for he was scarce twelve years of age) to be contracted with the Princess Katherine his Brothers Widow; for which marriage, a dispensation by advice of the most learned men at that time in Christendome, was by Pope Julius the second granted, and on the five and twentieth day of June, in the Bishop of Salisbury house in Fleet-street, the marriage was solemnized.

A little before this time, Edmund de la Poole Earl of Suffolk, Son to John Duke of Suffolk, and Lady Elizabeth Sister to King Edward the fourth, had in his fury killed a mean person, and was thereupon Indicted of Murder: for which although he had the Kings Pardon, yet because he was brought to the Kings Bench-Bar, and there arraigned, he took it for so great a blemish to his honour, that in great rage he fled into Flanders to his Aunt the Lady Margaret; where having stayed a while, when his passion was over, he returned again. But after the marriage between Prince Arthur and the Lady Katherine, whether it were that in that solemnity he had run himself in debt; or whether he were drawn to do so by the Lady Margaret, he passed over the second time, with his Brother Richard, into Flanders. This put the King into some doubt of his intention; whereupon he hath recourse to his usual course in such cases, and sent Sir Robert Cuyson Captain of Hammes Castle, to feign himself one of that Conspiracy, thereby to learn the depth of

of their intentions : And to take away all suspicion of his employment, the first Sunday of November, he caused the said Earl and Sir Robert Curson with five others, to be accused openly at Pauls Cross, as enemies to him and his Realm. In conclusion, Sir Robert Curson acquainted the King with divers of that faction ; amongst whom, William Lord Courtney, and William de la Poole, brother to the foresaid Earl of Suffolk, who were taken but upon suspicion, yet held long in prison : but Sir James Tyrrel (the same that had murdered the two young Princes in the Tower) and Sir John Windham, who were proved to be Traytors, were accordingly attained, and on the sixth day of May at the Tower-hill beheaded. Whereof when the Earl heard, despairing now of any good success, he wandered about all Germany and France, where finding no success, he submitted himself at last to Philip Duke of Austria, by whom afterward he was delivered to King Henry, by this occasion : Ferdinand King of Aragon, by his Wife Isabella Queen of Castile, had only two Daughters, the eldest whereof named Joan, was married to this Philip Duke of Austria; the younger, named Katharine, to Arthur Prince of England : and now Queen Isabella being lately dead, by whose death the Kingdom of Castile descended in Right of his Wife, to this Duke Philip ; they were layed out of Germany into Spain, to take possession of the Kingdom ; but by tempest and contrary winds were driven upon the coast of England, and landed at Weymouth in Dorsetshire ; where desiring to refresh themselves a little on shore, they were invited by Sir Thomas Trenchard (a principal Knight of that Countrey) to his house, who presently sent word to the King of their arrival. King Henry glad to have his Court honoured by so great a Prince, and perhaps upon hope of a courtesie from him, which afterward he obtained : sent presently the Earl of Arundel to wait upon him, till himself might follow ; and the Earl went to him in great magnificence, with a gallant Troop of three hundred Horse, and for more State came to him by Torch-light. Upon whose Message, though King Philip had many reasons of haste on his journey ; yet not to give King Henry disdain, and withall to give his Queen the comfort of seeing the Lady Katherine her Sister, he went upon speed to the King at Windsor, while his Queen followed by easie journeys. After great magnificence of entertainment, King Henry taking an opportunity, and drawing the King of Castile into a room, where they two only were private, and laying his hand civilly upon his arm, said unto him, Sir, you have been saved upon my Coast : I hope you will not suffer me to wrack upon yours. The King of Castile asking him, what he meant by that speech ? I mean it (saith the King) by that hare-brain'd fellow the Earl of Suffolk, who being my Subject, is protected in your Countrey, and begins to play the fool when all others are weary of it. The King of Castile answered ; I had thought, Sir, your felicity had been above those thoughts ; but if it trouble you, I will banish him. King Henry replied, that his desire was to have him delivered to him : with this, the King of Castile a little confused, said, That can I not do with my Honour : Well then (saith the King) the matter is at an end : at last the King of Castile, who held King Henry in great estimation, compelling his countenance, said, Sir, you shall have him ; but upon your Honour, you shall not take his life : I promise it upon my Honour, said King Henry : and he kept his promise ; for he was not put to death during all his Reign ; but yet he took such order, that in the Reign of his Son King Henry the Eighth, he had his head cut off. During the King of Castiles being here, a Treaty was concluded, and bearing date at Windsor ; which the Flemings term Intercursum malus, for that the Free fishing of the Dutch upon the Coasts and Seas of England, granted in the Treaty of Undecimo, was not by his Treaty confirmed, as all other Articles were. And now, when King Henry had received the King of Castile into the Fraternity of the Garter, and had his Son Prince Henry admitted to the order of the Golden-fleece ; and that the Earl of Suffolk was brought over and committed to the Tower ; the King of Castile departed home.

In this Kings time were two Calls of Serjeants at Law : One in his eleventh year, in which were called nine Serjeants, Mordant, Higham, Kingesmill, Conisby, Butler, Taxely, Frowik, Oxenbridge, and Constable ; who kept their feast at the Bishop of Elys Palace in Holborn, where the King, the Queen, and all the chief Lords dined. The other Call in his twentieth year ; in which were called ten Serjeants, Robert Brudnel, William Greவில், Thomas Marow, George Edgew, Lewis Polard, Guy Palmes, and William Fairfax ; who kept their feast at the Archbishops house in Lambeth.

King Henry having gotten as much honour as the Estimation of neighbouring Princes could give him, began now to be intente to getting of wealth ; wherein he quickly found Instruments fit for his purpose, but especially two, Empson and Dudley, both Lawyers, and both of them Barons of the Exchequer ; Dudley of a goodly family, but Empson the Son of a Sieve-maker. These two persons being put in Authority, turned Law and Justice into Rapine. For first, their manner was, to cause divers Subjects to be indicted of Crimes, and then presently to commit them ; and not produce them to their answer, but suffer them to languish long in Prison ; and by sundry artificial devices and terrours, extort from them great Fines, which they termed Compositions and Mitigations. Neither did they (towards the end) observe so much as the half face of Justice, in proceeding by Indictment ; but sent forth their Precepts to attach men, and convent them before themselves and some others at their private houses, and there used to shuffle up a Summary proceeding by examination, without trial of Jury ; assuming to themselves, to deal both in Pleas of the Crown, and controversies Civil. Then did they also use to intrude and charge the Subjects land with Tenures in Capite, by finding false Offices ; refusing upon divers pretexts and delays, to admit men to traverse those false Offices as by Law they might.

Two Calls of Serjeants at Law.

Empson and Dudley King Henry's Instruments for raising of money, and by what unjust courses.

A might. Nay the Kings Wards, after they had accomplished their full age, could not be suffered to have livery of their lands, without paying excessive Fines, far exceeding all reasonable rates. When men were outlawed in personal actions, they would not permit them to purchase their Charters of Pardon, except they paid great and intolerable sums ; standing upon the strict point of Law, which upon Outlawries gives forfeiture of goods. Nay, contrary to all Law and colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the half of mens lands and rents during the space of full two years, for a Pain in case of Outlawry. They would also ruffle with Jurors, and enforce them to find as they would direct ; and if they did not, then convent, imprison, and fine them. These and many other courses they had of preying upon the people : but their principal working was upon Penal Statutes ; wherein they considered not whether the Law was obsolete, or in use ; and had ever a rabble of Promoters and leading Jurors at their command, so as they could have any thing found, either for fact or Valuation. There remaineth to this day a Report, that King Henry was on a time entertained very sumptuously by the Earl of Oxford, at his Castle of Henningham : and at the Kings going away, the Earls servants stood in their livery-coats with cognifances, ranged on both sides, to make the King a lane : Whereupon the King called the Earl to him, and said : My Lord, I have heard much of your Hospitality, but I see it is greater than is spoken ; These handfom Gentlemen and Yeomen whom I see on both sides of me, are sure your Menial servants. At which the Earl smiled, and said : It may please your Grace, that were not for mine ease ; They are moit of them my Retainers, and are come to do me service at such a time as this, and chiefly to see your Grace. Whereat the King started a little, and said : By my faith (my Lord) I thank you for my good cheer ; but I may not endure to have my Laws broken in my sight : my Attorney must speak with you about it. And it is part of the Report, that it cost the Earl for a composition, fifteen thousand marks. And to shew further the Kings extreme diligence : I remember (saith Sir Francis Bacon Lord of Verulam in his History) to have seen long since a Book of Account of Empsons, that had the Kings hand almost to every leaf, by way of signing ; and was in some places postilled in the Margent with the Kings own hand likewise, where was this Remembrance :

Item, Received of such a one five marks for the Pardon to be procured ; and if the Pardon do not pass, the money to be repaid, except the party be some other way satisfied.

And over against this Memorandum (of the Kings own hand, ) Otherwise satisfied. This (saith he) I do the rather mention, because it shews in the King a Nearness, but yet with a kind of Justness. In his three and twentieth year, there was a sharp prosecution against Sir William Capell, now the second time, for misgovernment in his Maioralty : The great matter was, that in some payments he had taken notice of false moneys, and did not his diligence to examine who were the Offenders ; for which and some other things laid to his charge, he was condemned to pay two thousand pounds, whereof, being a man of stomach, he refused to pay a farthing ; and thereupon was sent to the Tower, where he remained until the Kings death. Kneshworth likewise, that had been lately Maior of London, and both his Sheriffs, were for abuses in their offices questioned and imprisoned, and not delivered but upon payment of one thousand four hundred pounds. Sir Lawrence Ailmer, who had likewise been Maior of London, and his two Sheriffs, were put to the Fine of one thousand pounds ; and Sir Lawrence, for refusing to pay it, was committed to prison, where he stayed till Empson himself was committed in his place. By these courses he accumulated so great store of Treasure, that he left at his death, most of it in secret places, under his own key and keeping at Richmond, (as is reported) the sum of neer eighteen hundred thousand pounds Sterling. But though by this course he got great store of Treasure, yet by it he lost the best treasure (the peoples hearts) but that he something qualified it by his last Testament, commanding that Restitution should be made of all such moneys as had unjustly been levied by his Officers.

It seems King Henry, after the death of his Queen the Lady Elizabeth, had an inclination to marry again ; and hearing of the great beauty and virtue of the young Queen of Naples, the Widow of Ferdinando the younger ; he sent three confident persons, Francis Marsin, James Braybrook, and John Stile, to make two inquiries ; one of her person and conditions, the other of her Estate : Who returning their answer, that they found her Beauty and Vertues to be great, but her Estate to be only a certain Pension or Exhibition, and not the Kingdom of Naples as he expected, he then gave over any further meddling in that matter. After this, another Treaty of marriage was propounded to the King, between him and the Lady Margaret Dutchess Dowager of Savoy, only Daughter to Maximilian, and Sister to the King of Castile ; a Lady wife and of great fame : In which business was employed, for his first piece, the Kings then Chaplain, and after the great Prelate, Thomas Woolsey. It was in the end concluded, with ample conditions for the King, but with the promise of Futuro only. Which marriage was protracted from time to time, in respect of the Infirmy of the King : which held him by fits till he died.

He left Executors, Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester, Richard Fitz-James Bishop of London, Thomas Bishop of Durham, John Bishop of Rochester, Thomas Duke of Norfolk and Treasurer of England, Edward Earl of Worcester and Lord Chamberlain, John F. Knight, chief Justice of the Kings Bench, and Robert R. Knight, chief Justice of the Common Pleas. A little before his death, he had concluded a marriage (in which negotiation Fox Bishop of Winchester was employed) between his younger Daughter the Lady Mary, of the age of ten years, and Charles King of Castile, not much elder : but though concluded, yet not solemnized ; and the war afterward married to Lewis the French King.

Of his Taxations.

IN his third year, there was by Parliament granted toward the maintaining an Army in Britain; that every man should pay the tenth penny of his Goods: which Tax though at first withstood in Yorkshire and Durham; yet was afterward levied to the uttermost. In his seventh year, towards his wars in France, a Benevolence was by Parliament granted, by which great sums of money were collected of the richer sort only. In his eleventh year, a Subsidy of sixscore thousand pounds was granted him by Parliament, towards his wars with Scotland, which caused afterward the insurrection in Cornwall. In his nineteenth year a Subsidy was granted him by Parliament. In his one and twentieth year, he raised great sums of money from offenders against Penal Statutes: the greatest, but the unjustest way for raising of money, that ever any King of England used; and not content with this, he required, and had at the same a Benevolence both from the Clergy and Laity. To the Clergy was employed Richard Fox, then Bishop of Winchester; who assembling the Clergy before him, exhorted them to be liberal in their contribution; but the Clergy being of two sorts, rich and poor, made each of them their several excuses: The rich and such as had great livings, said, they were at great charges in keeping hospitality and maintaining their families: and therefore desired to be spared: The poor sort alledged, that their means were small, and scarce able to find them necessities, and therefore desired to be forborn. But the Bishop answered them both with a pretty Dilemma, saying to the rich, It is true, you live at great charges in hospitality, in apparel and other demonstrations of your wealth; and seeing you have store to spend in that order, there is no reason but for your Princes service you should do much more, and therefore you must pay. To the poorer sort he said, though your livings be small, yet your frugality is great, and you spend not in house-keeping and apparel as others do; therefore be content, for you shall pay.

Of his Laws and Ordinances.

THIS King was the first that ordained a company of tall strong men, (naming them Yeomen of the Guard) to be attending about the person of the King; to whom he appointed a Livery by which to be known, and a Captain by whom to be chosen. In his time, the authority of the Star-chamber, which subsisted before by the Common Laws of the Realm, was confirmed in certain cases by act of Parliament. In his time were made these excellent general Laws: One, that from thenceforth fines should be final, and conclude all stranger rights: Another for admission of poor suitors, In forma pauperis, without paying Fee to Counsellor, Attorney or Clerk. Another, that no person that did assist by Arms or otherwise the King for the time being, should after be Impeached therefore or Attainted either by course of the Law, or by Act of Parliament; and that if any such Act of Attainder did happen to be made, it should be void and of none effect. Another for the Benevolence, to make the sums which any had agreed to pay, and were not brought in, to be leviable by course of Law. Another, that Murderers should be burnt on the brawn of the left hand, with the letter M. and Thieves with the letter T. so that if they offended the second time, they should have no mercy, but be put to death; and this to reach also to Clerks Convict. In his fifth year, it was ordained by Parliament, that the Maior of London should have Conservation of the River of Thames, from the Bridge of Stanes, to the waters of Tyndale and Medway. In his seventeenth, John Shaw Maior of London, caused his Brethren the Aldermen to ride from the Guild-hall to the waters-side when he went to Westminster to be presented in the Exchequer: he also caused the kitchens and other houses of office to be builded at the Guild-hall; where since that time, the Maiors feast hath been kept, which before had been in the Grocers or Taylours-hall. In his eighteenth year King Henry being himself a brother of the Taylours Company, as divers Kings before had been, namely, Richard the third, Edward the fourth, Henry the sixth, Henry the fifth, Henry the fourth, and Richard the second; also of Dukes: 1. Earls 28. Lords 48. he now gave to them the Name and Title of Merchant Taylors, as a name of worship to endure for ever.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

IN the tenth year of his Reign, Joan Boughton widow, was burnt in Smithfield, for holding certain opinions of John Wickliffe. In his seventh year, King Henry finding great inconvenience by the privilege of Sanctuaries; wrote to Pope Alexander, desiring him by his authority, to adjudge all English men being fled to Sanctuary for the offence of Treason, to be enemies to the Christian Faith; and to prohibit the priviledg of Sanctuary to all such as once had enjoyed it before: which request the Pope granted, to the great contentment of the King, and quiet of the Realm. In his sixteenth year, being the year 1500. a Jubilee in Rome was celebrated; whereof Alexander the then Pope, by his messenger Gaspar Pons a Spaniard, gave notice to the King, offering withal, that those who could not come to Rome, should notwithstanding at a certain price have Pardons,

The Priviledge of Sanctuaries abated.

A Pardons, and as full a benefit of the Jubilee, as if they came; and to the end the King should not hinder his purpose, both offered part of his gains to the King, and also promised to bestow it upon a war against the Turk; by which course he gathered great sums, for which he had other use, then to spend it so idly. In the two and twentieth year of this King, Pope Alexander the sixth dyed of Poyson, by this accident: He went to supper in a Vineyard near the Vatican, where his Son Valentino meaning to poyson Adrian Cardinal of Cornetta, sent thither certain flaggons of Wine infected with Poyson, and delivered them to a servant of his, who knew nothing of the matter; commanding him, that none should touch them, but by his appointment: It happened, the Pope coming in something before Supper, and being very dry through the immoderate heat of the season, called for drink, his own provision being not yet come: The servant that had the poysoned Wine in keeping, thinking it to be committed to him as a special Wine, brought of it to the Pope; and while he was drinking, his Son Valentino came in, and drank also of the same; whereby they were both poysoned; but the Pope only overcame of the Poyson, dyed; his son by the strength of youth bare it out, though with long languishing.

Pope Alexander the sixth poysoned, by what chance.

Works of Piety and other Structures by him, and others.

THIS King magnificently enlarged Greenwich, which Humphry Duke of Gloucester had formerly builded, calling it Placentia. In his sixteenth year, he new builded his Manour of Shen, and named it Richmond: He also new builded Baynards Castle in London. In his two and twentieth year, he finished the goodly Hospital of the Savoy near Charing-cross, to which he gave lands for the relieving of two hundred poor people: This was first called Savoy-place, built by Peter Earl of Savoy Father to Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury, about the nine and twentieth year of Henry the third, who made the said Peter Earl of Richmond. The house belonged since to the Duke of Lancaster; and at this time was converted to an Hospital, retaining still the first name of the Savoy. In this Kings time, John Morton being Bishop of Ely, bestowed great cost upon his house at Hatfield in Hertfordshire, now the house of the Right Honourable the Earl of Salisbury; and at Wesbich Castle in Cambridgeshire, a house belonging to that See; all the Brick building was of his charge: Being afterward Bishop of Canterbury, he bestowed great sums in repairing and augmenting his houses at Maidstone, Alington-Park, Charing, Ford, Lambeth, and specially at Knok in Kent, where he dyed. King Henry also builded three houses of Franciscan Friars, which are called Observants; one at Richmond, another at Greenwich, a third at Newark; and three other of Franciscan Friars, which are called Conventuals, one at Canterbury, another at Newcastle, and a third at Southampton. And drawing near his end, he did these works of charity: He granted a general Pardon to all men, for any offence committed against any of his Laws, Theeves and Murderers only excepted: He paid also all Fees of all Prisoners in all Gaols in and about London, abiding there for that cause only: He paid also the Debts of all such persons as lay in the Counters or Ludgate for forty shillings or under, and some also for ten pounds. In his eighteenth year, the Chappel of our Lady, above the East-side of the high Altar at Westminster Church, with a Tavern called the White-race near adjoining, was taken down, in which place a most beautiful Chappel was then presently begun to be builded, by King Henry; the charges whereof amounted to the sum of fourteen thousand pounds (as Stow witnesseth.) In his second year, the great Conduit in Cheap-side, at the charges of Thomas Ilam Alderman of London, was new made; and the Crofs also in Cheap-side was new builded, towards the charges whereof Thomas Fisher Mercer gave five hundred Marks. In his seventh year, the Conduit in Grace-street was begun to be builded by the Executors of Sir Thomas Hill Grocer, late Maior of London. Also this year, Hugh Clapton Maior of London, builded the great Bridge of Stratford upon Avon, as likewise a fair Chappel toward the South-eade of that Town; and near unto the same, a pretty house of Brick and Timber, where he lay and ended his life: He glazed also the Chancel of the Parish Church in that Town; and made a way of four miles long, three miles from Alisbury towards London, and one mile beyond Alisbury. In his tenth year, John Tate Maior of London, builded the Church of Saint Anthones with a Free-school, and certain Alms-houses for poor men. In his time, his Mother the Lady Margaret Countess of Richmond, builded two Colleged in Cambridge, one called Christis Colledge, the other S. Johns; and endowed them with large possessions; for the maintenance of learning. Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester founded Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, and William Smith Bishop of Lincoln, Brazen-nose Colledge: He also builded at Lichfield an Hospital, for a Matter, two Priests, and ten poor men, as likewise a Free-school, with a School-master and an Usher. Anne Aveling gave an hundred Marks towards the building of the Church in Cirester. In his time also John Alecok Bishop of Ely, builded Jesus Colledge in Cambridge; and in his two and twentieth year Tho. Knesworth Maior of London builded the Conduit at Bishopsgate at his own charge; and gave to the Fish-mongers certain Tenements; for which they are bound to allow to four Scholars, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, to each of them four pounds a year: also to poor people and prisoners in Ludgate something yearly. In his twentieth year, Sir William Capell Maior of London, caused all Hompsteditch to be paved over; which till that time, had lien very noyously to all travellers that way. In his fourteenth year, all the Gardens without Morgate (which had continued time out of minde) were destroyed; and of them was made a plain field, for Archers to shoot in. In this Kings time also, Thomas Savage Archbishop of York, repaired the Cattle of Cowood, and the Manour of Scroby, and founded the Chappel at Maclefield in Cheshire, where he was born. Also in this time, Stephen Gennings Maier of London, founded a free Grammar School at Wolverhampton in Staffordshire, where he was born; and gave lands sufficient for a Matter and an Usher, leaving the oversight to the Merchant Taylors in London. This Town of Wolverhampton, commonly so called, is originally and rightly called Wilfrane-hampton, upon this occasion: The Town was anciently called Hampton, to which a noble Woman named Wilfrune, a Widow, sometime Wife of Athelm Duke of Northampton; obtained of King Ethelred, to give lands to the Church there, which she had founded; and thereupon the Town took the addition of the said Wilfrune. In this Kings time also John Colet Dean of Pauls, founded Pauls School in the Church-yard there.

Casualties happening in his time.

Two sweating
sicknesses.

IN his first year, happened the Sicknefs called the Sweating-sicknefs, which though it continued not long, yet took away many thousands: and in his two and twentieth year, the like Sweating-sicknefs happened again; but by reason of Remedies found in the former, took away fewer.

The price of Corn and other things in his time.

In his second year Wheat was sold for three shillings the Quarter, Bay-salt at the like price: In his seventh year, Wheat was sold at London for twenty pence the Bushel, which was counted a great dearth. In his tenth year, Wheat was sold at London for six pence the Bushel, Bay-salt for three pence half-peny, Nantwich Salt for six pence, white Herrings nine shillings the Barrel, red Herrings three shillings the Cade, red Sprats six pence the Cade, and Gascoigne Wines for six pounds the Tun. In his fifteenth year, Gascoigne Wine was sold at London for forty shillings the Tun, a Quarter of Wheat four shillings, and Bay-salt four pence the Bushel.

The two and twentieth of August 1485. the very day that King Henry got the victory of King Richard; a great fire was in Bread street in London, in which was burnt the Parson of Saint Mildreds, and one other man in the Parsonage there.

In his tenth year, in digging a new foundation in the Church of Saint Mary Hill in London, the body of Alice Hackney, which had been buried in the Church a hundred seventy five years before, was found whole of Skin, and the joynts of her Arms pliable, which Corps was kept above ground four days without annoyance, and then again buried.

Hayl-stones
18. Inches about.

In his twelfth year, on Bartholomew day, at the Town of Saint Needs in Bedford-shire, there fell Hayl-stones that were measured eighteen Inches about.

In his thirteenth year on the one and twentieth of December, suddenly in the night brake out a fire in the Kings Lodgings, being then at his Manour of Sheen; by violence whereof, a great part of the old Building was burnt, with Hangings, Beds, Apparel, Plate, and many Jewels. In his fifteenth year, the Town of Brabam in Norfolk was burnt: Also this year, a great Plague happened; whereof many people dyed in many places, but specially in London, where there dyed that year thirty thousand.

In his twentieth year, Alum which for many years had been sold for six shillings a hundred, rose to five Nobles a hundred, and after to four Marks.

In his two and twentieth year the City of Normich was well neer consumed with fire. Also in the same year, in July, a Gallery new builded at Richmond, wherein the King and the Prince his Son had walked not an hour before, fell suddenly down, yet no man hurt.

The great Tempest which drave King Philip into England, blew down the Golden Eagle from the Spire of Pauls; and in the fall, it fell upon a sign of the black Eagle, which was in Pauls Church-yard, in the place where the School-house now standeth; and battered it and brake it down. This the people interpreted to be an ominous Prognostick upon the Imperial House, as indeed it proved; for this King Philip being the Emperours Son, arriving in Spain, sickned soon after; and being but thirty years of age, deceased: upon whose decease, his Wife Queen Juan out of her tender love to him, fell distracted of her wits.

Of his Wife and Children.

HE married Elizabeth eldest Daughter of King Edward the Fourth, being of the age of nineteen years; whom two years after his Marriage he caused to be Crowned: She lived his Wife eighteen years, and dyed in Child-bed in the Tower of London, the eleventh of February, the very day on which she was born; and is buried at Westminster, in the magnificent Chappel and rich Monument of Copper and Gilt, which her Husband had erected. He had Issue by her, three Sons and four Daughters: his eldest Son Arthur was born at Winchester, the twentieth day of September, in the second year of his Reign; and dyed at Ludlow, at fifteen years old and a half; and of this short life some cause may be attributed to his Nativity, being born in the eighth month after conception: He was buried in the Cathedral Church of St. Maries in Worcester, where in the South side of the Quire he lies entombed in Touch or Jet, without any remembrance of him by Picture. His second Son Henry was born at Greenwich in Kent, on the two and twentieth day of June, in the seventh year of his Fathers Reign; and succeeded him in the Kingdom.

Queen Elizabeth dyed the very day in which she was born.

A His third Son Edmund was born in the tenth year of his Fathers Reign, and died at five years of age, at Bishops Hatfield, and lies buried at S. Peters in Westminster. His eldest Daughter Margaret was born the nine and twentieth day of November, the fifth year of her Fathers Reign; and at fourteen years of age was married to James the fourth King of Scotland; unto whom she bare three Sons, James the fifth, Arthur, and Alexander, and one Daughter, which three last dyed all of them young; and after the death of her Husband King James, (slain at Flodden field in fight against the English) she was remarried to Archibald Dowglass Earl of Angus, in the year 1514. to whom she bare Margaret, espoused to Matthew Earl of Lenox, Father of the Lord Henry, who died at the age of nine moneths, and lieth interred in the upper end of the Chancel in the Parish Church of Stepney neer London: Her second Son was Henry Lord Dernly, reputed for personage the goodliett Gentleman of Europe; who married Mary Queen of Scotland, the Royal Parents of the most Royal Monarch James the first, King of great Britain. Her third Son was Charles Earl of Lenox, Father to the Lady Arbella. King Henry's second Daughter the Lady Elizabeth was born in the year 1492. at three years of age died, and was buried at Westminster: His third Daughter the Lady Mary, had been promised to Charles King of Castile; but was married to Lewis the twelfth, King of France; who dying three moneths after, she was then married to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk: His fourth Daughter, the Lady Katherine, was born in the year 1503. in the eighteenth year of her Fathers Reign, and died an Infant.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was of Body lean and spare, yet of great strength; of stature somewhat higher then the common sort, his eyes gray, his teeth tingle, his hair thin, of a fair complexion, and pleasing countenance. Concerning his Conditions, he had in him the virtue of a Prince, and of a private man; affable, yet reserved. We might say he was Politick; if not rather, that he was Wise; for though he used tricks of Cunning sometimes, yet solid Circumspection more. He loved not War, but in case of necessity; always Peace, but with conditions of Honour. Never any Prince was less addicted to bodily pleasures of any kind, then he. Three pleasures he had, but in three cases; One for Safety; another for Honour; and the third for Wealth: in all which he attained his end. His great respect of the Church, was seen by his great employment of Churchmen; for through the hands of Bishop Morton, Bishop Fox, and his Chaplain Urswick, the greatest part of all his negotiations passed. He was Frugal from his youth, not Covetous, till ancient and sickly; and therefore what defect he had in that kind, must be attributed to age and weaknefs. The City of London was his Paradise, for what good fortune soever befell him, he thought he enjoyed it not, till he acquainted them with it. His Parliament was his Oracle; for in all matters of importance he would ask their advice; and he put his very Prerogative sometimes into their hands. He was no great lover of Women; yet all his great fortune both precedent and subsequent came by Women; His own title to the Crown, was by a Woman; his Confirmation in the Crown, was by a Woman; his Transfession of the Crown to his Posterity, was by a Woman: The first by the Lady Margaret, descended from John of Gunt; the second by the Lady Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of King Edward the fourth; the third by the Lady Margaret, eldest Daughter of himself King of England, and married to James the Fourth, King of Scotland; by means whereof, as he was the Prince that joyned the two Roses in one; so he was the Founder of joyned the two Kingdoms in one. And lastly, it may be said of him, as was said by one of Augustus Caesar:--- Hic vir hic est, tili qui promitti sapius audis: for Cadwallader last King of the Britains, seven hundred years before had prophesied of him; and of latter time, King Henry the sixth plainly fore-shewed him.

Of his Death and Burial.

IN the two and twentieth year of his Reign, he began to be troubled with the Gout; but a Defluxion also taking into his Breast, waited his Lungs, so that thrice in a year, and specially in the Spring, he had great fits and labours of the Tiffick, which brought him to his end; at his Palace of Richmond, on the two and twentieth day of April in the year 1508. when he had lived two and fifty years, reigned three and twenty and eight moneths: being dead, and all things necessary for his Funeral prepared; his Corps was brought out of his Privy Chamber, into the great Chamber, where it rested three daies; and every day had there a Dirge and Masse sung by a Prelate, Mitred: and from thence it was conveyed into the Hall, wherein it remained also three daies, and had a like service there; and so three daies in the Chappel. Upon Wednesday the ninth of May, the Corps was put into a Chariot, and over the Corps was a picture of the late King, laid on Cushions of Gold; and the Picture, was apparelled in the Kings rich Robes, with a Crown on the head, and a Ball and Scepter in the hands: when the Chariot was thus ordered, the Kings Chaplain and a great number of Prelates set forward, praying; then followed all the Kings Servants in Black; then followed the Chariot, and after the Chariot nine Mourners, and on every side were carried Torches, to the number of six hundred; and in this order they came from Richmond to S. Georges field; where there met with it all the Priests and Religious men.

men within the City and without; the Maior and Aldermen, with many Commoners, all clothed in Black, met with the Corps at London Bridge; and so the Chariot was brought throughout the City to the Cathedral of St. Paul, where the body was taken out and carried into the Quire, and set under a goodly Hearse of Wax; where after a solemn Mass, was made a Sermon by the Bishop of Rochester: The next day, the Corps in like manner was removed to Westminster; Sir Edward Howard bearing the Kings Banner. In Westminster was a curious hearse full of Lights, which were lighted at the coming of the Corps; and then was the Corps taken out of the Chariot by six Lords, and set under the Hearse, which was double railed: when the Mourners were set, Garter King at Arms, cried, For the Soul of the Noble Prince Henry the seventh, late King of this Realm: The next day were three Masses solemnly sung by Bishops, and after the Masses was offered the Kings Banner and Courser, his Coat of Arms, his Sword, his Target, and his Helm, and at the end of the Mass, the Mourners offered up rich Palls of Cloth of Gold and Bodkin; and when the Quire sang Liberate me, the Body was put into the Earth; then the Lord Treasurer, Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, the Treasurer and Comptroller of the Kings Household, brake their Staves and cast them into the Grave: Then Garter cried with a loud voyce; Vive le Roy Henry le huitieme, Roy d' Anglitterre & de France, sire d' Irlande: and thus ended the Funeral.

Anno Dom.

ING Henry the Seventh being deceased, his only Son Prince Henry Heir by his Father of the House of Lancaster, and by his Mother of the House of York; by unquestionable right succeeded in the Crown, at the Age of eighteen years, on the two and twentieth of April, in the year 1509. who having been trained up in the study of good letters all his Fathers time; he governed at first as a man newly come from Contemplation to Action, as it were by the Book; in so regular and fair a manner, that as of Neroes Government, there was said to be Quinquennium Neronis; so of this Kings, there might as just be said,

Decennium Henrici; and perhaps double so long a time, comparable with so much time of any Kings Reign, that had been before him. How he came to alter, and to alter to such a degree of change as he did, we shall then have a fit place to shew, when we come to the time of his alteration. King Henry having learned by Books, that the weight of a Kingdom is too heave to lie upon one mans shoulders, if it be not supported by able Counsellors, made it his first care, to make choice of an able Council; to which he called William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Chancellor of England, Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester, Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, and Treasurer of England, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury, and Lord Steward of his Household, Charles Somerset Lord Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Henry Wyke, Doctor Thomas Ruthall, and Sir Edward Poyning; by advice of these Counsellors, his first Act after the care of his Fathers Funeral, was the care to perform his Fathers Will, in marrying the Lady Katherine of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Prince Arthur; to which perhaps, but in respect of filial piety, he had not the greatest devotion; and for relinquishing whereof, he might (no doubt) more easily have obtained a Dispensation from the Pope, then his Father had done, for getting it to be allowed: but obsequiousness to his Fathers desire, and respect to his Counsels advice, so far prevailed with him, that he would not be Crowned, till that were performed, that one Coronation might serve them both: and so on the third day of June following, he married the said Lady, at the Bishop of Salisbury House in Fleets street; where of many great solemnities, I will remember but this one; that though the Bride were a Widow, yet to shew she was a Virgin Widow, she was attired all in white, and had the hair of her head hanging down behind at the full length: and then (having made in the Tower four and twenty Knights of the Bath) two daies after being Midsummer day, he was Crowned at Westminster, together with his Queen, by the hands of William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury; with all Circumstances of State in such cases usual; and then all the Nobility Spiritual and Temporal, did him Homage; and the people being asked whether they would receive him for their King, they all with one voice, cried, Yea, Yea.

This done, his next Act was another part of performing his Fathers Will, which was to proclaim Pardons for all Offences (Treason, Murder, and Felony only excepted) and to have restitution made of all goods unjustly taken from any; and because the Instruments of such injustice are always most odious, and nothing gives the people so much contentment, as to see their Persecutors punished; he therefore caused Empson and Dudley the two chief Actors of the late unjust proceedings, to be committed to the Tower, and divers of their inferior Agents, called Promoters, as Canby, Page, Smith, Derby, Wight, Simpson, and Stockton, to be set on the Pillory in Cornhill, with Papers on their heads, and then to ride through the City, with their faces to the Horse tails; with the shame whereof in seven daies after, they all dyed in Newgate. Shortly after a Parliament was called; whereof Sir Thomas Ingleby was chosen Speaker; and therein Empson and Dudley were attainted of high Treason, and after arraigned; Edmund Dudley in the Guildhall, on the seventeenth of July, and Sir Richard Empson at Northampton in October following; and on the seventeenth of August the year following, they were both of them beheaded on the Tower-hill; and their Bodies and Heads buried, the one at the White-Friers, the other at the Black.

On Midsummer Eve at night, King Henry came privily into Cheapside, cloathed in one of the Coats of his Guard, to behold the same: and this first year King Henry spent in Juits and Masks, which were almost perpetual, performed with great Magnificence alwayes; and sometimes with great Acts of Valour, on the Kings part specially.

In February the same year, Ambassadors came from the Kings Father in Law, the King of Aragon, requiring aid against the Moors; in which service, the Lord Thomas Darcy, a Knight of the Garter, making suit to be employed, he was sent thither, and with him the Lord Anthony Gray, Brother to the Marquess Dorset, Henry Guilford, Wolstan Brown, and William Sidney, Esquires of the Kings House, Sir Robert Constable, Sir Roger Hastings, Sir Ralph Elderton, and others; who on the Monday in the Rogation week, departed out of Plimouth Haven, with four Ships Royal, and on the first of June, arrived at the Port of Cadix in South Spain; of whose coming the King of Aragon hearing, sent to bid them welcome, but advertizing them withal, that he had now by reason of new troubles with France, taken truce with the Moors; and therefore they might return again into their own Country, to whom yet he allowed wages for all his Souldiers. Whereupon the Lord Darcy and all his men went aboard their Ships; but Henry Guilford, Wolstan Brown, and William Sidney, desirous to see the Court of Spain, went thither, and were honourably entertained. Henry Guilford, and Wolstan Brown were made Knights by the King; who gave to Sir Henry Guilford a Canton of Granado; and to Sir Wolstan Brown an Eagle of Sicily on a Chief, to the augmentation of their Arms: William Sidney so excused himself, that he was not made Knight.

After this they returned to their Ships, and their Ships into England. During the time that the Lord Darcy was in Spain, the Lady Margaret Dutcheis of Savoy, Daughter unto Maximilian the Emperour, and Governess of Flanders and other the Low-Countries, pertaining to Charles the young Prince of Castile, sent to King Henry for fifteen hundred Archers, to aid her against the Duke of Gelders, which the King granted; and thereupon Sir Edward Poyning Knight of the Garter, and Controller of the Kings House appointed to go, accompanied with his Son in Law the Lord Clinton, Sir Matthew Brown, Sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Withervill, and others to the number of fifteen hundred, took Shipping at Sandwich, and passing over to the said Lady Regent, did her there great service; for which John Norton, John Fogge, John Scot, and Thomas Linde were Knighted; and then with many thanks and rewards, returned, not having lost in all the Journey, by war or sickness, above an hundred men.

In the third year of King Henries Reign, one Andrew Barton a Scottish Pirate, was grown so bold, that he robbed English men no less then other Nations, till the King sent his Admiral, Sir Edward Howard, to repress him, who in a fight so wounded the said Barton, that he dyed; and then taking two of his Ships, brought the men Prisoners to London; and though their offence deserved no less then death, yet the King was so merciful as to pardon them all; provided, they departed the Realm within twenty daies. The King of Scots hearing the death of Barton, and taking of his Ships, sent to King Henry, requiring restitution; but King Henry answered his Herald, that he rather looked for thanks for spairing their lives, who so justly had deserved death.

In the third year also of King Henries Reign, the French King made sharp War against Pope Jules the second; whereupon King Henry wrote to the French King, requiring him to desist from his War against the Pope, being his friend and confederate; but when the King of France little regarded his request, he then sent him word, to deliver him his Inheritance of the Duchy of Normandy and Guyen, and the Countreys of Anjou and Mayne; as also his Crown of France, or else he would recover it by the Sword. But when the King of France was not moved with this threatening neither; King Henry then joyning in League with the Emperour Maximilian, with Ferdinand King of Spain, and with divers other Princes, resolved by advice of his Council to make War on the King of France, and to that end made preparation both by Sea and Land.

This year the King kept his Christmas at Greenwich in a most magnificent manner. On New-years day was presented one of his Jovial Devices, which only for a Pattern what his shows at other times were, I think fit to set down at large. In the Hall was made a Castle, garnished with Artillery and Weapons, in a most warlike fashion, and on the Front of the Castle was written, la Fortresse Dangevense: within the Castle were six Ladies, cloathed in Ruffet Satten, laid all over with leaves of Gold: on their heads Coys and Caps of Gold. After this Castle had been carried about the Hall, and the Queen had beheld it; in came the King with five other, apparelled in Coats, one half of Ruffet Satten, with Spangles of fine Gold; the other half of rich cloth of Gold: on their heads Caps of Ruffet Satten, embroidered with works of fine Gold.

Empson and Dudley committed to the Tower.

Both of them beheaded.

One of King Henries Jovial Devices.

These six assaulted the Castle, whom the Ladies seeing so lusty and courageous, they were contented to folace with them; and upon further communication, to yield the Castle; and so they came down, and danced a long space: after that the Ladies led the Knights into the Castle, and then the Castle suddenly vanished out of their sights. On the twelfth day at night, the King with eleven more were disguised, after the manner of Italy, called a Mask, a thing not seen before in England. They were apparelled in garments long and broad, wrought all with Gold, with Vipers and Caps of Gold. And after the Banquet done, these Maskers came in, with six Gentlemen disguised in silk, bearing staffe Torches, and desired the Ladies to dance, and after they had danced and communed together, took their leave and departed.

The five and twentieth of January began the Parliament, of which was Speaker Sir Robert Sheffield Knight, where the Archbishop of Canterbury shewed the wrong which the King of France did to the King of England, in withholding his Inheritance from him; and thereupon the Parliament concluded, that War should be made on the French King and his Dominions.

At this time King Ferdinand of Spain, having War with the French King, wrote to his Son in Law King Henry, that if he would fend over an Army into Biskey, and invade France on that side; he would aid them with Ordinance, Horses, and all other things necessary; whereupon Thomas Gray Marquess Dorset was appointed to go, and with him the Lord Howard Son and Heir to the Earl of Surrey, the Lord Brook, the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Ferrers, the Lords, John, Anthony and Leonard Grey, all Brothers to the Marquess; Sir Griffith ap Rice, Sir Maurice Berkeley, Sir William Sands, the Baron of Burford, and Sir Richard Cornwall his Brother, William Hussey, J. Melus, William Kingstone Esquires, and Sir Henry Willoughby, with divers others, to the number of ten thousand, who taking Ship at Southampton on the sixteenth of May, the third of June they landed on the coast of Biskey, whither within three days after their arrival, came from the King a Marquess and an Earl to welcome them; but of such necessities as were promised, there came none; so as the English being in some want of victuals, the King of Navarre offered to supply them, which they accepted; and promised thereupon not to molest his Territories. After the Army had lyeen thirty dayes, looking for aid and provision from the King of Spain, at last a Bishop came from the King, desiring them to have patience a while, and very shortly he would give them full contentment. In the mean time the English men forced to feed much upon Garlicke, and to drink of hot Wines; fell into such sickness, that many of them dyed, at least eighteen hundred persons: which the Lord Marquess seeing, he sent to the King to know his pleasure; who sent him answer, that very shortly the Duke of Alva should come with a great power, and joyn with him; and indeed the Duke of Alva came forward with a great Army, as if he meant to joyn with him as was promised; but being come within a days Journey, he suddenly turned towards the Realm of Navarre; and entering the same, chased out the King, and conquered the Kingdom to the King of Spains use. This Spanish policy pleased not the English, who finding nothing but words from the King of Spain, and being weary of lying so long idle; they fell upon some small Towns in the borders of Guyen, but for want of Horses as well for service as draught, were unable to perform any great matter; at which time, being now October, the Lord Marquess fell sick, and the Lord Howard supplied his place of General, to whom the King of Spain once again sent offering his present coming, and requiring him, seeing the time of year was now past, that he would be pleased to break up his Army, and disperse his Companies into Towns thereabouts, till the next Spring, when he would not fail to make good all his promises: Hereupon the Lord Howard and his Company went to Rendre, the Lord Willoughby to Gorschance, and Sir William Sands with many other Captains to Fontaroby. King Henry in the mean time, hearing what the King of Spain intention was; sent his Herald Windsor with Letters to the Army, willing them to tarry there, for that very shortly he meant to send them a new supply of Forces; under the conduct of the Lord Herbert his Chamberlain; but this message so incensed the Souldiers, that in a great fury they had slain the Lord Howard, if he had not yielded presently to return home; who thereupon was forced to hire Ships, and in the beginning of December they landed in England; being taught by this experience what trust is to be given to Spanish promises.

About the same time that the Marquess went into Spain, Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral of England, with twenty great Ships made forth towards Britain; where setting his men on land, he burned and wasted divers Towns and Villages, and being threatened by the Lords of Britain to be encountered, to encourage his Gentlemen, he made divers of them Knights; as Sir Edward Brook Brother to the Lord Colham, Sir Griffith Down, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir John Burdet, Sir William Pirton, Sir Henry Sherburn, and Sir William Bull. The Britains were ten thousand, the English but five and twenty hundred; yet the Britains not contented with this advantage of number, would needs use Policy besides, for by the advice of an old experienced Captain, their General commanded his men that as soon as the Battels were joyned, they should retire a little, meaning thereby to draw the English into some disadvantage; but the common Souldiers not knowing their Generals purpose, and supposing he had seen some present danger, instead of retiring took their heels and fled; so giving the English by their British policy, if not a Victory, at least a safety to return to their Ships. After which the Britains sued for Truce, and could not obtain it; for the English Admiral pursued his foraging the Countrey, till fearing there were many French Ships abroad at Sea, he came and lay before the Isle of Wight. King Henry in the mean time followed his pleasures, and in June kept a solemn Just at Greenwich, where he and Sir Charles Brandon took up all commers; and the King shewed himself no less a King at Arms, then in Estate.

Upon the King of Spains promise of aid, King Henry sends a great Army to him, but is deluded.

After this, King Henry having prepared men and Ships ready to go to Sea, under the Governance of Sir Anthony Outbread, Sir Edmund Tichingham, William Sidney, and divers other Gentlemen; appointed them to take the Sea, and to come before the Isle of Wight, there to joyn with the Admiral; which all together made a Fleet of five and twenty fair Ships: and to Portsmouth the Regent, Sir Thomas Knevet Master of his Horse, and Sir John Carew of Devonshire, and another principal Ship called the Sovereign, he appointed for Captains, Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guilford; and then making them a Banquet, sent them going. The French King likewise had prepared a Navy of nine and thirty Ships in the Haven of Brest, whereof the chief was a great Carrick, called the Cordelger, pertaining to the Queen his Wife. These two Fleets met at the Bay of Britain, and there entered a terrible fight; the Lord Admirall made with the great Ship of Deep, and chased her; Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guilford being in the Sovereign, made with the great Carrick of Brest, and laid itemme to itemme to her: but whether by negligence of the Master, or by reason of the smoko from the Ordinance, the Sovereign was cast at the Stern of the Carrick; whereat the French men shouted for joy; which Sir Thomas Knevet seeing, suddenly he caused the Regent in which he was, to make to the Carrick, and to grapple with her a long board; and when they of the Carrick perceived they could not get afunder, they let slip an Anchor, and so with the stream the Ships turned, and the Carrick was on the Weather side, and the Regent on the Lee side; at which time a cruel fight passed between these two Ships: But in conclusion the English men entered the Carrick, which when a Gunner saw, he desperately set fire on the Gunpowder, (as some say) though others affirmed, that Sir Anthony Outbread following the Regent at the Stern, bowged her in divers places, and set her powder on fire; but Sir Piers Morgan, and with him nine hundred men; in the Regent were Sir Thomas Knevet and Sir John Carew, and with them seven hundred men, all drowned and burnt. King Henry to repair the loss of the Regent, caused a great Ship to be made, such a one as had never been seen in England; and named it Henry Grace de Dieu.

Though King Henry had hitherto followed his pleasures, as well agreeing with his youth and constitution; yet he neglected not in the mean time severer studies; for he frequented daily his Council Table, and no matter of importance was resolved on, till he had heard it first maturely discussed: as was now a War with France, which he would not enter into upon his own head, nor yet upon advice of his private Council, till he had it debated and concluded in Parliament; whereupon he called his High Court of Parliament, wherein it was resolved, that himself in person with a Royal Army, should invade France; and towards the charges thereof an extraordinary Subsidy was willingly granted.

On May even this year, Edmund de la Poole, Earl of Suffolk, was beheaded on the Tower Hill: This was that Earl of Suffolk, whom King Philip Duke of Austria, had delivered up into the hands of King Henry the Seventh, upon his promise that he would not put him to death; which indeed he performed, but his Son King Henry the eighth was not bound by that promise, and by him he was; and shortly after, to bring another Lord in his place, Sir Charles Brandon was created Viscount Lisle.

For all the great preparation for France, King Henry forbore not his course of Revelling, but kept his Christmas at Greenwich, with divers curious devices, in most magnificent manner. In March following, the Kings Navy Royal, to the number of two and forty Ships was set forth, under the conduct of Sir Edward Howard Lord Admiral, accompanied with Sir Walter Devereux, Lord Ferrers, Sir Woolstan Brown, Sir Edward Tichingham, Sir Anthony Poynings, Sir John Wollope, Sir Thomas Windham, Sir Stephen Bull, William Fitz-williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney Esquires, and divers other Gentlemen, who saying to Britain, came into Bertram Bay, and there lay at Anchor in sight of the French Navy, whereof one Prior John was Admiral, who keeping himself close in the Haven of Brest; the English Admiral intended to assail him in the Haven, but because his Ships were too great to enter the Bay, he caused certain Boats to be manned come abroad, he then called a Council, where it was determined, that first they should assail Prior John and his Gallies, lying in Blankesable Bay, and after set upon the rest of the French Fleet in the Haven of Brest; and it was further appointed that the Lord Ferrers, Sir Stephen Bull, and others should go on land, with a convenient number, to assault the Bulwarks, which the French so the French men might at once be assailed both by Sea and Land. But though this were determined by a Council of War, yet the Lord Admiral had a trick by himself, for by the advice of a Spanish Knight called Sir Aphonso Charant, affirming that he might enter the Bay with little danger; he called to him William Fitz-williams, William Coks, John Colley, and Sir Woolstan Brown, as enterprize with their assistants only; and so confident he was of success, that he wrote to the King to come thither in person, to have the honour of the enterprize himself; but it seems the King had better Fates, at least went not; and thereupon, on Saint Marks day the Admiral put himself in a small Row Barge; and appointing three other small Row Ships, and his own Ship Boat to attend him, and therewith on a sudden rowed into the Bay, where Prior John had moored up his Gallies just to the ground; which Gallies with the Bulwarks on the land, shot most cruelly;

The two Fleets of the French and English have a terrible Fight.

yet the Admiral went on, and coming to the Gallies, drove out the French men: the Bay was shallow, and the other Ships by reason of the Tide was spent, could not enter; which the French men perceiving, they entered the Gallies again with Morris Pikes, and began a new fight; whereupon the Admiral attempting to return back into his Row Barge, which by violence of the Tide, was driven down the stream, with a Pike was thrown over board and drowned; the just issue of his head-strong enterprise; the forenamed Alphonso was also there slain: upon which forrowful accident, the Lord Ferrers with the rest, returned into England. After whose departure, Prior John came forth with his Gallies; and coasting over the borders of Sussex, burnt certain poor Cottages; but the King made suddenly a new Admiral, the Lord Thomas Howard, eldest Brother to him that was drowned; Son and Heir of the Earl of Surrey: who so scoured the Seas, that the French were no more to be seen on any Coast of England.

King Henry had hitherto performed Acts of Arms, though in Jest, yet with great magnificence; he will not perform them with less, being now in earnest, and specially to deal with so potent an Adversary: and therefore when it was concluded by Parliament, that he should make a War in France himself in person; he sent before to prepare the way for him, George Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury high Steward of his Household; accompanied with the Lord Thomas Standley Earl of Derby, the Lord Dowker Prior of Saint Johns, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Hastings, the Lord Colham, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Thomas Cornwall and others, to the number of eight thousand; who arrived at Callice about the middle of May; after him in the end of May, followed Sir Charles Somerset, Lord Herbert, Lord Chamberlain, accompanied with the Lord Percy Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Gray Earl of Kent, the Lord Stafford Earl of Wiltshire, the Lord Dudley, the Lord Delaware, Sir Edward Hussy, Sir Edward Dimmock, Sir David Owen, with others to the number of six thousand: These Generals joyning together, issued out of Callice, and on the two and twentieth day of June, late down before the strong Town of Terwyn, which City was strongly fortified; and in it was Governour the Lord Poulterey, who had with him six hundred Horsemen, and five and twenty hundred Almain, besides the Inhabitants. Here at the very first happened two disasters to the English; one, that the Baron Carew was slain with a shot from the Town; the other, that Sir Nicholas Vaux, and Sir Edward Belknappe coming from Gaynes with four and twenty Carts of Provision, were set upon by the Duke of Vendosme, Lieutenant of Picardy, and many of the English slain, and the Provision taken. In this state was the English Camp at Terwyn, when King Henry the last day of June came himself to Callice, and on the one and twentieth of July took the field, having in his Army of fighting men, not above nine thousand, but with Pioners and others that attended the Carriages, eleven thousand and three hundred men: His forward was led by Charles Brandon Viscount Liste, his main Battail by himself, and Sir Henry Gylford carried his Standard; and in this order he marched forward to the siege of Terwyn, entering upon the French ground the five and twentieth of July. On the morrow after, by negligence of the Carters, that mistook the way, a great Gun called the John Evangelist, was overthrown in a deep Pond of water, and could not at that time be recovered; but a few daies after, the Master Carpenter taking with him a hundred labourers, went and weighed it up; but having carted it ready to bring away, was set upon by eight hundred French; and the most of his company slain: the Gun was taken by the French, and carried to Bulloigne. In the French Army were to the number of eleven thousand Footmen, and four thousand Horse; whereof were Captains, the Lord De la Palaye, the Lord De Priennes, the Duke De Longueville, the Earl of Saint Paul, the Lord of Floranges, the Lord of Clermont, and Richard de la Poole an English man, Son to John Duke of Suffolk. The Armies were come within two miles one of another, and some light skirmishes passed between them, specially one; on a day called the dry Wednesday, for the day was wonderful hot, and the King with his Army stood in order of Battel, from six a clock in the morning, till three in the afternoon: after this, the King removed towards Terwyn; and as the Army marched, another of the Kings Bombards of Iron, called the Red Gun, was overthrown in a lane, and there left; which the French understanding, went with a great power to fetch it away, as they had done the other; but the Lord Berners, Captain of the English Pioners, prevented them; and though set upon by the French to the number of nine or ten thousand, yet by the valour of the Earl of Essex, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, with the bold adventures of Sir William Tyler, and Sir John Sharp, they recovered it, and brought it safe to the Camp. On the fourth of August King Henry came before the City of Terwyn, where he strongly fortified himself with Ordinance, and other Warlike defences. In which mean time, the Captain of Bulloigne, knowing that many of the Garrison of Callice were gone with the King, thought to take advantage of their absence, and do some great exploit upon Callice; and thereupon with a thousand men, came to Newnham Bridge, and killing the Watchmen, took it; but afterward some of his company going to fetch Booties, and coming so near the Walls of Callice, that they were descried; about sixcore Coopers and other Artificers issued forth, and driving them back, recovered again Newnham Bridge, and took divers of their prisoners; especially when the Gate of Callice, called Bulloigne Gate, was opened, and that Colepepper the under-Marshal, with two hundred Archers issued forth, and joyined with them: The French prisoners were brought to Callice, and there sold in open Market; amongst others, a Cooper of the Town of Callice, bought a prisoner that dwelt in Bulloigne, and had of the prisoner for his ransom, a hundred Crowns; when the money was paid, the French man prayed the Cooper for his ransom, delivered, and to conduct him out of danger; the Cooper was content, and went himself alone with Whilst King Henry lay thus at the siege of Terwyn, on the eleventh of August the Emperor Maximilian was come to Ayre; which King Henry understanding, went and met him between Ayre and the Camp, where with great complements they saluted each other; but their complements were broken off by the extreme foul weather which happened that day: the morrow after, the Emperor Maximilian came from Ayre to the Kings Camp, wearing a Cross of Saint George, as the Kings Souldier, and receiving wages of him for service, an hundred Crowns a day. An honour never done to any King of England before; and yet was no disparagement to the Emperor; for he was royally received, and lodged in a Tent of cloth of gold; that as no Emperor before had ever been souldier to a King; so no souldier before was ever lodged in such a Tent. At this time the City of Terwyn, being in some distress for want of victuals; the French King appointed all his Horsemen to the number of eight thousand, to see victuals by any means conveyed into it; the charge of which Convoy was committed to Mountier De Priennes; but King Henry by advice of the Emperor Maximilian had made Bridges to pass his men over the River, to the other side of the Town, where was easiest access; in such sort, that when the French Convoy came with their victuals, and thought to have entered the Town, they found the English Army there ready to resist them; whereupon a fierce battel was fought between them: but in conclusion the French were put to flight, and fled so fast, that from thence it was called the battel of Spurs, for that they used more their spurs in running away, than their Launces in fighting. In this battel, the Duke of Longueville, the Lord of Clermont, Captain Bayard, and others, to the number of twelve score were taken prisoners, and all brought to the Kings presence; with six Standards that were likewise taken. After the battel, the King made Sir John Pechye Banneret, and John Carre Knight, who had both of them done great service in this encounter. King Henry having obtained this victory against the French Horsemen, and hindered the Town of Terwyn from relief of victuals, and wishal plying his battery more fiercely then before; made the Townsmen soon fall to desire compolition; and upon condition that the souldiers may depart with Horse and Armour, they yielded up the Town into the Kings hands. This was done on the eighteenth of August, and the Earl of Shrewsbury entered the Town the same night; and set up the Banner of Saint George in the highest place of it, in sign of Victory, and swore all the Townsmen to be true Subjects to the King of England. The four and twentieth of August, the King himself entered the Town, and dined in the Bishops Palace, where it was resolved, that the Walls and Fortifications of Terwyn should be razed, and the Town burnt all but the Cathedral Church and the Palace; all the Ordinance was sent to Ayre, to be kept there to the Kings use.

After this it was concluded, that the King should lay siege to the City of Tourney; whereupon he set forward in three battels; the Earl of Shrewsbury led the Vanguard; the King and the Emperor, the Battail; and the Lord Chamberlain the Rereward. In this order the Kings Army marched forwards towards Tourney; by the way, he went and visited the young Prince of Castile, and the Lady Margaret, Governess of the Prince, in the Town of Liste, where with all Magnificence, or rather indeed Reverence, he was entertained; and after he had stayed there three days, he took his leave, and being gone a mile and somewhat more out of the Town, he asked where his Camp lay, and no man there could tell the way, and guide they had none; the night was so dark and mistie; by chance at last they met with a victualer coming from the Camp, who was their guide and conducted them to it. By which we may see, to what distress a great Prince may be brought by a little over-sight.

On the one and twentieth day of September, the King removed his Camp towards Tourney, and being come within three miles of the Town, he sent Garter King of Arms to summon the Town; but they, though they had but few men of war amongst them, yet stood upon their guard; whereupon the King begirt it on all sides, and made such fierce batteries upon it, that though it were written on the gates of the Town, graven in stone, Jamais tu ne as perdu ton Pucelage; thou hast never lost thy Maidenhead; yet now they were glad to lose it: Tourney is delivered up to King Henry. and in conclusion they sent a Trumpet to require a Parley, and then sued for mercy, and yielded it up; and paid ten thousand pounds sterling besides for redemption of their liberties: and then Master Thomas Woolsey, the Kings Almoner, calling before him all the Citizens young and old, swore them to the King of England; the number of whom was fourscore thousand. This done, the King entered into Tourney, and calling into his presence Edward Guilford, William Fitzwilliam, John Danse, William Tyler, John Sharpe, William Hussy, John Savage, Christopher Garnish, and some other valiant Gentlemen; he gave to them the order of Knighthood; and then remembering the great entertainment the Prince of Castile and the Lady Margaret had given him at Liste, he would not be behinde them in such Courtship; and thereupon invited them solemnly to his City of Tourney, whom at their coming he brought into the Town in great triumph: during their abode in Tourney, amongst other complements of entertainment, there was had a Juits, where the King and the Lord Liste answered all comers: after the Juits, King Henry makes a solemn Juits in a Mask, all richly apparelled with Bonnets of gold: and when they had passed passed the time at their pleasures, the garments of the Maskers were cast off amongst the Ladies, A take them that could. This was King Henries disposition, that he could not forbear Revelling in the midst of his Arms; and Ladies must be entertained as well as Souldiers. And here Maximilian the Emperour finding the French Forces to be but weak, periwades King Henry to proceed on and pursue his victories: but he being young and of a quiet disposition, and considering with himself that he had not entred the war for any cause of his own, but to revenge the injuries done to the Pope: and thinking by this already done, the French sufficiently lesson'd to acknowledge their error: and the rather, for that Winter was now drawing on; he resolv'd to put this end to the war: and so taking his leave of the Emperour; and leaving Sir Edward Poyning; Governor of Towney, he returned to Calice; and from thence into England: and then rode in Post to the Queen at Richmond.

The King of Scots invades the English borders, but is repelled.

Whilst King Henry was thus busied in his war with France, the King of Scots, though his Brother-in-law, yet incited by the French King, and taking advantage of King Henries absence, assembled his people to invade England; but before his whole power could come together, the Lord Humes his Chamberlain with seven or eight thousand men entred the borders; but as he was returning with a great booty of Cattle, in a field over-grown with Broom, called Milfield, he was encountered by Sir Edward Bulmer, having with him not above a thousand men; who lying in that field in ambush, broke out upon him, and put him to flight, with the slaughter of five or six hundred of his company, and four hundred taken prisoners; the Lord Humes himself escaped by flight, but his Banner was taken; and this, by the Scots was called, the ill Ride. In the mean time the whole power of Scotland was assembled, no fewer then one hundred thousand men; though Buchanan in favour of his Countrey, saith, not the fifth part of that number; and with these, King James approaching the Borders, and coming to Norham Castle, laid siege unto it, which for want of Powder, was soon delivered up unto him. But by this time the Earl of Surrey, Lieutenant of the North parts, had assembled an Army of six and twenty thousand men; to whom also soon after his Son the Lord Admiral, with one thousand expert Souldiers came and joyned: and now having many great Lords and Knights in his Army, he appointed to every one their station; and then was informed, that King James being removed six miles from Norham, lay embattelling upon a great Mountain called Flodden, where it was impossible to come near him, but with great disadvantage; for at the foot of the hill, on the left hand, was a great marsh ground full of reeds and water, on the right hand was a River called Till, so swift and deep that it was not passable; on the backside were such craggy Rocks and thick Woods, that there was no assailing him on that part; the forefront of his Camp he had fenced with his great Ordinance. Being in such a hold, the Earl of Surrey found there was no possibility of a Battail, unless he could draw him from the Hill; whereupon he called a Councell, by which it was determined to send Rouge-Cross Pursuivant at Arms with a Trumpet to the King of Scots to let him know, that he was ready on Friday following to give him Battail, if he would abide it; whereunto the King of Scots by his Pursuivant Ilay, made answer, that at the day prefixed he should find him ready for Battail as he desired, that he would willingly have come to such a match if he had been at Edenburgh; but though he made this answer, yet he would not leave the strong hold he was in, but kept himself still upon the Hill; at last, Thomas Lord Howard, Son and Heir to the Earl of Surrey, having viewed the Countrey round about, declared to his Father, that if he would fetch but a small compass, and come with his Army on the back of his Enemies, he should enforce the Scottish King, to come down out of his strength, or else stop him from receiving of victuals or any other thing out of Scotland. This counsel of the Lord Howard his Father followed, and King James perceiving what their meaning was, thought it stood not with his honour to be fore-stalled out of his own Realm, and thereupon immediately raised his Camp, and got to another Hill, but not so steep as the other; which the Earl of Surrey perceiving, he determined to mount it, and to fight with the Scots, before they should have leisure to fortifie their Camp; and herewith making a short Speech, for encouragement of his Souldiers, he divided his Army into Battails; the Vanguard was led by the Lord Howard, to whom was joyned as a Wing, Sir Edward Howard; the middle-ward was led by the Earl himself, and the Rear-ward was by Sir Edward Stanley; the Lord Dacres with a number of Horsemen was set apart by himself, to succour where need should be; the Ordinance was placed in the Front, and in other places, as was thought most convenient: and in this order they march forward towards the Scots. On the other side King James reckoning upon the benefit of the Hill, thought the English half mad, to venture a Battail upon such disadvantage; and thereupon making a speech to encourage his Souldiers, who were of themselves so forward, that they needed no encouraging, he divided the Battails in this manner; the main Battail he led himself, to which he appointed two Wings; the right led by the Earls of Huntley, Crawford and Montrose; the left by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, together with the Lord Humes Lord Chamberlain: and so confident they were of Victory, that the King first, and after all the Lords and meaner men, put away their Horses, as thinking they should not need them; which confidence was afterward their undoing; for when the Battail being joyned, Sir Edward Howard in getting up the Hill, was so assaulted by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, that he was left almost alone, and in manifest peril to be slain; in comes the Lord Dacres with his Horsemen and trod under foot the Scottish Battail of Speers on foot, which he could not have done, if they had kept their Horses. And this part of the Scottish Army being led by the Earls of Crawford and Montrose, they were both of them slain, and the whole Battail put to flight. In another part also Sir Edward Stanley did the like, upon the Battail led by the Earls of Lenox and Argyle, putting it to flight, with the slaughter also of these two Earls. King James notwithstanding, maintained the fight still with great resolution, till Sir Adam Forman his Standard-bearer was beaten down; and then not fainting, though despairing of success, he rushed into the thickest of his Enemies, amongst whom he was beaten down and slain; and to make his death the more honourable, there died with him three Bishops (whereof one was Alexander Archbishop of Saint Andrews, the Kings bafe Son) two Abbots, twelve Earls, and seventeen Lords, of Knights and Gentlemen very many, in all about eight thousand, and almost as many taken prisoners (as Paulus Jovius saith) amongst whom was Sir William Scot Chancellour to the said King, and Sir George Forman his Serjeant Porter; the Lord Hume and the Earl of Huntley got Horses and escaped. Neither was the Battail without blood to the English; for there was slain at least a thousand, and (that which in a Defeat was strange) many also taken prisoners; for many in pursuing the Scots, went rashly so far, that they knew not which way to return, and by Bands of Scots that had not fought that day, were set upon and taken. When the field was done, the Lord General called to him certain Lords and Gentlemen, and made them Knights, as Sir Edward Howard his Son, the Lord Scroope, Sir William Percy, Sir Edward George, and others. This Battail was fought on Friday the ninth of September, in the year 1513, called by some Brumflon, by some Flodden Field. King James here slain was the same that had married the Lady Margaret eldest daughter of King Henry the Seventh, and Sister to the present King Henry; and might have enjoyed many happy daies, if he had kept himself firm to his alliance; but being carried away with the inveterate spleen between the two Nations, and propension to France, he ended his life, though honourably, yet miserably under many wounds. It is a very memorable, but scarce credible thing, which (from the mouth of a very credible person who saw it) George Buchanan relates concerning this King; that intending to make war with England, a certain old man of venerable aspect, and clad in a long blew garment, came unto him, and leaning familiarly upon the chair where the King sat, said, I am sent unto thee O King, to give thee warning, that thou proceed not in the war thou art about; for if thou do, it will be thy ruine: and having so said, he pressed through the company, and vanished out of sight; for by no inquiry it could be known what became of him. But the King was too resolute to be frightened with Phantasms, and no warning could divert his Destiny, which had not been Destiny if it could have been diverted. The day after the Battail, his Body, though disfigured with wounds, was known by the Lord Dacres and others, to be his; and thereupon bowelled, embalmed, and wrapped in lead, was brought to the Monastery of Sheen in Surrey, and there interred; but at the dissolution of that House was taken up and thrown into a wattle room amongst timber and stone; which John Stow saith, he so saw, and further relateth, that the servants of Lancelot Young, Glazier to Queen Elizabeth, being at Sheen, in new Glazing the windows, either upon a foolish pleasure, or desire of the lead, cut the head from the rest; but smelling the sweet perfumes of the Balsam, gave it to their Master; who opening the lead, found therein the head of a man, retaining favour, though the moisture were clean dried up, whose hair both of head and beard was red: which afterward, he caused to be buried at St. Michaels Church in Woodstreet, where he dwelled. But notwithstanding this relation of Stow; John Lesley Bishop of Rosse affirmeth, that it was held for certain, the Body thus found, was the Body of the Lord Bauchard slain in that Battail. Buchanan saith, of Alexander Elphinstoun, who in countenance and stature was like the King; and that King James was seen alive the same night at Kelso, whence he passed to Hierusalem, and there spent the rest of his daies in holy contemplation; but howsoever it was, he was never seen any more in Scotland.

A Vision that appeared to King James dehorting him from the battail.

King Henry being now returned from Towney into England, and finding the great services done in his absence against the Scots; on the day of the Purification of our Lady, at Lambeth he created the Earl of Surrey Duke of Norfolk, with an augmentation of the Arms of Scotland; Sir Charles Brandon Viscount Lisle, he created Duke of Suffolk, the Lord Howard high Admiral, he made Earl of Surrey, Sir Charles Somerset Lord Herbert his chief Chamberlain Earl of Worcester, and shortly after Sir Edward Stanley he made Lord Monteagle; and in March following, Master Thomas Woolsey his Almoner, was made Bishop of Lincoln. Here before we go further, it will be fit to say something of this man, that he be not a rub afterward in the way of the Story: He was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, the Son of a Butcher, sent to Oxford by reason of his pregnancy of wit, so soon, that taking there the first degree of Art, he was called the Boy-Bachelor; proceeding in learning, he was made Fellow of Magdalen Colledge in Oxford, and afterward Schoolmaster of the School there; at which time the Marquess Dorset committed three of his Sons to be instructed by him; and having a Benefice fallen in his gift, sent for him one Christmas, and bestowed it upon him; whereof Woolsey going to take possession, at his being there, for what misdemeanour is not delivered, he was by Sir Amias Paulet set by the heels, which afterward he remembered to Sir James his no small trouble, for he made him attend his pleasure five or six years; all which time he lay in the Middle-Temple, where he re-edified the Gate-house next the street very sumptuously; setting the Cardinals Arms upon it, to appease him. After this disgrace he went over-sea, where he fell in acquaintance with Sir John Naphant Treasurer of Callice, and by him was preferred to be King Henry the seventh's Chaplain; and now being by this means in the Kings eye, he so diligently carried himself, that he soon got into the Kings heart. One time it happened, the King had occasion to send a Messenger to the Emperour Maximilian, about a business that required haste; for which employment no man was thought more fit then Woolsey; whereupon, when the King called him, gave him his Errand, and bade him make all speed he could; Woolsey departed from the King at Richmond about noon, and by the next morning was got to Dover, and from thence by noon that day was come to Callice, and by night was with the Emperour; to whom, declaring his Message, and having a present dispatch, he rode that night back to Callice, and the night following came to the Court at Richmond. The next morning he presented himself before the King, who blamed him for not being yet gone, the matter requiring haste; to whom Woolsey answered, that he had been with the Emperour, and had dispatched the business, and for proof shewed the Emperours lines: the King wondered much at his speed, but then asked him if he met not with his Pursuivant, whom he sent after to advertise him of a special matter he had forgotten; whereof Woolsey answered, May it please your Grace, I met him yesterday upon the way, but that business I had dispatched before, taking the boldness to do without commission, as knowing it to be of special consequence; for which boldness I humbly intreat your Graces Pardon. The King not only pardoned him, but bestowed presently upon him the Deanery of Lincoln, and soon after made him his Almoner. In this state King Henry the eighth found him, with whom also he grew into such favour, that he made him of his Council; and having won Tourney, made him Bishop of that City; and returning into England, (the Bishoprick of Lincoln falling void by the death of Doctor Smith) made him Bishop of that Diocese. And thus far the story hath now brought him; but soon after he was raised higher; for Doctor Bambridge Archbishop of York dying; he was translated from Lincoln to that See; and that he might not be inferior to the Archbishop of Canterbury, he procured of the Pope to be made Cardinal, and Legat a Latere; and after by the King was made Lord Chancellor of England; and being come to his height of dignity, he so carried himself in Expenses of Household, in number of Retinue, and in all circumstances of State, that no Subject before or since hath in any degree come near him; and if we may say it, he was the first debaucher of King Henry; for to the end he might have the managing of all matters himself, he perswaded the King that he should not need trouble himself with frequenting the Council Table as he did, but take his pleasure, and leave those things to his Council, whereof himself would alwaies give him true Information. This was plausible counsel, and no marvel if it were embraced of a young King, coming from the mouth of so great a Prelate.

In this fifth year of the King, the Citizens of London finding themselves grieved with the inclosures of the common fields about Islington, Hogsdon, and Shorditch, and other places adjoining, went one morning, and threw down all the Hedges, and filled up all the Ditches; whereat though the Kings Council were at first offended, yet the Mayor and City shewed them such reasons, that they rested satisfied, and the fields were never since hedged.

On the nineteenth of May this year, Pope Julius the Second sent to King Henry a Cap of Maintenance and a Sword; and being angry with the King of France, transferred by Authority of the Lateran Council, the title of Christianissimo from him upon King Henry, which with great solemnity was published the Sunday following, in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul; but this solemnity must not pass without Revelling, Masques, and Jests; wherein the King and the Duke of Suffolk were defendants against all comers; who having the Duke of Longueville, and the Lord of Clermont to be spectators, spread the fame of their Chivalry into foreign Nations.

And now the great love that had been long between King Henry and the Flemings, began to abate upon this occasion; King Henry the seventh had concluded a match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Spain; but by reason of her young years, and for want of assurance of Jointure, the match was deferred during his time; but now King Henry the eighth seeing his Sister of convenient years, began to call upon it, and signified so much to the Council of Flanders; but they, whether having other ends, or out of Spanish delays, put him off with excuses, and at last sent him word plainly, they could do nothing in it that year. The King of France had soon Intelligence how much King Henry distasted these Spanish dealings, and meant to make some good use of it, for the ends he began to propose to himself, which were to get the Lady Mary for himself, and thereby procure peace with England, being now old, and weary of the War. And for this purpose he got the new Pope Leo the tenth to be his mediator, and both of them send Embassadors to King Henry, the Pope to perswade him to have peace with France, the French King to treat about a Marriage with the Lady Mary; upon whose Embassages, King Henry partly to satisfy the Pope, and partly to advance his Sister, did not unwillingly hearken to the motions; but whilst this was in working, Prior John (who knew nothing of these intentions) began again to play his pranks; and coming with his Gallies on the coast of Sussex, burnt Brightelmsted, and took away the goods he found in the Village, whereupon the Lord Admiral sent Sir John Walsloppe to Sea, with divers ships, and eight hundred men, who for one village that Prior John burnt in England, burnt one and twenty Villages and Towns in France, to the great honour of himself, and his Country.

And now King Henry by advice of his Council, and specially of Woolsey Bishop of Lincoln, concluded both the peace with France, and the Marriage of his Sister the Lady Mary, with the French King; but yet it stuck a while upon some differences, King Henry demanding Bulloign, and the King

A Peace is concluded with France; and the King of France marries the Lady Mary King Henry's younger Sister.

A King of France Tourney: in conclusion these demands were waved; and the principal conditions were; first concerning the Ladies Jointure, that she should have two and thirty thousand Crowns of yearly revenues if she survived the King; and then concerning this peace, that the French King should pay yearly to King Henry, for five years, one hundred thousand Crowns, & the peace to continue between them during their lives, and a year after, and bound reciprocally to assist each other with ten thousand foot, if the war were by Land, with six thousand if by Sea. All things thus concluded the Lady Mary was brought to Dover by King Henry and his Queen: and on the second of October taking shipping, was conducted by the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquess Dorset, the Bishop of Durham, the Earl of Surrey, the Lord De la Ware, the Lord Berners, the Lord Montague, Sir Maurice Berkeley, Sir John Pechey, Sir William Sands, Sir Thomas Bulleyn, Sir John Carre, and many other Knights and Ladies; but being not past half way over the Sea, their Ships by tempest were dispersed, and the Lady with some jeopardy landed at Bulles, where Sir Christopher Garnish was fain to stand in the water and take her in his arms, and to set her on shore, and there the Duke of Vendosme, with a Cardinal, and many other great States received her. From Bullen the eighth of October, she came to Abbeyle, where the Dauphin received her: on the morrow being Saint Dennis day, she came to Saint Dennis, where the marriage between the King of France and her, was solemnized (though some write it had been solemnized before at Abbeyle.) The fifth of November she was Crowned Queen of France, at which time the Dauphin held the Crown over her head as being too masie for her to wear; and the day following she was received into Paris in most magnificent manner. In honour of whose Marriage and Coronation, the Dauphin had caused a solemn Jests to be proclaimed, which should be kept in Paris the seventh of November. Upon report of this Proclamation in England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset and his four Brothers, the Lord Clinton, Sir Edward Nevill, Sir Giles Cailly, Thomas Cheney, and others obtained leave of the King to be at the challenge, where they all behaved themselves with great valour, but specially the Duke of Suffolk, whose glory the Dauphin so much envied, that he got a Dutch-man the tallest and strongest man in all the Court of France secretly as another person to encounter him, with a purpose to have the Duke foyled; but indeed it turned to his greater honour, for he foyled the Dutch-man in such sort, that when they came to the Barriers, the Duke by main strength took him about the neck, and fo pommelled him about the head, that he made the bloud issue out at his nose: many other Princes and Lords did bravely; and after three daies the Jests ended.

King Henry was not long behind to solemnize it in England also; for at Greenwich the Christmas following, on New-years night, and Twelfth night, he presented such strange and magnificent devices, as had seldom been seen; and the third of February following, he held a solemn Jests, where he and the Marquess Dorset answered all comers, at which time the King brake three and twenty Spears, and threw to the ground one that encountered him both man and Horse.

At this time preparation was making for King Henry in person to go to Callice; there to meet with the French King and Queen, but death hindered the design; for before the next Spring, the first of January the French King died at the City of Paris, fourscore and two daies after his marriage; teaching others by his example, what it is for an old man to marry a young Lady: King Henry hearing of the French Kings death, sent the Duke of Suffolk, and Sir Richard Winkfield, and Doctor West, to bring over the Queen Dowager, according to the Covenants of the marriage; whereupon the Queen was delivered to the Duke by Indenture, who obtaining her good will to be her husband, (which was no hard matter; that had been her first love) wrote to the King her Brother for his consent; whereat the King seemed to stick a while, but at last consented, for he brought her into England unmarried, and then married at his return; but the Duke for more surety married her secretly in Paris, and after having received her Dowry, Apparel and Jewels; came with her to Callice, and there openly married her with great solemnity. At their coming into England, King Henry to shew his contentment with the marriage, in the company of the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset, and the Earl of Essex, all richly apparelled, held a new kind of Jests; and running courses on Horseback in manner Volant, as fast as one could follow another, to the great delight of the beholders.

This year the King being at his Manor of Oke, Woolsey Archbishop of York came and shewed him letters, that he was elected Cardinal; for which dignity he disabled himself; till the King would him to take it upon him, and from thenceforth called him Lord Cardinal; but his Hat and Bull were not yet come; after which Doctor Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Lord Chancellor of England, finding Woolsey being now Cardinal, to meddle more in his office of Chancellourship; then he could well suffer; resigned up the Seal, which the King presently gave to Woolsey. About this time, Cardinal Campeggio was sent by Pope Leo to King Henry, to sollicite him to a War against the Turk, with whom Cardinal Woolsey was joyned in Commission, who hearing of the ragged retinue of his fellow Cardinal, sent store of red cloth to Callice to make them fit followers of so great a Lord: and when Campeggio was landed at Dover, Cardinal Woolsey caused the Gentry of Kent to wait upon him to Blackheath, where he was met and received by the Duke of Norfolk and many Prelates; and there in a Tent of cloth of gold shifted himself into his Cardinals robes. Eight Mules he had laden with necessaries; but Woolsey not thinking them enough for his honour, sent him twelve more. But now see the shame of pride; for in Cheapside his Mules by some mischance overthrew their Carriages riages and Coffers on the ground, whose lids flying open, shewed the world what treasure it was they carried, old Breeches, Boots, and broken Shooes, broken meat, Mary-bones and crufts of Bread; expoling him to the laughter of all the people: yet the Cardinal went joggling on afore with his Croffes, guilt Axe and Mace, unto Pauls Church; and by the way 'had an Oration made him by Sir Thomas More, in name of the City, and then waited on with many Bishops, was conducted to Bath place, where he was lodged for his own particular: he got well by the Journey, for the King gave him the Bishoprick of Salisbury; but the errand he came about, which was to have Aid by money for a War against the Turk, he could not obtain, for it was well known to be but a devise to get money, without any intention of what was pretended.

Margaret Q. of Scots King Henry's Sister comes into England.

It was now the eighth year of King Henry's Reign, when the new league between him and the French King was proclaimed in the City of London: and this year Margaret Queen of Scots eldest Sitter to King Henry, having before married Archibald Douglas Earl of Angus; by reason of dissension among the Lords of Scotland, was glad with her Husband to flee into England, and to seek succour at her Brothers hands; who assigned to her the Castle of Harbottell in Northumberland to reside in; where she was delivered of a Daughter named Margaret. From thence the King sent for her and her Husband to come to his Court, and thereupon the third of May, Queen Margaret riding on a white Palfrey (which the Queen of England had sent her) behind Sir Thomas Parre, came through London to Baynards Castle, and from thence went to Greenwich: but her Husband the Earl of Angus, was secretly before departed into Scotland; which when King Henry heard, he only said it was done like a Scot. And now in honour of his Sisters coming, King Henry the nine and twentieth of May, appointed two solemn daies of Joits; where the King, the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Essex, and Nicholas Carew Esquire, took upon them to answer all comers; amongst others, the King and Sir William Kinston ran together, which Sir William, though a strong and valorous Knight, yet the King overthrew him to the ground: all the rest was performed with no less valour then magnificence. This year died the King of Aragon, Father to the Queen of England; for whom was kept a solemn Obsequie in the Cathedral Church of Pauls; and Queen Margaret after she had been a year in England, required into Scotland.

Twelve hundred

Colleges.

In this year were sent twelve hundred Carpenters and Masons, with three hundred Labourers, to the City of Tourney in France, to build a Castle there, to keep the City in awe. And now the Cardinal being weary of hearing so many causes himself, as were daily brought before him; obtained by the Kings Commission (after the pattern of Moses) divers Under-courts to hear complaints of Suiters: whereof one was kept in Whitehall, another before the Kings Almoner Dokter Stokesley, a third in the Lord Treasurers lodging near the Star-chamber, and the fourth at the Rolls in the afternoon: these Courts for a time were much frequented; but at last, the people perceiving that much delay was used in them, and that sentence given by them bound no man by Law, they thereupon grew weary of them, and resorted to the common Law. By occasion of this Government of the Cardinal, who under colour of Justice, did what he pleased: many great men withdrew themselves from the Court, as first the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Winchester, who went and lived in their Dioceses; then the Duke of Norfolk; and at length the Duke of Suffolk, being run deep into the Kings debt, by reason of his many Employments into France, and his great House-keeping since his marriage with the Kings Sister, hoping the King would have forgiven it, and would no doubt have done it, but that the Cardinal opposed it, to the end the Duke should be the more at his command.

In October this year, Matthew Bishop of Sion commonly called the Cardinal of the Swissers came into England from the Emperor Maximilian, by whose soliciting and Cardinal Woolsey's perswasion, the King lent the Emperor a great sum of money; for Woolsey being angry with the King of France, for detaining the revenues of his Bishoprick of Tourney, perswaded King Henry that the best way to abate the French Kings power, was to furnish the Emperor with money, the better to maintain war against him: and what Woolsey said, was in those daies to King Henry an Oracle.

Hawking.

This year the King kept his Christmas at his Mannor of Greenwich, where on Twelfth night according to his custom, rare devices with great magnificence were presented; after which time the King exercised himself much in Hawking, which was like to have proved no good sport to him; for one time following his Hawk, and leaping over a Ditch with a Pole, the Pole brake; so that if one Edmund Mody a foot-man had not leapt into the water, and lift up his head which he had fallen in, he had been drowned.

An Insurrection in London against strangers; especially Artificers.

In this year also there happened in the City of London, an insurrection against strangers, specially of Artificers, complaining that strangers were permitted to resort hither with their Wares, and to exercise Handy-crafts, to the great hindrance and impoverishing the Kings own Subjects; and not only so, but that they were borne on in many great Insolencies, and wrongs, they offered to the English, as one time it happened, a Carpenter in London called William had bought two Pigeons in Chapp-side, and was about to pay for them, when a French man took them out of his hand, saying, they were no meat for a Carpenter: well (said William) I have bought them, and I will have them; nay (said the French man) I will have them for my Lord

A Lord Ambassadour; hereupon they grew to words, and complaint was made to the French Ambassadour, who so aggravated the matter to the Maior, that the Carpenter was sent to prison, and when Sir John Baker sued to the Ambassadour for him, he answered, By the body of God, the English knave was worthy to lose his life for denying any thing to a French man; and other answer he could have none. Many like and worse Insolencies were offered by strangers; which one John Lincoln a Broker drew into Bill, and prevailed with Doctor Beale, Preacher on Easter Tuesday at the Spittle to read it openly in the Pulpit, which so stirred up many, that strangers could hardly pass the streets, but were stricken, and sometimes beaten down. At last, one evening, many Prentises and others assembling, rifled some strangers houses, and much mischief was like to be done: but by the care of the Maior and Aldermen, and by the industry of Robert Brooke Recorder, and Sir Thomas More, that had been Under-Sheriffe of London, they were gotten to be quiet, and many of the disturbers were sent to prison, whereof Lincoln and twelve other were hanged, four hundred more in their shirts, bound in ropes, and halters about their necks (and thereupon called the black wagon) were brought to Westminster, where the King himself late that day; and when the Cardinal had charged them with the greatness of their offence; they all cried, Mercy, Mercy: and then the King by the mouth of the Cardinal, pardoned them all; which clemency purchased the King no small love amongst the people.

How pacified.

In his ninth year, in June, King Henry had many Ambassadours at his Court; for whose entertainment he prepared a costly Joits; himself and twelve more against the Duke of Suffolk and other twelve. The King had on his head a Ladies sleeve full of Diamonds, and perhaps something else of the Ladies in his heart, which made him perform his courtes with the applause of all beholders. This year, by reason of a sweating sickness Michuemas Term was adjourned; and the year following, Trinity Term was held one day at Oxford, and then adjourned again to Westminster.

An. Reg. 9.

About this time Cardinal Woolsey obtained of Pope Leo, authority to dispense with all offences against the Spiritual Laws; by virtue whereof he set up a Court, and called it, The Court of the Legat, in the which he proved Testaments, and heard Causes; to the great hindrance of all the Bishops of the Realm; and to the debauching of Priests and Religious Persons, who relying upon his greatness, took such a liberty of licentiousness to themselves, that none was more disorderly then those that were in Orders: and supposing perhaps, they might lawfully commit such sins themselves, as they forgave to others. And indeed the Cardinals carriage exceeded all bounds of moderation; for when he said Mass, he made Dukes and Earls to serve him of Wine, with a say taken, and to hold the basin at the Lavatory: and when the Archbishop of Canterbury, writing a letter to him, subscribed, Your Brother William of Canterbury, he took it in great dudgeon to be termed his Brother.

It was now the tenth year of King Henry's Reign, when the King of France, longing much to have Tourney restored to him: by great gifts and greater promises, won the Cardinal Woolsey, to move the King in it; who upon his perswasions, was contented to be treated withall about it; to which the King of France sent the Lord Bouquet high Admiral of France, and the Bishop of Paris, who in their attendance, having above fourscore Gentlemen, and with their servants and all, above twelve hundred, arrived in England; and on Munday the seven and twentieth of September, were met at Black-heath by the Earl of Surrey high Admiral of England, attended likewise with above five hundred Gentlemen and others, who conducted them to London, where they were lodged at Merchant-Taylors Hall: The last of September, the Ambassadours went to the King at Greenwich, where after long communication, an Agreement was at last concluded under pretence of a marriage to be had between the Dauphin of France and the Lady Mary Daughter to the King of England; that in name of her marriage money, Tourney should be delivered to the French King, he paying to the King of England, for the Castle he had made in that City, six hundred thousand Crowns in twelve years, but fifty thousand yearly: and if the Marriage should chance not to take effect, then that Tourney should be again restored to the King of England for performance of which Articles, Hostages should be delivered: namely, Monsieur de Montmorency, Monsieur de Montpelier, Monsieur de Noy, and Monsieur Morret; and moreover, the French King should pay to the Cardinal of England a thousand Marks yearly, in recompence of his Revenues, received before of his Bishoprick of Tourney: All things thus concluded, the Cardinal made to the Ambassadours a solemn Banquet, and after presented them with a stately Mummery.

A Treaty be-

Kings of France and England, to have Tourney
delivered back, and upon what conditions.

The eighth of October, the King feasted them at Greenwich, and at night presented a stately Mask of Knights and Ladies, with rare devices and great magnificence. The next day Sir Thomas Euxem Maior of London, feasted them at Goldsmiths Hall, and then delivering their four Hostages, they took their leave. At whose departure the King gave to the Admiral of France, a garnish of gilt Vessel, a pair of covered Basons gilt, twelve great gilt Boles, four pair of great gilt Pots, a standing Cup of Gold, garnished with great Pearls, and to some other he gave Plate, to some other Chains of Gold, to some rich Apparel; to the great commendation of his liberality. Shortly after their departure, the Earl of Worcester, Lord Chamberlain, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord of Saint John, Sir Nicholas, Sir John Peck, and Sir Thomas Bullen, as Ambassadours from the King of England, accompanied with Knights, Gentlemen, and others to the number of above four hundred, sailed over to Calles, and from thence went to Paris; where after Royal entertainment by the King, with divers Masks and stately shews, they took their leaves, and rode to Tourney to see the City delivered to the French men, on the eighth of February, to to the great grief of the English Garrison. After the English Ambassadors were returned, A King Henry to cheer up the four French Hostages, left here for performance of Covenants, on the seventh of May, presented a solemn and stately Mask, wherein himself, the Duke of Suffolk and French Queen were Actors: and on the eighth of March following was a solemn Juits holden, and with great magnificence performed.

The Emperour Maximilian dyeth. Charles King of Castile is elected in his place, called Charles the fifth.

Young Gentlemen after the French fashion, being over-familiar with the Kings are banished the Court.

A Mask of all Lords.

An Enterview agreed upon between the two Kings of France and England.

The Emperour Charles comes into England.

The two Kings meet in so magnificent manner, that the place was called the Camp of cloth of Gold.

In the eleventh year of King Henry's Reign died the Emperour Maximilian, for whom, the King caused a solemn Obsequie to be kept in Pauls Church. After whose death the French King and the King of Spain, endeavoured by sundry plots each of them to get the Empire; but in conclusion, Charles King of Castile, (afterwards called Charles the fifth) was elected Emperour; for joy whereof a solemn Mass was sung at Pauls, the seventh of July, at which were present the Cardinal Campeius, the Cardinal of York, the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolk, and Suffolk, with the Ambassadors of Spain, France, Venice, and Scotland: And this year the King kept Saint Georges Feast at Windsor, with great solemnity.

At this time divers young Gentlemen that had been in France, after the manner of that Country, carried themselves so familiarly with the King; that the Lords of his Council thought it a disparagement to him: and thereupon, with his leave first obtained, they banished them the Court: and in their places brought in more stayed and graver men: namely, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Richard Jerningham, Sir Richard Weston, and Sir William Kingston.

In the summer of this year, the Queen lying at her Mannour of Havering in Essex, desired the King to bring thither the four Hostages of France, to whom she made a Royal Banquet, and in September following, the King lying at his Mannour of New-hall in Essex, otherwise called Beaulieu, where he had newly built a stately Mansion, invited the Queen and the French Hostages thither, where after a sumptuous Banquet, he presented them with an extraordinary Mask; for the Maskers were the Duke of Suffolk, and Earl of Essex, the Marquess Dorset, the Lord Abergavenny, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Richard Weston, and Sir William Kingston, the youngest of whom was fifty years old at least, that the Ladies might see what force they had to make age young again.

At this time, the French King was very desirous to see the King of England, with whom he had entered into such a league of alliance, and to that end made means to the Cardinal, that there might be an Enterview between them at some convenient place: to which the Cardinal, notwithstanding much to satisfy the French King, as to shew his own greatness in France, easily condescended; and thereupon perswaded King Henry, how necessary it was, that such an Enterview should be; and then were sent to Guyenne, under the rule of Sir Edward Belknap, some say three thousand, but Godwyn faith, eleven hundred; whereof three hundred Maçons, six hundred Carpenters, two hundred Painters, Glaziers, and other Artificers, who spent two months in erecting the building builded on the Plain before the Castle of Guyenne, a most stately Palace of Timber, curiously garnished without and within: whither both the Kings in June next, following, agreeing to come and to answer all comers at the Tilt, Tournies and Barriers, whereof Proclamation was made in the Court of England, by Orleance King of Arms of France, and in the Court of France by Clatius, King of Arms of England: whilst these things were preparing on Candlemas Even, as the King and Queen were come from Even-song at their Mannour of Greenwich; suddenly there blew a Trumpet, and then entered into the Queens Chamber, four Gentlemen, who brought with them a wagon, in which sat a Lady richly apparelled; which Lady acquainted the King, that the four Gentlemen there present, were come for the love of their Ladies, to answer all comers at the Tilts on a day by the King to be appointed; which day was thereupon appointed on Shrove-tuesday next ensuing, where they all behaved themselves with great valour, to the great delight of the King and Queen.

By this time King Henry was ready for his journey into France, and so removing from his Mannour of Greenwich, on Friday the five and twentieth of May, he with his Queen arrived at Canterbury, where he meant to keep his Whitsuntide. At which time the Emperour Charles returning out of Spain, arrived on the coast of Kent, where by the Vice-Admiral of England, Sir William Fitz-Villiams, he was conducted to land, and there met and received by the Lord Cardinal in great state. After which the King himself rode to Dover, to welcome him: and on Whitsunday early in the morning conducted him to Canterbury, where they spent all the Whitsuntide in great joy and solace. The chief cause that moved the Emperour at this time to come on land, was to have disswaded the King from any Enterview with the French King: but when he saw him so forward in that journey, he then only endeavoured to perswade him, that he should put no trust in the French Kings words, and with great gifts and promises, prevailed with the Cardinal to joyn with him in this perswasion. The last of May, the Emperour took his leave, and the same day, the King made sail from Dover and landed at Callice, together with the Queen and many Lords and Ladies. The fourth of June the King and Queen removed from Callice, to his Princely Lodging beside the Town of Guyenne, the most Royal Building that ever was seen; likewise Francis the French King had his lodging prepared close to the Town of Ard, in a strange but most magnificent fashion. Both Kings had given power and authority to the Cardinal to affirm and confirm, bind or unbind, whatsoever should be in difference between them; no less an honour to the Cardinal then a confidence in the Kings. On Thursday the seventh of June, the Kings met in the vale of Andren to magnificently attired, both themselves and all their followers, that from thence it was called the Camp of cloth of Gold. Here they spent that day in loving complements; and at night departed, the one to Guyenne, the other to Ard. On Saturday the ninth

A of June were set up in a place within the English pale two Trees of honour, with stately rooms and stages for the Queens, and thither the two Kings came, most Royally accompanied; where in most magnificent manner they performed Acts of Valour, both on foot and horseback; and after them all the great Lords both of France and England did the like: this solemnity of Juits and Masks was continued to the four and twentieth day of June; at which time, the Kings and Queens took leave of each other; the French King and Queen removed to Ard; the King and Queen of England to Callice, where he remained till the tenth of July, and then riding toward Graveling, was by the way met by the Emperour, and by him conducted thither, and there in Graveling manner entertained; whereof when the French King heard, he began from that day forward, to have King Henry in a kind of jealousy, as though to love him and the Emperour both were inconsistent, and could not stand together. On Wednesday the eleventh of July, the Emperour and his Aunt the Lady Margaret Dutcheffs of Savoy, came with the King of England to the Town of Callice, and there continued with Feasting, Dancing and Masking, till the fourteenth of July. In which time, all the Articles of the league Tripartito, between the Emperour and the Kings of England and France were reviewed; to which the King of France had so fully condescended, that he had sent Monsieur de Roche to the Emperour with Letters of credence; that in the word of a Prince he would inviolably observe and keep them all: all which notwithstanding, he dispensed with his conscience afterward, in breaking them all. On Saturday July 14. the Emperour took his leave and went to Graveling; the King with his Queen returned into England.

C It was now the twelfth year of King Henry's Reign; when being returned from Callice, he kept his Christmas at Greenwich with great magnificence; and on Twelfth-day he and the Earl of Devonshire, maintained a solemn Juits against all comers.

The Cardinal had long born a grudge against the Duke of Buckingham, for speaking certain words in his disgrace, and now hath made his way for revenge. It is said, that the Duke once holding the Baton to the King; the Cardinal when the King had done, presently dipped his hands in the same water; which the Duke disdaining, shed the water in his Shoes; with which the Cardinal incensed, threatened him that he would sit upon his skirts. The Duke to shew that the King might take notice of the Cardinals malice, came the next day to Court richly apparelled, but without skirts to his Doublet. The King demanding, what he meant by that strange D fashion; he answered readily, that it was done by way of prevention; for now the Cardinal should not sit upon his skirts. But this Jelt did the Duke no good; for the Earl of Surrey, Lord Admiral, who had married the Dukes Daughter, the Cardinal had caused to be sent Deputy into Ireland; and the Earl of Northumberland, the Dukes special friend, he had caused upon certain suggested crimes to be imprisoned; so as the Duke having his friends sequestered from him, he lay now open to accusations, and accusations shall not long be wanting; for the Duke having some time before put from him in displeasure, one Charles Knevet, that had been his Surveyor, and inward with him; him the Cardinal gets to him, to see what he could get out of him against the Duke. And whether it was out of desire of revenge, or out of hope of reward, or that the matter was so indeed, this Knevet confessed to the Cardinal, that the Duke had once fully determined to make away the King; being brought into a hope to be King himself by a vain Prophecy, which one Nicholas Hopkins (a Monk of an house of the Charter Order, besides Bristow, called Henton) sometimes his Confessor, had opened to him; and as for the Cardinal, that he had often heard the Duke swear, he would punish him fondly for his manifold misdoings. And now had the Cardinal matter enough for Accusation, which he so aggravated to the King, that the King bade him do with him according to Law. Hereupon the Duke is apprehended, and brought to the Tower by Sir Henry Morney, Captain of the Guard, the fifteenth of April, and shortly after in Guild-hall before Sir John Brugge, then Lord Maior, was indicted of divers points of high Treason: the substance whereof was, that in the second year of the Kings Reign, and at divers times before and after, he had imagined and compassed the Kings death at London and at Thornbury in Gloucestershire; and that in the sixth year of the Kings Reign, he went in person to the Priory of Henton, and there had conference with the foresaid Nicholas Hopkins, who told him he should be King; and that he had often said to the Lord Abergavenny who had married his daughter, that if King Henry dyed without issue, he would look to have the Crown himself. Upon these points, he was arraigned in Westminster-hall, before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting then as high Steward of England, the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset, the Earls of Worcester, Devonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Oxford and Darby, the Lords of Saint Johns de la VVare, Fitz-water, VViloughby, Brook, Cobham, Herbert and Morley. The Duke pleaded for himself till he sweat again, but all booted not; for by these Peers he was found guilty and condemned, and so on Friday the seventeenth of May, was led by John Keyme and John Skevinton Sheriffs of London to the Scaffold on Tower-hill, and there beheaded. The Augustine Friars took his body and head, and buried them. This Edward Bohun Duke of Buckingham was the last High Contable of England (the greatest place next the High Steward, in the Kingdom) whose Power extended to retrain some actions of the King. He was also Earl of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton: he married Elianor the Daughter of Henry Earl of Northumberland, and had Issue, Henry Lord Stafford, (Father to Henry Lord Stafford late living) and three Daughters, Elizabeth married to Thomas Howard Earl of Surrey, Katherine married to Ralph Nevill Earl of Westmerland, and Mary married to George Nevill Lord of Abergavenny.

King Henry for writing a Book against Luther, hath the Title given him to be Defender of the Faith.

Upon differences between the Kings of England and France, the French Ambassador is commanded to keep his house.

In this mean while, a new War was begun between the Emperour and the King of France; for composing whereof, the Cardinal of York was sent attended with the Earl of Worcester, Lord Chamberlain, the Lord of Saint John, the Lord Ferrers, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Ely, the Primate of Armagh, Sir Thomas Bullen, Sir John Pechy, Sir John Hufsey, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Henry Guilford, and many other Knights, Gentlemen and Doctors. On the twelfth of July he arrived at Calice, whither came to him the Chancellour of France, and the Count de Polix attended with four hundred Horse, as Ambassadors from the French King; and from the Emperour the like, with commissions to treat and conclude of Peace. There were also Ambassadors from the Pope, whom the Cardinal moved to have the Pope to be a party also in their League, but they wanting Commission, Letters were presently sent to Rome about it, and in the time till answer might be had, the Cardinal went to Bruges, to speak with the Emperour, with whom having stayed thirteen daies, after most Royal entertainment, he returned back to Calice, and then fell presently to the Treaty of Peace, with the French Commissioners, but was colder in the matter then he was before, as having had his edge taken off by some dealing with the Emperour, so as nothing was concluded; but that the Fishermen of both the Princes might freely fish on the Seas without disturbance, till the end of February following; whereof he sent advertisement to both the Princes; to the Emperour by the Lord of Saint John and Sir Thomas Bullen; to the French King by the Earl of Worcester and the Bishop of Ely. During all which time of the Cardinals stay in Calice, all Writs and Patents were there by him sealed, and no Sheriff could be chosen for lack of his presence, having the Great Seal there with him, and full power in things, as if the King had been there in person. Before he returned, he made a new League wit the Emperour, and intimated to the French King, that he doubted the King of England would not hereafter be so much his friend, as heretofore he had been; whereas, though the King of France were much offended, yet he signified by his Letters (perhaps dissemblingly) that he would continue the King of Englands friend as much as ever: only he inveighed against the Cardinal, as a man of no truth, and withdrew many Penions which he had before given to some English. Presently upon this, was Tourney besieged, by the Lord Hugh de Moncada a Spaniard, and though the French King sent great Forces to succour it; yet it was rendred up to the Emperour the last of November, in the thirteenth year of King Henries Reign.

This year Pope Leo died the first of December, suspected to be poysoned by Barnabie Ades, his Chamberlain, whose Office was alwaies to give him drink. After whose death, Doctor Pace was sent to Rome, to make friends in the behalf of the Cardinal of York; who was brought into a hope through the Kings favour to be elected Pope; but that hope was soon quailed; for before Doctor Pace could get to Rome, Adrian the sixth was chosen Pope. This Doctor Pace was a very learned and Religious man, yet thorow crosses in his employment, fell mad and died; in whose place of employment succeeded Doctor Stephen Gardiner.

On the second of February, King Henry being then at Greenwich, received a Bull from the Pope, whereby he had the Title given him to be Defender of the Christian Faith, for him and his Successors for ever; which Title was ascribed to him, for writing a Book against Luther as it was given out: but thought to be written by Sir Thomas Moore, or by Fisher Bishop of Rochester; of which Book (saith Holingshead) I will only say thus much, that King Henry in his Book, is reported to rage against the Devil and Antichrist, to cast out his foam against Luther, to raise out the Name of the Pope, and yet to allow his Law; which Book Luther answered with as little respect to the King, as the King had done to him.

In this mean time, many displeasures grew between the two Kings of England and France, specially two: one, that French men seized upon English Ships as they passed: for remedy whereof, one Christopher Cee an expert Sea-man, was sent with six Ships to safeguard the Merchants. Another, that the Duke of Albany was returned into Scotland, contrary to that which was Covenanted by the League, which though the King of France denied to be done with his privy, yet King Henry knew the Duke of Albany had Commission from the French King to return, which did the more exasperate him; and hereupon were Mutters made in England, and a note taken of what substance all men were.

This year died the Lord Brook, Sir Edward Poynings Knight of the Garter, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Edward Belknappe, all valiant Captains, suspected to have been poysoned at a Banquet made at Ard, when the two Kings met last.

At this time, Owen Dowglas Bishop of Dunkell, fled out of Scotland into England, because the Duke of Albany being come thither, had taken upon him the whole government of the King and Kingdom; whereupon Clarentiaux the Herald was sent into Scotland, to command the Duke of Albany to avoid that Realm; which he refusing, the Herald was commanded to defie him. Thereupon the French King seized all English mens goods in Bourdeaux, and imprisoned their persons; and retained not only the money to be paid for the restitution of Tourney, but also withheld the French Queens Dower: whereof, when King Henry understood, he called the French Ambassador residing in England, to give account thereof; who though he gave the best reasons he could to excuse it, yet was commanded to keep his house; and the French Hoitages remaining here, for the money to be paid for the delivery of Tourney, were restrained of their liberty, and committed to the custody of the Lord of Saint John, Sir Thomas Lovell, Sir Andrew Windsor, and Sir Thomas Nevile; each of them to keep one; and withall, all French men in London were committed to prison, and put to their Fines; and all Scotch men much more. There were then also sent

A sent to Sea under the conduct of Sir William Fitz-Williams Vice-Admiral, eight and twenty great Ships, and seven more towards Scotland; who set fire on many Scottish Ships in the Haven, and at length took many prisoners and returned.

King Henry hearing, that the Emperour would come to Calice, so to pass into England, as he went into Spain; appointed the Lord Marquess Dorset, to go to Calice, there to receive him, and the Cardinal to receive him at Dover. The Cardinal taking his Journey thither on the tenth of May, rode through London, accompanied with two Earls, six and thirty Knights, and a hundred Gentlemen, eight Bishops, ten Abbots, thirty Chaplains, all in Velvet and Sattin, and Yeomen seven hundred. The five and twentieth of May being Sunday, the Marquess Dorset with the Bishop of Chichester, the Lord de la Ware, and divers others, at the water of Graveling, received the Emperour, and with all honour brought him to Calice, where he was received with Procession, by the Lord Berners Lieutenant of the Town. On Monday he took Shipping at Calice, and landed at Dover, where the Cardinal with three hundred Lords, Knights and Gentlemen received him, and in great state brought him to the Castle, where he was lodged. On Wednesday being Ascension Even, the King came to Dover, and there with great joy and gladness the Emperour and he met. On Friday in the afternoon they departed from Dover, and came that night to Canterbury, and from thence next day to Greenwich, where the Queen received her Nephew with all the joy that might be. Here to honour the Emperours presence, Royal Jufts and Turneys were appointed; where the King, the Earl of Devonshire and ten Aydes, kept the place against the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquess Dorset and other ten Aydes, on their part. On Friday the sixth of June, the Emperour and the King with all their companies went to London, where the City received them with Pageants, and other as rare devices, as at a Coronation, and the Emperour was lodged at the Black-fryers, and all his Lords in the new Palace of Bridewell. On Whitsunday, the King and the Emperour rode to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, where the Cardinal sung Mass, and had his Traverse and his Cup-board. Before Mass, two Barons gave him water, and after the Gospel, two Earls, and at the last Lavatory two Dukes, which pride the Spaniards much disdained. After many Feastings in other places, at last they rode to Windsor, where they stayed a whole week; and there on Corpus Christi day, the Emperour wore his Mantle of the Garter, and late in his own Stall. On the same day both the Princes received the Sacrament, and took their Oaths to observe the League concluded between them. On the morrow after, they came to Winchester: before whose coming thither there was come to Hampton, the Earl of Surrey Admiral of England, with all the Kings Navy, and with him the Lord Fitz-water, the Baron Cresson, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Richard Winkfield, Sir Richard Jerningham, Francis Brian, Sir William Barentine, Sir Adrian Fosken, Sir Edward Donne, Sir Edward Chamberlain, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Anthony Poyns, Sir Henry Shirborn, and the Vice-Admiral, Sir William Fitz-Williams, Sir Edmund Bray, Sir Gyles Capell, Sir William Pirton, John Cornwallis, Sir John Wollope, Sir Edward Ichingham, Sir William Sidney, Anthony Brown, Giles Hufsey, Thomas Moore, John Russell, Edward Bray, Henry Owen, George Colham, Thomas Oldball, Thomas Lovell, Robert Ichingham, Anthony Knevet, Sir John Tremaine, Sir William Skevington, Master of the Ordinance, and John Fabian serjeant at Arms, by whom chiefly a design was moved, though now noysed only that it was but to scowre the Seas for the safe conducting of the Emperour. For the Earl of Surrey having waited the Emperour over to the Coast of Biskay; upon his return, made to the Coast of Britain; and there landing seven thousand of his men, marched to the Town of Morleys, and by assault took it: having won this Town, the Earl called to him certain Gentlemen and made them Knights; as Sir Francis Brian, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Thomas Moore, Sir Giles Hufsey, Sir John Russell, Sir John Ruinsford, Sir George Colham, Sir John Cornwallis, Sir Edward Ridgley, and some others; and after the Earl had lyen a while on the Coast of Britain, he was commanded home by the Kings Letters: who thereupon brought back his whole Fleet to a place called the Cow under the Isle of Wight, and then went on land, leaving divers of his Ships under the Governance of the Vice Admiral Sir William Fitz-Williams.

In this mean time, divers exploits were achieved between them of the Garrison in the Marches of Calice, and the French men of Bulloign, where the French commonly had the worst: but being of no great moment, may well be passed over without relating. Likewise at the same time the Lord Roffe, and the Lord Dacres of the North, appointed to keep the Borders against Scotland, burnt the Town of Kelfie, and fourscore Villages, and overthrew eighteen Towers of stone, with all their Bulwarks.

King Henry intending now to go seriously on with his Wars in France, levied an Army, which under the conduct of the Earl of Surrey, he sent over to Calice; whither the Earl being come, he divided his Army into three Battails; the first was led by Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-water, the middleward by himself and his Brother the Lord Edmund Howard, the rearward by Sir William Sands and Sir Richard Winkfield, both of them Knights of the Garter: and Sir Edmund Guilford was Captain of the Horse-men. In this order the Earl entred the French ground the second of September, and took his Journey towards Hedring. By the way there came to him a great Power of Burgognians, sent by the Lady Margaret, according to the Articles of the League. All the Towns, Villages, and Castles in the Country through which they passed, they burnt and sacked; as the Town and Castle of Selloys, the Town of Brunbrigg, Seneker, Borington and Manstier, with divers others. On the 16. of September, they came before the Castle of Hedring, and and laid siege unto it; but the Castle being well fortified, and the Earl having not battering Ordnance, which by reason of the foul weather, he could not bring with him, after eleven days he raised his siege, and passing from thence to Dorles, burnt the Town and razed the Castle, as also the Town of Dorchester; and then the year being far spent, came back to Callice the sixteenth of October.

At this time, the Duke of Albany being established Governour of Scotland, raised an Army of fourscore thousand men, with which he approached the Borders, but made no Invasion, as thinking perhaps that the only report of his great Army, would fright the English; but yet this stayed not the Lord Marquess Dorset, Warden of the East and middle Marches, to enter into Trinidad, and so forward ten miles into Galloway, burning all Towns and Villages on every side as he passed. All that night he tarried within the Scottish ground, and the next day being Good-Friday, with drew back into England, with a head of four thousand Cattel having burned Grimsley, Mowhouse, Donford, Myle, Ackforth, Crowling, and many other Towns and Villages.

The Cardinal

House of Commons.

In King Henry's fourteenth year, on the fifteenth of April began a Parliament, which was holden at the Black-fryers, whither the King came, and there fate down in his Royal Seat; at his feet on the right side fate the Cardinal of York, and the Archbishop of Canterbury; and at the Rail behinde, stood Doctor Tunfall Bishop of London, who making an Oration, told there the causes of calling this Parliament; which were (as he said) for remedying of mischiefs by the Common Law, as Recoveries, Forain Vouchers, and corrupt Trials; and for making new Laws for the good of the Common-wealth; whereof notwithstanding, no one word was spoken all the time of the Parliament, nor any other thing done, but a Subsidy granted; but howsoever, being commanded to chuse their Speaker, they chose Sir Thomas More, who as first disabling himself, at last made two Petitions to the King: one for himself, that if he should be sent by the Commons to the King on a Message, and mistake their intent, he might then with the Kings pleasure resort again to the Commons, to know their meaning. The other, for the House of Commons, that if in communication and reasoning, any man should speak more largely then of duty he ought to do, yet all such offences should be pardoned, and that to be entered of Record. Which Petitions were granted; and then the Parliament began; where at first a Subsidy was demanded, but as there was much ado in the House of Commons about it, so there was no less amongst the Clergy in the Convocation House; for Richard Bishop of Winchester, and John Bishop of Rochester were much against it, but most of all, one Roland Philips, Vicar of Croyden, and a Canon of Pauls; but the Cardinal taking him aside, dealt so with him, that he took him off, so as he came no more to the House; and then the Bell-weather (as one saith) giving over his hold, the rest soon yielded; and so was granted the half of all their spiritual yearly Revenues, to be paid in five years following: The Clergy being thus brought on, on the nine and twentieth of April, the Cardinal came into the House of Commons, to work them also; and there shewing the great charges the King was necessarily to be at in his present Wars: demanded the sum of eight hundred thousand pounds, to be raised of the fifth part of every mans Goods and Lands, which was four shillings of every pound. This demand was enforced the day after by the Speaker Sir Thomas More; but the Burgesses were all against it, shewing, that it was not possible to have it gathered in money; for that men of Lands, had not the fifth part thereof in Coyn. And further alleadged, that there be not many Parishes in England, one with another, able to spare a hundred Marks, except Cities and Towns; and seeing there were not above thirteen thousand Parishes in the Kingdom, (at this day there are but 9285.) how could such a sum be raised? Hereupon certain of the House were sent to move the Cardinal, to be a means to the King to accept of a lesser sum; but the Cardinal answered, he would rather have his tongue plucked out of his mouth with a pair of Pincers, then make to the King any such motion. Whereupon the Cardinal came again into the House, and desired that he might reason with them that were against the demand; to which it was answered, that the order of that House was to hear, and not to reason, except amongst themselves. When the Cardinal was gone, the Commons after long debating the matter, at last, agreed of two shillings in the pound, from twenty pounds upward, and from forty shillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty shillings, twelve pence, and under forty shillings, of every head of sixteen years and upwards, four pence, to be paid in two years: when this was told to the Cardinal, he was much offended; so that to please him, the Gentlemen of fifty pound Land and upward, by the motion of Sir John Hussey, a Knight of Lincolnshire, were charged with twelve pence more in the pound, to be paid in three years. The Cardinal to move them to it, bore them in hand, that the Lords had agreed to four shillings of the pound; which was untrue, for the Lords had granted nothing, but stayed to see what the Commons would do; whereof when the King heard, he reproved the Cardinal for it; saying withal, that ere it were long he would look to things himself, without any Substitute. Which speech of the Kings, though it danted the Cardinal for a while, yet he soon recovered his spirits, and was as peremptory afterward as he had been before. After this the Parliament was prorogued till the tenth of June; during which prorogation, the Common people said to the Burgesses, We hear say, you will grant four shillings of the pound, we advise you not to do so, that you may go home with many like threatnings. At this time, the Cardinal by his power Legantine, dissolved his Convocation at Pauls, convoked by the Archbishop of Canterbury, calling him and all the Clergy, to the Convocation at Westminster: which was never seen before in England (saith Hall). The one and thirtieth of July, the Parliament was adjourned to Westminster; and there continuing till the thirteenth of August, was that day at nine of the clock at night dissolved.

About this time, the Bishop of Darham died, and the King gave that Bishoprick to the Cardinal; who resigned the Bishoprick of Bath to Doctor John Clerke, Master of the Rolls; and Sir Henry Marney, that was Vice-chamberlain, was made Lord Privy Seal, and shortly after was created Lord Marney also during this Parliament, Sir Arthur Plantagenet, Balthard Son to King Edward the fourth, at Bride-well, was created Vicount Lisle, in the right of his Wife who was Wife before to Edmund Dudley, beheaded.

The fifteenth of June, in the fifteenth year of the Kings Reign, Christian King of Denmark, with his Queen, driven out of his own Countrey, came into England, and was lodged at Bath place; who after he had been feasted by the King, and by the City of London, and received great gifts of both, returned again into Flanders, where he remained as a banished man: Some years after, King Henry sent Doctor Henry Standish, Bishop of St. Asaph, and Sir John Baker Knight, into Denmark, to persuade the people to receive him again into his Kingdom; but they could not prevail, he was so much hated for his cruelty.

About this time, the Earl of Kildare having recovered again the favour of the Cardinal, was sent Deputy into Ireland, as he had been before, where he reduced the wild Irish to indifferent conformity: Altho this while had England Wars both with the French and with the Scots. In Scotland the Marquess of Dorset threw down the Castles of Wederborne, of Nesgate, of Blackwater, of Mackwall, and burnt to the number of seven and thirty Villages, yet never came to skirmish. In France the Lord Sands, Treasurer of Callice, with twelve hundred men went before Bulloign, where he skirmished with the Enemy; and after taking divers Churches and Castles in the Enemies Countrey, returned back to Callice, with the loss only of a dozen men. King Henry being advertised that the Duke of Albany was providing of Forces in France, with which to return into Scotland, sent forth his Vice-Admiral Sir William Fitz-williams, with divers great Ships to intercept him; but when he could not meet with him, he then landed in the Haven of Treport; where with seven hundred men, he beat six thousand French that sought to impeach his landings, took their Bulwarks and much Ordnance in them; burned the Suburbs of the Town of Treport, and all in five hours, and then returned.

All this while King Henry had played with the French, but now he means to be in earnest, and therefore sends over the Duke of Stafford with an Army, the four and twentieth of August; attended with the Lord Montacute and his Brother Sir Arthur Poole, the Lord Herbert, Son to the Earl of Worcester, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Marney, the Lord Sands, the Lord Barkley, the Lord Poyntz, and the Baron Cursyon, Sir Richard Winckfield, Chancellour of the Duchy of Lancaster, Sir John Vere, Sir Edward Neville, Sir William Kingstone, Sir Richard Weston, Sir Andrew Wainford, Sir Robert Winkfield, Sir Anthony Winkfield, Sir Edward Guilford, Sir Edward Greville, Sir Edward Chamberlain, Sir Thomas Lucy, Sir Everard Digby, Sir Adrian Fokeys, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir William Courtney, Sir William Sydney, Sir Henry Owin, and many other Knights and Gentlemen. In the whole Army were six hundred Demy-lances, two hundred Archers on Horseback, three thousand Archers on foot, and five thousand B II-men. Also seventeen hundred taken out of the Garrisons of Hammes, Guisnes, and Callice, in all ten thousand and five hundred, besides two thousand six hundred Labourers and Pioneers. With this Army the Duke of Stafford took the field; his Vauanguard was led by the Lord Sands; Captain of the right Wing, was Sir William Kingstone; and of the left, Sir Everard Digby: Captain of all the Horsemen was Sir Edward Guilford Marshal of Callice; the Duke himself led the Battail, and Sir Richard Winkfield the Rere-ward. The Dukes enterprise was the winning of Beil Castle, which the Lord Sands and the Lord Ferrers assaulted, and had it yielded to them; and then Sir William Skevington was placed Captain in it. At this time the Duke of Bourbon, high Constable of France, began to have his mind alienated from the King of France, and to draw him the more on, the Duke of Stafford sent Sir John Russell (afterward created Duke of Bedford) to him, who passing in disguised Apparel, so prevailed with him, that he professed to take part with the Emperour, and the King of England, who having ten thousand Almans in his pay, it was thought fit (for encouragement of the English) to proclaim in the Army, the access of so powerful an assistant; and thereupon the Duke of Stafford removed to Arde, and so forward into Picardy. At Cordes between Termin and Saint Omers, there came to him the Lord of Isenstein, and with him of Spaniards, Almans and others, three thousand footmen, and five hundred Horse. With these Forces, the Duke marching on, took first the rich Town of Anchor, then the Castle of Bounguard, and then by assault the Town of Bray, though two thousand good men of War were in it. After this, the Towns of Cappe, and Roy, Libome and Davenker, and then came before the Town of Mount-Dedey, in which were a thousand foot and five hundred Horse; yet upon Sir Will. Skevington's Batteries, was yielded to him. From hence he removed to Roy, where he rested a while with his whole Army: and there on Allholland day, in the chief Church of Roy, made Knights, the Lord Herbert, the Lord Poyntz, *O*ver Manners, Arthur Poole, Richard Sands, Robert Jerningham, Robert Salisbury, Edward Beningfield, Richard Corbert, Thomas Wentworth, William Storton, Walter Mantell, George Warram, and Edward Seymour (that was after Duke of Somerset). The day after, the Army removed to a place called Nele, from thence to Veane, and then to Beauford, where the Duke made John Dudley, and Robert Hreight Knights, and from thence on the eighth of November, to a place called Mont Saint Martin; here the Westmen began to murmur, that they might not return home, the Winter being so far spent; but there was to the number of a thousand persons, under the leading of Sir John Walloppe, who having no wages but what they could get by booties, and were therefore called Adventurers, and by some Kreekers, and these had more desire to stay, then the Welchmen had to be gone; for the great gains they made, by the spoils of so many Towns that were taken. The thirteenth of November, the Duke removed to a place within two miles of Bagham Castle, defended by great Marishes, that lay before it, but the frost being at that time so great that many lost their Fingers and Toes with cold, and some dyed; Sir Edward Guilford acquainted the Duke, that he thought the Marishes were hard enough frozen to bear great Ordinance; whereupon the Duke bid him venture it then and go on, which he resolutely did, and had the Castle presently delivered up to him. In this mean time, the King hearing in what state the Army stood, had prepared six thousand men to be sent to the Duke for a relief, under the leading of the Lord Montjoy; but before they could be put in order to pass the Sea, the Duke, partly by extremity of the weather, and partly by the murmuring of the Souldiers, was constrained to break up his Army, and return to Calice.

In this mean time, the Scots knowing that the strength of England was gone into France, took boldness to invade the Marches; but then the Earl of Surrey, Treasurer and high Admiral of England, with six thousand men, being sent against them, took divers of their Castles and Holds; and at Yedworth, skirmishing with a great Garrison of Scots, overthrew them, and took and burned both the Town and Castle. And now the French King finding that the Scots did not work any great trouble to the English, whereby to keep them from molesting of France, and thinking it to be for want of the Duke of Albanies presence, whom they accounted their Governor; he therefore prepared a Navy of Ships to transport him into Scotland; but when the Duke of Albanies heard that Sir William Fitz-Williams was sent with a great Fleet to stop his passage, he brought his Ships into the Haven of Brest, and gave it out that he would not go into Scotland that year; which being told to the King of England, he commanded that his Ships also should be laid up in Havens, till the next Spring. And now fee the cunning of the Sea; for when he saw the Kings Ships discharged, he then boldly took Shipping himself, and sailed into Scotland; whither being come he presently levied a great Army, and approached the English Borders, but when he heard the Earl of Surrey was coming against him with a mighty power, he then sent a Herald to him, promising of his Honour, to give him Battail; and if he took him prisoner, to give him good quarter. To whom the Earl answered, that he would not fail to abide his Battail; but if he took him prisoner, the quarter he would give him, should be to cut off his head, and send it for a Present to his Master the King of England. At this time to the Earl of Surrey being at Alnewick, came the Earls of Northumberland and Westmerland, the Lords Clifford, Dacres, Lumley, Ogle, and Darcie, with many Knights, Gentlemen and other Souldiers, to the number of forty thousand; and from the Court, came the Master of the Horse, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Edward Baynton, and others. The last of October, the Duke of Albanies sent two or three thousand men over the water to besiege the Castle of Wark; who by battery of their Ordinance won the outermolt Ward, called the Barnekins; and continuing their battery, won the second Ward; but then Sir William Lisle, that was Captain of the Castle, issuing forth with those few he had left, drove the French-men from the place, and slew of them to the number of three hundred: a memorable service, and for which the Earl of Surrey afterwards gave him great thanks. The Earl would gladly have followed his Enemies into their own Borders, but that his Commission was only to defend England, and not to invade Scotland. Shortly after the Queen of Scots, Mother to the King, sent to her Brother the King of England, for an abstinence from War, till a further communication might be had, which being granted, the English Army brake up, and the Earl of Surrey returned to the Court.

And now for a while we must be content to hear of petty occurrences, because greater did not happen; which if it make us like the Story the worse, it may make us like the times the better; seeing they are ever the best times that afford least matter to be talked of: but this time will last but a while; for shortly we shall come to hear Occurrences, that have been matter of talk to this day, whereof the like have never scarce been seen, and will hardly be believed, when they are heard; a Marriage dissolved after twenty years consummation; Houses built in Piety, under preence of Piety demolished; a King made a Captive; a Pope held a prisoner; Queens taken out of love, put to death out of loathing; and the Church itself so shaken, that it hath stood in distraction ever since.

At this time, the Emperour Charles sent to the King of England two Mules trapped in Crimfon Velvet, richly embroydered; also eleven goodly Jennets, trapped with Russel Velvet, richly wrought; four Spears, and two Javelins of strange Timber, and work richly garnished; and five Brace of Grey-hounds. To the Queen he sent two Mules richly trapped, and high Chairs after the Spanish fashion: which Presents were thankfully received both of the King and Queen.

At this time in the moneth of October, the Cardinal sent out Commissions, that every man being worth forty pounds, should pay the whole Subsidy before granted, out of hand; which he called an Anticipation: which fine new word, he thought would make them pay their money the more willingly; but they loved their money better then any words he could devise.

The Cardinal requires the Subsidy to be paid by Anticipation.

In this year the King sent the Lord Morley, Sir William Hufsey Knight, and Doctor Lee his Almoner, to Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, with the Order of the Garter; which he received in the Town of Nuremberg, to his great contentment.

In this year, through Books of Prognostications, foretelling much hurt to come by waters and floods, many persons withdrew themselves to high grounds, for fear of drowning; specially one Bolton, Prior of Saint Bartholomews in Smithfield, builded him an House upon Harrow on the Hill, and thither went and made provision for two moneths. These great waters should have fallen in February, but no such thing happening, the Astronomers excused themselves, by saying, that in the computation they had miscounted in their number an hundred years.

In this mean time, many enterprises were attempted, between the English-men of Calice and Guyfnes, and the French-men of Bulloigne and the Frontiers of Picardie, and still Sir William Fitz-Williams, Captain of Guyfnes, Sir Robert Jerningham, Captain of Newnham Bridge, Sir John Walloppe, and Sir John Gage, were the men that did the French most hurt.

This year, the first of September, was Doctor Thomas Hannibell Master of the Rolls, received into London, by Earls, Bishops, and divers Lords and Gentlemen, as Ambassadour from Pope Clement: who brought with him a Rose of Gold for a present to the King: and on the day of the Nativity of our Lady after a solemn Masse sung by the Cardinal of Tork, the said present was delivered to the King, which was a Tree forged of fine Gold, and with branches, leaves, and Flowers resembling Roses.

About the beginning of Winter, the Adventurers called Kreekers, being not above two hundred; and of them, five and twenty Horse-men, made an attempt to fetch some booty from a Village not far from Muttrell, whereof the Earl of Dammartin having notice, he set upon them with a far greater number, and slew most of them, and this was the end of the Kreekers, as brave men as ever served any Prince.

In December this year, there came to London divers Ambassadours, out of Scotland, about a Peace to be had; and a marriage to be concluded, between the King of Scots, and the Lady Mary Daughter to the King of England.

At this time, the Lord Leonard Gray, and the Lord John Gray, Brothers to the Lord Marquesse Dufes, Sir George Cobham Son to the Lord Cobham, William Carye, Sir John Dudley, Thomas VVynt, Francis Poynts, Francis Sidney, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Edward Seymour, Oliver Manners, Percivall Hart, Sebastian Newdigate, and Thomas Calen, Esquires of the Kings Household, made a challenge of Arms against the Feast of Christmas, which was proclaimed by VVindfor the Herald, and performed at the time appointed very Nobly, at Tilts; Turneys, Barriers, and the assault of a Castle erected for that purpose, in the Tilt-yard at Greenwich, where the King held his Christmas that year with great state and magnificence.

About this time, John Jokyn Steward of the Household to the French Kings Mother, came into England, and was received in secret manner, into the house of one Doctor Lurke, a Prebendary of Saint Stephens; who oftentimes talked with the Cardinal, about a Peace to be concluded between the two Kings of England and France; of whose often meetings Monsieur de Prate the Emperours Ambassadour, grew very jealous. The four and twentieth of January, Monsieur Brynon President of Roan, came to London as Ambassadour from the French King, and was lodged with the said John Jokyn; which small things should not be related, but that they were preparatives to great matters afterward.

On Sunday the fifth of March, were received into London Monsieur de Bever Lord of Campher, Admiral of Flanders, Monsieur John de la Coefe President of Malines, and Master John de la Gache, as Ambassadours from the Lady Margaret in the name of the Emperour, who required three things. First they demanded the Lady Mary the Kings only Daughter, to be presently delivered, and she to be named Emperess, and as Governess take possession of all the Low-Countries. Secondly, that all such sums of money as the King should give with her in marriage, should be paid incontinently. Thirdly, that the King of England should pass the Sea in person, and make War in France the next Summer. The first two demands were not agreed to for certain causes; and as to the third, the King said he would take time to advise.

On Thursday the ninth of March, a Gentleman came in Post from the Lady Margaret, with Letters signifying, that whereas the King of France had long lye at the siege of Pavia, he had now been forced to raise his siege, and was himself taken prisoner by the Imperialists; for joy whereof, Bonfires and great Triumph was made in London, and on the twentieth of March being Sunday, the King himself came to Pauls, and there heard a solemn Masse. But for all this shew of joy, it was thought if the King of France had not now been taken prisoner, that the King of England would have joyned in amity with him, as being angry with the Flemings, for Inhabling his Coyne in Flanders, which caused much money to be conveyed out of England thither. The King of France being taken prisoner, was after some time conveyed into Spain, and at last brought to Madrid, where he fell so sick, that the Physicians had little hope of his life, unless the Emperour would be pleased speedily to visit him; upon whose visitation he recovered his health, though not presently his strength: In which time many propolitions were made for his delivery, but the Emperour would accept of none, without restitution of the Dutchy of Burgoyne. At last, the French King weary of imprisonment, and longing for liberty, was content to agree to any conditions: the chief whereof were, that the French King by a certain day should be set at liberty, and within six weeks after should relign to the Emperour the Dutchy of Burgoyne; with all Members pertaining to it; and at the same instant, should put into the Emperours hands, the Dauphin of France, and with him either the Duke of Orleans his second Son, or else twelve principal Lords of France, whom the Emperour should name; and that there should be between them a League and perpetual confederation for defence of their estates. Of whose atonement when King Henry heard, as before he had expressed gladness that he was taken prisoner, so now he sent Sir Thomas Cheney to him, to express his joy for being set at liberty; so sudden is the interchange of love and hate amongst great Princes. The French King being thus delivered, the Emperour married the Lady Isabel, Daughter to Emanuel King of Portugal; and had with her in Dower eleven hundred thousand Ducats; though three years before being at Windsor, he had covenanted to take to Wife the Lady Mary King Henry's Daughter.

At this time Cardinal Woolsey obtained license of the King to erect a Colledge at Oxford, and another at Ipswich; and towards the charge of them, got leave also to suppress certain small Monasteries, to the number of forty; and after got a Confirmation of the Pope, that he might employ the Goods and Lands belonging to those Houses, to the maintenance of those two Colleges; a pernicious Precedent, and that which made the King a way afterward, to make a general suppression of all Religious Houses, though indeed there be great difference between converting of Monasteries into Colleges, and utter subverting them.

In March King Henry sent Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of London, and Sir Richard Winkfield Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, into Spain, to confer with the Emperour about matters of great importance, and particularly about War to be made in France, and yet were these two Princes at this time in League: but he that shall observe the carriage of these three Princes towards one another, and how convertible their Leagues were into War, and their War into Peace; shall find it a strange Riddle of Ragion di Stato, and their Leagues to have been but meer complements, where the scale was turned with the least grain of a circumstance; and though they were bound by Oath, yet that Oath made the Leagues but little the firmer, seeing the League might be broken, and yet the Oath kept: for while one gave the occasion, and the other took it, though they were both accessaries, yet neither was principal; and where there is not a principal, the Oath remains inviolate. And upon those hinges did the friendship of these Princes turn, as at this time the Emperour, though not long before he had parted with the King of England, in the greatest kindness that could be; yet gave not the English Ambassadors so kind entertainment now, as he had formerly done; but for what cause was not apparent, unless upon some sinister report made to him, by Monsieur de Prate; who having been his Legier with the King of England, was without taking leave of the King departed, and come to the Emperour before the English Ambassadors came.

The Cardinal seeks to raise money by a Commission: which the people oppose, and the King disclaims.

But howsoever, King Henry being determined to make War in France himself in person, his Council fell into consideration how the charge of the War should be maintained: which care the Cardinal takes upon him; and thereupon appoints Commissioners in all Shires, to sit and draw the people to pay the sixth part of every mans substance, in Plate or Money: but the people opposed it, alleging, that it was against the Law of the Realm, for any mar to be charged with such payments, unless by Parliament: and as the Cardinal continued to press it, so the people continued to deny it; and when some for denying it were committed to prison, the Commons in many Countreys made great assemblies for their defence: the report whereof at last came to the King, who thereupon came to Westminster and protested openly, that it was done without his knowledge, and that it was never his meaning, to ask any thing of his Subjects but according to Law: and therefore desired to know by whose Authority it was done. Here the Cardinal excused himself and said, that it was the opinion of all the Judges, and of all his Council, that he might lawfully demand any sum, so it were done by Commission, and thereupon it was done. But the King liked not to take advantage of a distinction to draw money from his Subjects; and thereupon gave warning for doing any such thing hereafter: and signified so much by his Letters into all the Shires of England: giving also a general Pardon to all that had offered to rise upon it; which though he did of his own free grace, yet the Cardinal to win a good opinion in the Commons; gave out, that it was by his means the King granted the Pardon.

An. Reg. 17. 1526.

Dukes and Earls created.

King Henry's seventeenth year, was honoured with the advancing of many in honour; for on the eighteenth of June at his Palace of Bridewell, the Kings Son (which he had by Elizabeth Blunt Daughter to Sir John Blunt Knight) called Henry Fitz-Roy, was created first Earl of Nottingham, and after on the same day Duke of Richmond and Somerset, Henry Courtney Earl of Devonshire was created Marquess of Exeter, the Lord Brandon, Son to the Duke of Suffolk, and the French Queen (a child of two years old) was created Earl of Lincoln, Sir Thomas Mannors, Lord Roffe, was created Earl of Rutland, Sir Henry Clifford was created Earl of Cumberland, Sir Robert Ratcliffe Lord Fitz-Water was created Vicount Fitz-Water, and Sir Thomas Bullen Treasurer of the Kings Household, was created Vicount Rochford.

A Peace between England and France, for which a great sum of money paid to King Henry.

At this time the French Kings mother, as then Regent of France, procured by her Ambassadors, at first a Truce, and afterward a Peace with England, which was proclaimed in London, the eighth of September. By the Covenants of which Peace, the King of England should receive at certain daies twenty hundred thousand Crowns, which in sterling money amounted to the sum of four hundred thousand pound; whereof fifty was to be paid in hand. Sir William Fitz-Williams, and Doctor Tylow, was sent to the Lady Regent, to take her corporal Oath, and and likewise King Henry the four and twentieth of April, at Greenwich, in presence of the Ambassadors of France, Rome, and Venice, took his corporal Oath, to observe the Peace between him, and his loving Brother the French King, during his life, and one year after.

In this Winter was a great mortality in London, so as the Term was adjourned, and the King kept his Christmas at Eltham, with a small number, and was therefore called the still Christmas. At which time, the Cardinal coming to the Court, took order for altering the state of the Kings House: many Officers and other servants were discharged, and put to their pensions, in which number were fourscore and four Yeomen of the Guard: who before having had twelve pence the day with check, were now allowed but six pence the day without check, and commanded to go into their Countreys.

The still Christmas by reason of the sickness.

On Shrovetide day this year, a solemn Jufts was held at Greenwich, the King and eleven other on the one part, the Marquess of Exeter and eleven other of the other part.

In his nineteenth year, King Henry kept a solemn Christmas at Greenwich, with Revels, Masks, disguisings, and Banquets, and the thirtieth of December and third of January were solemn Jufts holden, when at night the King and fifteen other with him, came to Bridewell, and there putting on masking Apparel, took his Barge, and rowed to the Cardinals place, where were at supper many Lords and Ladies, who danced with the Maskers, and after the dancing was made a great Banquet. This Christmas was a Play at Grays-Inne, made by one Master Roe a Serjeant at Law, the effect whereof was, that Lord Governance was ruled by Dissipation and Negligence, by whose evil order Lady Publick Weal was put from Governance. This the Cardinal took to be meant by him, and thereupon sent the said Master Roe to the Fleet; though the Play were made long before the Cardinal had any authority: by which we may see how inseparable a companion suspicion is to a guilty conscience.

An. Reg. 19. 1528.

The King visits the Cardinal in a mask.

The fourteenth of January came to the Court Don Hugo de Mendoza, a Grandee of Spain, as Ambassadors from the Emperour to the King, with a large Commission, to make King Henry Judge; how just the conditions were, which the Emperour required of the King of France: and about this negotiation tarried two years in England, so delirious the Emperour was to continue good correspondence with the King of England.

King Henry made arbiters between the Emperour and the King of France.

On Shrovetide day the King and the Marquess of Exeter with others, in most sumptuous attire came to the Tilt, and ran so many courses, till two hundred fourscore and six Spears were broken; and then disarming themselves went into the Queens Chamber, where a sumptuous Banquet was provided. But this Banquet was one of the last of the Queens preparing; for hitherto there had been no exception taken to the lawfulness of her marriage, but now came over Ambassadors from the King of France, requiring to have the Kings Daughter, the Lady Mary, to be given in marriage to the Duke of Orleans second Son to their Master the French King, wherein they that were the suiters for it, were the hinderers of it; for amongst them was the President of Paris, who made a doubt whether the marriage between King Henry and the Lady Katherine of Spain, having been his Brothers Wife, were lawful or no: But howsoever the French Ambassadors at Greenwich on Sunday the fifth of May, in the name of their Master the French King, took their Oathes to observe the League concluded between them during their lives. And shortly after were sent Sir Thomas Bullen, Vicount Rochford, and Sir Anthony Brown Knight, as Ambassadors to the King of France, to take his Oath in person for performance of the League.

The first exception taken to the lawfulness of the Kings marriage.

But enough of small Occurrence; and indeed there will be Occurrences now more worthy to be related, but more lamentable to be heard; for now the Duke of Bourbon General of the Emperours Army in Italy, was slain by a shot from the Walls of Rome, as he was passing by; upon whose death the Army entred and sacked the City; made the Pope flee to the Castle of Saint Angelo, and there cooped him up; abused the Cardinals, and put them to grievous ransomes, spared neither Sacred places, nor Religious persons, but committed all manner of barbarous and inhumane cruelty. These Insolencies of the Emperours Army committed against the Pope; together with the hard conditions the Emperour had imposed upon the King of France, for setting him at liberty; and the Emperours breach of promise in not marrying the Lady Mary King Henries Daughter; were the apparent causes of King Henries breaking League with the Emperour Charles; but a more enforcing though concealed cause, perhaps was the growing greatness of the Emperour, by his acquits in Italy and other places; enough to breed a jealousy in all neighbouring Princes; and indeed King Henry had some cause to think the Emperours spirits were grown higher with his Victories, seeing where before he was wont always to write Letters to King Henry with his own hand, and subscribe them, Your Son and faithful friend, now after his Victories in Italy, he caused his Secretaries to write them, subscribing only Charles. And yet a more pressing cause though not avowed, might be the Cardinals spleen against the Emperour, for denying him the Bishoprick of Toledo in Spain. But whichever of these was the predominant cause, all of them together made a cause sufficient for King Henry to fall off from amity with the Emperour; and his falling off from the Emperour, cause sufficient to fall in with the King of France: and thereupon, the two Kings send their several Heraulds to the Emperour: King Henry Clarentius, the French King his Herauld Guyen, to expostulate their grievances with the Emperour, and he refusing to return a satisfactory Answer, to defie him as their Enemy. The Emperour heard the Heraulds with great temper, and answered Clarentius very mildly; that he knew his Masters grievance was grounded upon misinformation, wherein wherein he would shortly rectifie him by his Letters, as desiring nothing more then to continue his friend; but Guyen he answered roughly, bidding him tell his Master that he had broken his faith, in not performing the Covenants agreed upon for his liberty; and with these answers dismissed them; only Guyen not thinking it fit to deliver his answer, being in such terms, by word of mouth, obtained to have it sent in writing. The Heraults being returned home, and delivering the answers; the King of France was so incensed, to be charged with breach of faith, that soon after he sent another defiance to the Emperour; telling him in plain terms, that he layed in his throat; and thereupon challenged him to the Combate; requiring him to appoint the field, and himself would the weapons. The Emperour accepted the challenge, but other occurrences intervening, hindered the performance.

In this mean time, the Cardinal was appointed to go Ambassadour to the King of France; carrying with him twelve score thousand pounds, to be employed by the French King, and other the Confederates, in a War against the Emperour, who the eleventh of July took shipping at Dover, and landed that day at Calice; with whom was Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of London, the Lord Sands Chamberlain to the King, the Earl of Derby, Sir Henry Guilford, Sir Thomas More, with other Knights and Gentlemen, in all to the number of twelve hundred Horse. At Amiens he was received by the French King himself, and by his Mother, and by all the chief Peers of France: By whom it was agreed, that Articles of Accord should be offered to the Emperour; which if refused, then the French King should marry the Lady Mary King Henry's Daughter, and they both to be Enemies to the Emperour. These things concluded, the Cardinal returned, and on the last of September came to the King at Richmond. In October following, there came Ambassadors from the French King, to take King Henry's Oath, for observing the League with the King of France; and on Sunday the tenth of November, King Henry at Greenwich received the Order of Saint Michael, by the hands of the Lord Annas de Montmorency great Master of the Kings Household, and Monsieur Humeries: as likewise the same day at Paris the French King received the Order of the Garter by the hands of the Lord Lisle, Doctor Taylor Master of the Rolls, Sir Nicholas Carew Master of the Kings Horse, Sir Anthony Brown, and Sir Thomas Wriothesley Knight, otherwise called Garter King of Arms, who were sent thither with the whole Habit, Coller and other Habillments of the Order.

Upon King Henry's defiance of the Emperour in the French Kings quarrel, English Merchants their Ships and Goods were attached in Spain, and in the Low-Countries, as likewise all Spanish and Flemish Merchants were attached here; which being very detrimental to both Nations; at last, by mediation of Hugo de Mendoza, the Emperours Ambassadour Legier, a reconciliation was made, and free traffique between the Nations was revived.

In his twentieth year, on the two and twentieth of February, Sir Piers Butler of Ireland, was created Earl of Osory. And now King Henry began to be troubled in minde about his marriage with Queen Katherine; but whether his trouble of mind grew for scruple of Conscience, or from desire of change, was by many men doubted; some thought he had set his affection upon the Lady Anne Bullen, whom afterward he married, and to make way for that marriage moved this scruple, that he might be divorced; but this is not likely, for he married not the said Lady, till above three years after this doubt had been moved; and three years was a long time to have affection been delayed, which commonly is impatient of delay: if King Henry's own protestation may be taken, it was very scruple of Conscience that troubled his minde; but then by what means this scruple came first into his head, is another doubt; some thought it was first moved by his Confessor Doctor Longland, telling him, that the marriage with the Relict of his Brother, could not be lawful; but neither is this likely; for Doctor Longland was not like to tell him so, who knew the marriage had been made by dispensation from the Pope, an authority in that time beyond exception; some thought it was a plot of Woolsey, thereby to make variance between King Henry and the Emperour, with whom he was at variance himself, and for spleen to the Nephew, he revenged upon the Aunt; but neither is this likely: or else the Cardinal was much deceived in his plot; for though the Emperour laboured Milan and some other Univerities, to forbear giving sentence against the marriage, yet he continued amity with King Henry as much afterward as before: If we will believe the King himself, it was the President of Paris, coming Ambassadour from the King of France, that first moved it, upon a proposition of marriage between the Lady Mary, King Henry's Daughter, and the Duke of Orleans, second Son to the French King; but by what means forever his scruple had beginning, King Henry's desire was now it should have an ending; and that the matter might be debated with indifference, he allowed the Queen to make choise of what Counsel she thought best; who thereupon chose William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Nicholas West Bishop of Ely, Doctors of the Law; John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, and Henry Standish Bishop of Saint Asaph, Doctors of Divinity, with many other; in the mean time he sent to all the Universities in Italy and France, to have their opinions, but specially to the Court of Rome, desiring the Pope to send his Legat to hear the cause; who thereupon sent Cardinal Campeius, and joynd Cardinal Woolsey in Commission with him. The place appointed for the Cardinals to sit and to hear the cause, was at the Black-fryers: where in the great Hall preparation was made of seats, and all things necessary for such a session. Amongst other Officers of the Court, Stephen Gardiner (afterward Bishop of Winchester) late as chief Scribe. The Court being set, the Judges commanded silence, whilest their Commission was read; which done, the Scribes commanded the Crier to call

King Henry begins to be troubled in minde about his marriage.

The Queen is allowed her Counsel to debate the lawfulness of her marriage.

King Henry is cited to the Court and appears.

A call the King, by the name of King Henry of England, come into the Court; who answered, Here: then called he the Queen, by the name of Katherine Queen of England, come into the Court: the Queen though present, yet answered not, but rising from her seat, went to the place where the King sat, and kneeling down, said in effect; Sir, I humbly desire you to take pity upon me, for I am a poor woman and a stranger, and I have here no indifferent Counsel, where all are your Subjects, and less assurance of friendship when they all depend upon your favour; I have been your Wife these twenty years, and have born you divers children; if you can charge me with dishonesty or unfruitfulness, I am content to depart from you to my shame; but if you cannot, I then desire you to do me justice, and to spare me until I may know what counsel my friends in Spain will give me; but if you will not, then your pleasure be fulfilled: and having so said, she rose up, and making a low courtesie, departed. The King being advertised that she was going out of the House, commanded the Crier to call her again; who thereupon called her, saying Katherine Queen of England, come into the Court, which her Gentleman-usher Master Griffith hearing, told her, Madam, you are called; Well (said she) it makes no matter, I will not tarry, go your way: and thus she departed, and never after would appear in any Court, but appealed from the Cardinals to the Pope himself. The Queen being gone, the King said, I confess she hath been to me the most dutiful and loving wife, that ever Prince had; and if it were not for this scruple of my conscience, I would not leave her for any woman living: and having now referred the judgement of the cause to these Commissioners, I should be most glad they could find the marriage between us to be in such sort lawful, that with obedience to the Law of God, we might continue together; for I take God to witness, there is nothing I more desire. This said, the King rose, and the Court was adjourned to another day; for notwithstanding the Queens Appeal (from which she would by no means be drawn) the Cardinals continued their Session weekly, and heard all of both sides: the Point that was chiefly stood on, was, whether Prince Arthur had ever had carnal knowledge of her, or no; the Kings counsel alleadged, he had, and proved it; first, by Prince Arthurs speech, the next morning after his marriage, that he had been that night in the midst of Spain; and then by the words of the last dispensation, Vel forsan cognitam: the Queens Advocates alleadged the contrary, appealing to the Kings own Conscience; whom the Queen charged that he knew her to be a Virgin when he married her; (though to say the truth, it were strange, Prince Arthur and the having lyen 5. moneths together, and he no less then almost 16. years old.) But whilest Arguments were thus urged on both sides, and no certainty could appear; the King sent the two Cardinals to the Queen, lying then in Bridewell, to persuade her, she should submit her self to the Kings pleasure, and not to stand so peremptorily to her Appeal. The Cardinals coming to her found her at work amongst her Maids, with a skain of white thread about her neck: who having heard their message, answered, That in all other things she would willingly submit her self to the Kings will, but in this which concerned her honesty, and the legitimacy of her children, she durst not, but would relie upon the wisdom and piety of both their Fathers, who (she knew) would never have assented to the marriage, if there had been the least scruple of unlawfulness in it; and other answer she would not give. Upon their return to the King, when he perceived she could not be removed from her opinion; he commanded the Court to go on; so that at last it came to judgement; which every man expected should be the next day. At which day the King came thither (but in so secret a manner that he might hear and not be seen) where the Kings Counsel at the Bar calling for Judgement; Cardinal Campeius, as being chief Commissioner, stood up and said; I find the case very doubtful, and the party defendant standing to her Appeal, I will therefore give no Judgement, till I have conferred with the Pope; and therefore I adjourn the Court for this time, according to the Order of the Court of Rome, which hears no causes judicially from the last of July till the fourth of October; at which protraction of time, King Henry was not a little angry, and the Duke of Suffolk being present, in a great rage said; it was never merry in England, since we had Cardinals amongst us. Soon after this, the Cardinal took his leave of the King, and returned to Rome: he was indeed commanded so to do by the Pope, who would else most willingly have gratified King Henry, that had bestowed upon him the Bishoprick of Salisbury. Whilest these things were in acting, Cardinal Woolsey had an inkling of the Kings affection to Anne Bullen, Daughter of the Vicount Rochford; and that the Divorce once passed, he meant to marry her; which match, because for many reasons, he disliked, one perhaps, because she was a Lutheran, he sent privily to the Pope, that by no means he should give sentence for the Divorce, till he had framed the Kings mind another way; for his desire was, that the King should marry the Dutcheess of Alanson the French Kings Sister. This packing of Woolsey was not so closely carried, but that it soon came to the Kings knowledge; and the King finding him a rub in his way, whom he expected to have expedited his proceeding, began to think it necessary to remove him, and to take him off from that greatness which had made him so presuming; and indeed he made short work with him; for soon after he sent the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to him for the Seal, which yet he would not deliver to them, till they brought him a Warrant under the Kings own hand. When the Seal was brought to the King, he delivered it to Sir Thomas More, Speaker then of the Parliament (the first Lay-man that bore that Office in any memory;) and in his room was chosen Speaker Thomas Audeley, Attorney of the Dutchie. Woolsey now removed from his Chancellourship, was in the Parliament then holden, charged with points of Treason; but that charge was so clearly taken off by his servant Thomas Cromwell, who was then of the House, that the Cardinal was acquitted, to the great commendation of Cromwell, both for abilities in himself, and faithfulness to his Master.

The Queen is cited and appears: but making her protestation departs: and appeals to the Pope.

King Henry justifies his Queens duty.

The Queen continues in her Appeal.

Cardinal Campeius adjourns the Court.

Woolsey seeks to cross the King about his marrying the Lady Anne Bullen, and why.

Woolsey hath the Great Seal taken from him: and is charged with Treason, but acquitted.

After

Wolsey is in a Præmunire: and is confined to Asher.

After this, the King being informed, that all those things which the Cardinal had done by his power Legatine, were within the case of Præmunire; he caused his Attourney Christopher Hales to sue out a Præmunire against him; and thereupon the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk were sent unto him, to let him know, the Kings pleasure was, he should go to Asher, a House neerto Hampton-Court, belonging to his Bishoprick of Winchester, and there to reside: whereupon the Cardinal having first delivered up all his Moveables to the Kings use; (the greatest store and richest that was ever known of any Subject) went presently to Putney by water, and from thence rode to Asher, where he and his family continued three or four weeks, without either Bed, Sheets, Table-clothes, or Dishes to eat their meat in, or money wherewith to buy any, but what he was forced to borrow of the Bishop of Carlisle. After this, his matter for the Præmunire being called upon in the Kings Bench, his two Attornies confessed the Action, and thereupon had Judgment to forfeit all his Lands and Goods, and to be out of the Kings protection; but the King of his clemency sent him a sufficient Protection, and left him the Bishopricks of York and Winchester, with Plate and stuffe convenient for his dignity. His Bishoprick of Dunelm was given to Doctor Tunstall, Bishop of London; his Abbey of Saint Albans to the Prior of Norwich; and the Bishoprick of London to Doctor Stokesley, Embassadour then beyond the Seas.

In this mean while, Margaret Dutches of Savoy, Aunt to the Emperour, and the Lady Ledy Dutches of Angoulême, Mother to the French King, met at Cambray to treat of a Peace between the Emperour, the Pope and the Kings of England and France, where were present Doctor Tunstall Bishop of London, and Sir Thomas More, then Chancellour of the Duchie of Lancaster, Commissioners for the King of England; after long debating, through the diligence of the said Ladies, a Peace was concluded; and was thereof called, The Womans Peace, and was indeed as fickle as women, for it was soon broken, and neither of the Princes trusted the other ere the more for it.

King Henry before this time had been wholly ruled by the Cardinal and by the Clergy, but now growing sensible of that error, he called his High Court of Parliament; in which the Commons complained sharply of their grievances against the Clergy, specially in six things.

The first, for that they exacted unreasonable sums of money, as due fees, for the probate of men's last Wills and Testaments: in so much, that Sir Henry Guilford, Knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of the Kings House declared openly, that he and others being Executors to Sir William Compton, payed for the probate of his Will to the Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury a thousand marks.

The second, the extreme exaction, which spiritual men used in taking of corps or mortuaries. The third, that spiritual men became Farmours of great Granges and Farms to the prejudice of Husbandmen and Graziers.

The fourth, because many Abbots, Priors, and other spiritual men, kept Tan-houses, and bought and sold Wool, Cloth, and other wares, as temporal Merchants.

The fifth, because such Clergy men as had the best livings, would take the uttermost of their right, and yet live in the Court or in Noblemens or in Bishops houses, where they spent nothing.

The sixth, because divers ignorant men, amongst them, held ten or twelve Benefices to themselves severally, and yet lived not upon any one of them, but kept great Scholars at small pension.

These things before this time might not be touched, because the Bishops were Chancellours, and had all the rule about the King: but now the King looking better into the matter, gave way to these complaints: whereupon the Burgesses drew up three Bills; one of the probate of Testaments; another for Mortuaries: and the third for Non-residence, Pluralities, and taking of farms by spiritual men. The Bill of Mortuaries passed first the House of Commons, and was sent up to the Lords: when two days after, was sent up the Bill of probate of Testaments, at which the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all the Bishops much frowned, but specially John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, who rose up and said: My Lords, you see what Bills come daily from the Commons House, and all is to the destruction of the Church; for Gods sake, consider what a Realm Bohemia was, and when the Church went down, then fell the glory of that Kingdom. Now with our Commons is nothing but down with the Church; and all this me seemeth, is for lack of faith only. When these words were reported to the House of Commons, they took the matter very hainously; and thereupon sent their Speaker Thomas Audley, with thirty of the House to the King, complaining what a dishonour to the King and the whole Realm it was to say, that they which were elected for the wisest men of all Shires, should be charged to lack faith, which was all one as to say, they were Infidels and no Christians, so as what Acts or Laws forever they made should be taken as Laws made by Paynims and Heathens, and not worthy to be kept by Christian men. And therefore humbly besought his Majesty, to call the said Bishop of Rochester before him, to give an account of the words he had spoken. Whereupon within few days after, the King sent for the Bishop, & acquainted him with the Commons complaint against him, who excused himself, by saying, he meant the doings of the Bohemians for lack of faith, and not the doings of the House of Commons; of which excuse, the King sent word to the House by Sir William Fitz-Williams Treasurer of his Household, but it pleased the Commons nothing at all. After divers meetings between the Lords and Commons, about the Bills of probate of Testaments and Mortuaries, the Temporality laid to the Spirituality their own laws, and constitutions, and the Spirituality defended them, by prescription, and usage; to whom a Gentleman of Grayes-Inn made this answer, The

An Inconsiderate speech of Fisher Bishop of Rochester;

And how he excused it.

The usage hath ever been of thieves to rob on Shooters-hill; is it therefore lawful? Whilest these Bills were in debate, an Act was passed, which released to the King all such sums of money as he had borrowed at the Loan, in the fifteenth year of his Reign; which Bill at first was much opposed, but the most part of the House being the Kings servants, it was at last assented to, which once known in the Countrey abroad, made much murmuring, and the Parliament to be ill spoken of; for every man counted it a sure debt, so as some made their Wills of the money, and some turned it over in satisfaction to their creditors. To qualifie which grievance, the King granted a general pardon for all offences (certain excepted) and was a means also to have the three Bills passed; one for probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, and the third against plurality of Benefices, Non-residence, buying and taking of Farms by spiritual persons, though this last with some qualifying.

During this Parliament, the King created Vicount Rochford, Earl of Wiltshire, the Vicount Fitz-Water Earl of Essex, and the Lord Hastings Earl of Huntingdon.

By this time, the Lords of the upper House, had drawn certain Articles against the Cardinal, and sent them down to the House of Commons, the chief whereof were these:

First, that without the Kings assent, he hath procured himself to be made a Legate, by reason whereof he took away the right of all Bishops and spiritual persons.

Secondly, that in all his writings which he wrote to Rome, or to any forain Prince, he wrote Ego Rex meus, I and my King; so preferring himself before the King.

Thirdly, that without the Kings assent, he carried the great Seal of England with him into Flanders.

Fourthly, that having the French-pox, he presumed to come and breathe upon the King.

Fifthly, that he caused the Cardinals Hat to be put upon the Kings Coin.

Sixthly, that he would not suffer the Kings Clerk of the Market to sit at Saint Albanes.

Seventhly, that he had sent infinite store of treasure to Rome for purchasing of his dignity.

These Articles were read in the House, and if not otherwise proved, yet confessed afterward under the Cardinals own hand, which added to the former Præmunire; all his Lands and goods were seized on to the Kings use.

This Parliament being ended, the King removed to Greenwich; and there kept his Christmas with his Queen Katherine in great state; for though this matter of making void the marriage between them, was hotly perused by the King; yet abstaining only from her bed, he conversed with her still, and they kept Court together, in as loving manner as they had done before. And now King Henry understanding that the Pope and the Emperour were to meet at Bologna, he sent Embassadours thither, the Earl of Wiltshire, Doctor Stokesley Elect of London, and Doctor Lee, to declare both to the Pope and to the Emperour, the opinions of divers learned men in the matter of his marriage; who all agree that it was against the Law of God; and thereupon requiring the Pope to do him Justice; and shewing to the Emperour, that the King moved this matter for discharge of his Conscience only, and to no other end. To which the Pope answered, that when he came to Rome, he would hear the matter disputed, and do the King right. The Emperour answered, that he would in no case be against the Law of God, and if this marriage were judged such by the Court of Rome, he would rest contented: with these Answers the Embassadours returned.

It was now the two and twentieth year of King Henry's reign, when the Emperour gave to the Master of S. Johns of Hierusalem the Island of Malta, in supplying of the Island of Rhodes, which the Turk sometime before had won from that Order.

In this year, the New Testament having been Translated into English, by Tindall, Joy, and others, was forbidden to be read; and many for reading it, were sharply punished by command of the Bishops and Sir Thomas More then Lord Chancellour; but none was more violent in the matter then the Bishop of London, who caused all the Books to be brought into Pauls Church-yard, and there burned.

King Henry having heard by good information, that when Campejus was sent Legate into England, he had brought with him a Bull of Divorce; but was afterward upon change of the Popes mind, commanded to burn it; saw plainly by this, that the Pope had no meaning of proceeding really in the matter, but to keep it a foot for his own ends; neither to displease the Emperour by granting nor King Henry by not granting it, but promising expedition to keep him in expectance; yet using delays to keep him in dependence; and therefore resolved now to take such a course, that he should not need to care whether the Pope granted it or no; and thereupon caused a Proclamation to be published, that no person of what estate or condition soever should purchase, or attempt to purchase from the Court of Rome, any thing prejudicial to the Jurisdiction, or Prerogative of this his Realm, upon pain of imprisonment, and other punishments at his Graces pleasure; and shortly after an Act was made, that Bishops should pay no more Annats, or money for Bulls to the Pope; for as much as it was proved, there had been paid for Bulls of Bishops, since the fourth year of King Henry the seventh, an hundred and threescore thousand pounds, besides what had been paid for Pardons and other dispensations. Another Act was also then made, that no person should appeal for any cause, out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the Archbishop to the King; and all causes of the King to be tried in the upper House of the Convocation.

At this time the Cardinal lying still at Asher, & his Adversaries do being left lying so near the King, he might one time or other get access to the Kings presence, and come again into favour; they they used means to have him sent further off, and thereupon the King appointed him to go to his Diocese of York, and not to come Southward without special licence; whereupon in Lent he made great preparation for his journey, and having in his train to the number of an hundred and threecore persons, by easie journeys came to Peterborough, and there kept his Easter; the week after he went to Stamford, then to Newark, and so to Southwell, where he continued most part of all that Summer; and then rode to Scroby, where he stayed till Michaelmas, and then came to Cawood Castle, within seven miles of York, where he kept a plentiful house for all comers: and repaired the Castle, being greatly in decay, having above three hundred Artificers in daily wages. At last, he determined to be installed at York, the next Munday after Allholliday; against which time great preparation was made, and the Cardinal sent to the King, to lend him the Miter and Pall, which he used to wear at any great solemnity. At which presumption the King marvelled not a little, saying to those that were about him, what a thing is this, that pride should thus reign in a man that is quite under-foot? but before the day of instalment came, he was arrested in this manner: Sir Walter Walsh one of the Kings Privy-chamber, was sent down to the Earl of Northumberland, with whom he was joynt in Commission to arrest the Cardinal; whereupon they go together to Cawood, where the Cardinal lay: and being entred into the house, it was told the Cardinal, that the Earl of Northumberland was come, and in the Hall; then (quoth the Cardinal) I am sorry we have dined, for I doubt our Officers are not provided of any good cheer. With that he went and brought the Earl up, welcoming him in a complemental manner, as if he had come but only to visit him: but being come into the chamber, the Earl with a soft voice, laying his hand upon the Cardinals arm, said, My Lord, I arrest you of High Treason: the Cardinal somewhat astonished, asked to see his Commission, which the Earl denying to shew; then (saith the Cardinal) I will not obey your arrest; at that instant Master Walsh came in, and kneeled down to the Cardinal; who asked him if he were joynt in Commission with the Earl; who answered, he was: well then, said the Cardinal, I trow you are one of the Kings Privie-Chamber, your name is Walsh; I am content to yield to you, but not to my Lord of Northumberland, unless I see his Commission: the meane of the Kings Privie-Chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest Peer of the Realm, by the Kings commandment, without any Commission. Then the Earl took the Cardinals keys from him, and put him in custody of his Gentlemen: some few daies after, he was conveyed from Cawood to Pomfret, and after to Sheffield Park, where he had kind entertainment, and staid with the Earl of Shrewsbury and his Lady eighteen daies, till at last sitting one day at dinner, his colour was observed to change, and being asked how he did; not well (saith he) I have something suddenly at my stomach, as cold as a whetstone, which I know is wind; I desire to have something from the Apothecary, to break wind; which was brought, and the Earl seeing the same taken, he took it, and thereupon broke wind indeed; but whether it were he took it in too great a quantity, or that there was some foul play used, he fel soon after into such a loofness, that the night following he had above fifty stools; yet the next day he rode to Nottingham, and the day after to Leicester Abbey, being so sick by the way, that he was ready to fall off his Mule; coming to the Abbey gates, the Abbot with all the Covent met him; to whom he said, Father Abbot, I am comblither to lay my bones among you; and then was led up into his chamber, and went to bed; where growing sicker and sicker, the next morning Master Kingston Lieutenant of the Tower, who had been sent to bring him up, coming to him, and asking him how he did; I do but tarry (saith he) the pleasure of God, to render up my poor soul into his hands; for this is my case, I have a Flux with a continual Fever, the nature whereof is, that if there be no amendment within eight daies, either excoiation of the entrails will ensue, or frenzie, or else present death; and the best of them is death; and (as I suppose) this is the eighth day. Sir (saith Master Kingston) you are afraid of that you have no cause; for I assure you, the King commanded me to say unto you, that you should be of good cheer, for that he beareth you as much good will as ever he did; No, no (Mr. Kingston) said the Cardinal, I see how it is framed; but if I had served God as diligently as I have done the King, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs; but it is a just reward for my study to do him service, not regarding the service of God, to do him pleasure: and having so said, his speech failed, and incontinent the clock struck eight, and then he gave up the ghost, which made some about him remember, how he had said before, that at eight of the clock they should lose their Master. Being dead he was buried in the Abbey of Leicester. This man held at once the Bishoprick of York, VVinchester, and Durham, the dignities of Lord Cardinal Legat and Chancellour of England, the Abbey of Saint Albans, divers Priories, and sundry great Benefices in Commendam: he had also in his hands, as it were in Farm, the Bishoprick of Bath, Worcester and Hereford, which having been given by Henry the Seventh to strangers, that lived out of the Realm, they suffered Woolsey to enjoy them, receiving of him a Pension only. The retinue of this Prelate is scarce credible, a thousand persons daily in his household, of whom many Knights and some Lords; all which greatness as it came by the Kings favour, so by the withdrawing of his favour, it was overthrowen: so true is that saying of Salomon, The Kings favour is as dew upon the grass; but his wrath is as the roaring of a Lion, and as a messenger of death. After this the King removed from Hampton-Court to Greenwich, where with his Queen Katherine he kept a solemn Christmas, and on the twelfth night he ate in state in the Hall, where was divers Enterludes, costly Masques, and a sumptuous Banquet. After Christmas he came to his Mannor of Westminster, which before was called York Place; for the Cardinal had made a Peofment of it to the King, which the Chapter of York confirmed, and then it was no more called York Place, but the Kings Mannor of Westminster, now VVhite-hall.

About this time was a Call of eleven Serjeants at Law; namely Thomas Audley, Walter Lake, John Bawdewine, John Hynde, Christopher Jenney, John Denfel, Edward Merwyne, Edmund Knightly, Roger Chomely, Edward Mountague, and Robert York; who kept their Feast at Ely House five days together: where on the last day the King and Queen dined: which John Denfel of Denfel in the County of Cornwall, was of Lincoln-Inne, and dyed the third day of January, Anno Christi 1535. and lieth buried within the Church of S. Giles in the fields, in Middlesex: Leaving by Mary his Widow the Daughter of Sir Lucas in Warwickshire Knight, two Daughters and Coheirs, Anne the eldest married unto Sir William Hollys of Houghton, in the County of Nottingham Knight; Grandfather unto John Hollys Knight Earl of Clare, &c. deceased, and Alice the other Daughter married unto Master Reskimer.

At this time the whole Clergy of England was charged by the Kings learned Council, to be in a Præmunire, for supporting and maintaining the Cardinals Legatine power; and were thereupon called by process into the Kings Bench to answer; but before their day of Appearance came, they in their Convocation concluded an humble submission in writing, and offered the King an hundred thousand pound to have their pardon by Parliament, which offer, after some labour, was accepted, and their pardon promised. In which submission the Clergy called the King Supreme Head of the Church. This Pardon was signed with the Kings hand, and sent to the Lords; who assented to it; and then sent it to the Lower House: but here, divers of the House excepted against the Pardon, unless themselves also might be included in it; who (they said) having had something to do with the Cardinal, might be brought into the same case as the Clergy were. Hereupon their Speaker Thomas Audley, with a convenient number of the House, was sent to the King about it; to whom the King made answer, that he was their Sovereign Lord, and would not be compelled to shew his mercy; and seeing they went about to restrain him of his liberty, he would grant a Pardon to the Clergy, which he might do by his Great Seal without them; and for their Pardon, he would be advised before he granted it: with this Answer the Speaker and Commons returned, much grieved and discontented; and some said that Thomas Cromwell, who was newly come into the Kings favour, had disclosed the secrets of the House, which made the King give this displeasing Answer. But soon after the King of his own accord, caused their Pardon also to be drawn; and signed it; which easily passed both Houses, with great commendation of the Kings judgement, to deny it at first when it was demanded as a right, and to grant it afterward, when it was received as of grace.

In this Parliament time, on the thirtieth of March, Sir Thomas More Lord Chancellour with twelve of the Lords, came into the Lower House, acquainting them, that though in the matter of the Kings Divorce, he might sufficiently rely upon the judgement of learned men in his own Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, yet to avoid all suspicion of partiality, he had sent into France, Italy, the Popes Dominions, and the Venetians, to have their opinions; and then causing them to be read, Sir Bryan Tuke took out of a box certain writings sealed, which were the determinations of the Universities of Orleans, of Paris, of Anjou, of Burges, of Bologna, of Padua, and of Toulouse: all which were prepotent in these two Points; That the Brother, by the Law of God, might not marry the Relict of his Brother; and then being against the Law of God, that it is nor in the power of the Pope to dispense with it: and now (said they) you may know, that the King hath not fought this Divorce for his pleasure; but for discharge of his conscience; and this said, they departed. The King himself, when he heard of these determinations, was so far from rejoicing at it, that he rather mourned, as for the loss of so good a Wife; yet conversed with her as he had done before, in nothing altered but abstaining from her bed. But being willing the Queen should know these determinations; in Whitsunweek after, he sent divers Lords to acquaint her with them, requiring her thereupon to recal her Appeal, and to refer the matter to eight indifferent Lords; which she utterly refused, using her usual Answer, that she was his lawful Wife, and would abide the Determination of the Court of Rome, but of no other. After Whitsuntide, the King and Queen removed to Windsor, and there continued till the fourteenth of July, on which day the King removed to Woodstock and left the Queen at Windsor, where she remained a while, and after removed to Easthamstead, whither the King sent to her divers Lords, first to persuade her to be conformable to the law of God; which if they could not do, then to let her know, that his pleasure was, she should be at either of these three places, his Manor of Okeing, or of Easthamstead, or the Monastery of Bisham, and there to continue without further molesting him with her suits.

And now Cranmer is to play his part. It chanced that Doctor Stephens, Doctor Fox, and he met at Waltham one day at dinner; where falling into discourse, about the case then in agitation, of the Kings marriage with Queen Katherine; the other Doctors thought the marriage might be proved unlawful by the Civil Law: but (said Cranmer) it may better be proved by the Law of God, and it is no hard matter to do it; which words of his being made known to the King, Cranmer is sent for, and commanded to set his reasons down in writing: which having done, and shewed them to the King; he was asked whether he would stand to that which he had written: who answered, he would, even before the Pope himself, if his Majesty pleased: marry (saith the King) and to the Pope you shall go: and thereupon sent him to the Court of Rome, and with him Thomas Bullen Earl of Wiltshire, Doctor Stukesley Elect of London, Doctor Lee the Kings Almoner, and others: who coming to Bologna where the Pope was, had a day of audience appointed, but was hindred by a ridiculous accident; for the Pope holding out his foot for them to kiss his Toe, as the manner is, a Dog of the Earls by chance in the room, ran and caught the Popes foot in his mouth, and made it for that time unfit to kiss. After this, when Crommer had made his Proposition, he was told, it should be answered when the Pope came to Rome: so the Embassadors were dismissed, and Crommer went to the Emperours Court; where in private conference he satisfied Cornelius Agrippa, the most learned at that time about the Emperour, and brought him to be of his opinion. Crommer returning home, and giving the King this satisfaction; the Kings marriage with Queen Katherine was soon after dissolved by Parliament, and the Bishop of Canterbury accompanied with Doctor Stokesley Bishop of London, Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, the Bishop of Bathe and Lincoln, and other learned men, rode to Dunstable where Queen Katherine then lay; where being cited to appear, and making default fifteen days together, for lack of appearance, she was divorced from the King, and the marriage declared to be void and of none effect; and from thenceforth it was decreed, she should no more be called Queen, but Princess Dowager: after which time, the King never saw her more.

At this time, being the four and twentieth year of King Henries reign, Sir Thomas More, after long suit, delivered up the great Seal, which was then delivered to Thomas Audley Speaker of the Parliament, which Parliament begun at the Black Friars, was adjourned to Westminster, and there at nine a clock at night dissolved, and was therefore called the black Parliament. This Thomas Audley was first made Lord Keeper, and shortly after Chancellor; in whose room of Speaker Humphrey Wingfield of Grays Inn was chosen. On the first of September this year, the King being at Windsor, created Anne Bullen Marchioness of Pembroke, giving her a thousand pounds last year: and then being desirous to talk with the King of France in person on the tenth of October, taking the said Lady with him, and divers Lords, as the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, the Marquess of Dorset and Exeter, the Earls of Arundel, Oxford, Surrey, Essex, Derby, Rutland, Suffex and Huntington, with divers Vicounts, Barons and Knights, he sailed over to Callice; and on the twentieth of October met with the King of France at Bulloigne, with whom he staid four days; in which time to do him honor, the King of France honored the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk with the Order of Saint Michael, and then both Kings went to Callice, where the French King staid certain days; in which time to do the King of France honor, King Henry honored two of his great Lords with the Order of the Garter, and then after great magnificence in revelling and feasting, on the twentieth of October the French King departed from Callice, and King Henry returned into England, where on the fourteenth of November following, he married secretly the Lady Anne Bullen, which marriage was not openly known till Easter after, when it was perceived she was with child; at which time William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury died; Thomas Crommer was elected Archbishop in his room.

After that the King perceived his new wife to be with childe, he caused all Officers necessary to be appointed to her; and so on Easter-eve he went to her closet openly as Queen, and then the King appointed her Coronation to be kept on Whitunday following, and writings were sent to all Sheriffs, to certify the names of men of forty pounds, to receive the Order of Knighthood, or else to make fine: the Assessment of which fines was appointed to Thomas Cromwell Master of the Jewel-house, and of the Kings Council; a man newly come into the Kings favour, by whose industry great sums of money were by such fines gathered. In the beginning of May, the King caused Proclamation to be made, that all men who claimed to do any service at the Coronation, by way of tenure, grant, or prescription, should put in their claim three weeks after Easter in the Star-chamber, before Charles Duke of Suffolk, for that time high Steward of England, the Lord Chancellor and other Commissioners. Two days before the Coronation were made Knights of the Bath, the Earl of Dorset, the Earl of Derby, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Hastings, the Lord Monteagle, the Lord Vaux, Sir John Mordant, Sir Henry Parker, Sir William Windsor, Sir Francis Weston, Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir John Hurlston, Sir Thomas Poyning, Sir Henry Savill, Sir George Fitzwilliams, Sir John Tindall, and Sir Thomas Jeremy. On Whitunday the Coronation was kept in as great state and pomp for all circumstances as ever any was, and the day after a solemn Juils was holden.

In May this year Pope Clement sent a messenger to King Henry, requiring him personally to appear at the general Council, which he had appointed to be kept the year following; but when his Commission was shewed, there was neither time nor place specified for keeping of this said Council; and so with an uncertain Answer to an uncertain Demand, the Messenger departed.

It was now the five and twentieth year of the Kings reign, when on Midsummer day, Mary the French Queen, and then Wife to Charles Duke of Suffolk, died; and was buried at St. Edmundsbury; and on the seventh of September following, between three and four a clock in the afternoon, the Queen was delivered of a Daughter that was named Elizabeth; the Godfather at the Christning was the Archbishop of Canterbury; the Godmother the old Dutcheff of Norfolk, and the old Marchioness Dorset widow; and at the Confirmation the Lady Marchioness of Exeter: the Christning was performed with exceeding great state, and great gifts were given by the Godfathers.

This year, one Pavier the Town-clerk of London hanged himself, whom Hollinshed saith he heard once swear a great oath, that if he thought the King would set forth the Scripture in English, rather than he would live to see that day, he would cut his own throat: which I therefore relate, that the judgement of God may be seen upon such unhallowed Oaths.

A little

A little before this time one Elizabeth Barton, named the Holy maid of Kent, came to be discovered, whose abettors were Richard Maffer a Priest Parson of Aldington in Kent, Ed. Rocking Doctor of Divinity, a Monk of Canterbury, Richard Deering a Monk, Edward Thways Gentleman, Henry Gold Parson of Aldermay, Hugh Rich a Fryer Observant, Richard Risby and Thomas Gold, Gentlemen. This Maid had learned to counterfeit falling into Trances; in which she would deliver many strange things, and amongst others, said, that by Revelation from God and his Saints she was informed, that if King Henry proceeded to the Divorce, and married another, he should not be King of England one month after. And here we may see how credulous oftentimes great Scholars are in believing Impostures, when Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fisher Bishop of Rockester were thought to give credit to this Counterfeit, that we need not wonder at Saint Austins, who though he gave credit to many lying miracles, yet they were such as had more probability in them then this, which consisted in nothing but making of faces, as upon Examination of the Maid and her Abettors was confessed; and thereupon she and most of them were condemned, drawn to Tyburn and there hanged.

In this mean time the Scots had been troublesome, and made inroads upon the Borders; till at last, Commissioners, being sent to treat of agreement, a Peace was concluded, to continue both the Kings lives; which on the twentieth of May this year, was openly Proclaimed.

About this time, at the suit of Lady Katherine Dowager, a Bull was sent from the Pope, which cursed both the King and the Realm; which Bull was set up in the Town of Dunkirk in Flanders, the Messenger not daring to come neerer: and because it was known that the Lady Dowager had procured this curse to be sent, the Duke of Suffolk was sent to lier, lying then at Engden besides Huntington, to discharge a great part of her household servants; yet leaving her a convenient number like a Princess.

It was now the six and twentieth year of King Henry's reign, when in a Parliament holden, an Act was made for establishing the succession in the Crown, upon the Lady Elizabeth; to which, first all the Lords, Knights and Burgesses were sworn; and after Commissioners were sent into all parts of the Realm, to take the oath of all men and women to the said Act. Another Act was also made, which authorized the King to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Popes authority to be utterly abolished. But Doctor John Fisher, Bishop of Rockester, Sir Thomas More Knight, and Doctor Wilson Parson of Saint Thomas Apostles in London, expressly denied at Lambeth, before the Archbishop of Canterbury, to take the Oaths; of whom Doctor Wilson recanted, but the other two persisting in their opinion, were both of them beheaded. Of these two Bishop Fisher was much lamented, as reputed a man both of great learning and good life. The Pope had elected him Cardinal, and his Hat was come as far as Callice, but before it could come into England his head was off. Sir Thomas More was both learned and very wise, but so given to a vein of jesting and merry scoffing, that he could not refrain it at the very time of his death: as when he was carried to the Tower, being demanded his upper garment (meaning his Gown) you shall have it, said he, and gave them his Cap; saying, it was the uppermost garment he had: also, when being upon the Scaffold, the Hangman kneeled down and asked him forgiveness; I forgive thee (said he) but I promise thee, thou wilt never have credit by cutting off my Head, my neck is so short: and when he was to lay his head down upon the block, having a great gray beard, he stroked it out, and said to the Hangman, I pray you let me lay my beard over the block, lest you should cut it; for though you have Warrant to cut off my head, you have none to cut my beard. But his Devotion was no jesting matter; for he used to wear a shirt of hair next his skin for a perpetual penance; and oftentimes in the Church he would put on a Surplice, and help the Priest to say Masse; which he forbore not to do even when he was Lord Chancellor of England, as one time the Duke of Norfolk coming to the Church found him doing it. Two memorable things are recorded of him; one, which shews his great integrity, and the small reckoning he made of riches; that having passed through so many great employments, and born so many great Offices; yet in all his time, he never purchased above one hundred pounds land a year, nor left any great stock of money behind him, when he died. The other, which shews his filial piety, that being Lord Chancellor of England, at the same time that his Father was a Judge of the Kings Bench, he would alwaies at his going to Westminster, go first to the Kings Bench and ask his Father blessing; before he went to sit in the Chancery.

The ninth of July, this year the Lord Dacres of the North was arraigned at Westminster of high Treason, before the Duke of Norfolk, as high Steward of England; his Inditement being read, he so answered every part and matter therein contained, that by his Peers he was found not guilty; a rare thing to stop a current that ran with such violence. The one and twentieth of September Doctor Taylor Master of the Rolls, was discharged of that Office; and the nineteenth of October following, Thomas Cromwell was sworn in his place.

This year the King of the Scots was installed Knight of the Garter, by his Deputy the Lord Erskin; and Stephen Gardiner, who after the Cardinals death, was made Bishop of Winchester, was sent Embassador Legier into France, where he remained three years. Also in January, of this year, Katherine Princess Dowager, fell into her last sickness; to whom the King sent the Emperours Embassador Legier, desiring her to be of good comfort; but she finding her death to approach, caused only one of her Gentlewomen to write a Letter to the King; commending to him him her Daughter and his, and beseeching him to be a good Father to her; and then desiring him further, to have some consideration of her Servants. On the eighth of January, at Kimbolton, she departed this life, and was buried at Peterborough. A woman of so virtuous a life, and of so great obsequiousness to her husband, that from her only merit, is grown a reputation to all Spanish wives. Also the nine and twentieth of January this year, Queen Anne was delivered of a child before her time, which was born dead.

And now King Henry began to fall into those great disorders, which have been the blemish of his life, and have made him to be blotted out of the Catalogue of our best Princes; for first, in October this year, he sent Doctor Lee and others, to visit the Abbeyes, Priories, and Nunneries in England; who set at liberty all those religious persons, that would forsake their habit, and all that were under the age of four and twenty years; and in December following, a survey was taken of all Chantryes, and the names of such as had the gift of them. After which, in a Parliament holden the fourth of February, an Act was made, which gave to the King all Religious houses, with all their lands and goods, that were of the value of three hundred marks a year and under: the number of which Houses was three hundred seventy and six: the value of their lands yearly, above two and thirty thousand pounds, their movable goods, one hundred thousand, the Religious persons put out of the same houses above ten thousand. This year William Tindall was burnt at a Town in Flanders, between Brussels and Mechlyn, called Villefort, for translating into English the New Testament, and divers parts of the Old; who having been long imprisoned, was upon the Lord Cromwell's writing for his Deliverance, in all haste brought to the fire, and burnt.

It was now the eight and twentieth year of King Henry's Reign, when on Monday there were solemn Jufts holden at Greenwich, from whence the King suddenly departed and came to Westminster, whose sudden departure stroke great amazement into many, but to the Queen especially, and not without cause; for the next day, the Lord Rochford her Brother, and Henry Norris were brought to the Tower of London, prisoners, whither also the same day at five a clock in the afternoon, was brought Queen Anne her self, by Sir Thomas Audley, Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell Secretary, and Sir William Kingston Lieutenant of the Tower, who at the Tower-gate, fell on her knees before the said Lords, beseeching God to help her, as she was innocent of that whereof she was accused: on the fifteenth of May, she was arraigned in the Tower, before the Duke of Norfolk, sitting as High Steward of England. When her Inditement was read, she made unto it so wise and discreet answers, that she seemed fully to clear her self of all matters laid to her charge: but being tried by her Peers, whereof the Duke of Suffolk was chief, she was by them found guilty, and had Judgement pronounced by the Duke of Norfolk; immediately the Lord Rochford her Brother, was likewise arraigned and condemned: who on the seventeenth of May, together with Henry Norris, Mark Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weston, all of the Kings Privy-Chamber, about matters touching the Queen, were beheaded on the Tower-hill. Queen Anne her self on the nineteenth of May, on a Scaffold upon the Green within the Tower, was beheaded with the sword of Calib by the hangman of that Town; her body with the head was buried in the Quire of the Chapel there. This Queen Anne, was the Daughter of Thomas Bullen Earl of Wiltshire, and of Lady Elizabeth Daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk; the Earls Father was the Son of Sir William Bullen, whose Wife was Margaret the second Daughter and Co-heir of Thomas Butler Earl of Ormond, and the said Sir William was the Son of Sir Godfrey Bullen, Lord Mayor of London, who lieth buried in Saint Leonards Church in the Jewry, whose Wife was Anne eldest Daughter and Co-heir to Thomas Lord Hoo and Hastings; and his descent was out of the house of the Bullens in the County of Norfolk; thus much for her Parentage: for her Religion, she was an earnest Professor, and one of the first Countenancers of the Gospel: in Almes-deeds so liberal, that in nine moneths space, it is said she distributed amongst the poor, to the value of fifteen thousand pounds: Now for the crimes for which she died, (Adultery and Incest:) proofs of her guiltiness there are none recorded; of her Innocency many; first, her own clearing of all objections, at the time of her arraignment: then Cromwell's writing to the King, after full examination of the matter; that many things have been objected, but none confessed, only some circumstances had been acknowledged by Mark Smeton: (and what was Mark Smeton, but a mean fellow, one that upon promise of life, would say any thing: and having said something, which they took hold of, was soon after executed lest he should retract it) lastly, they that were accused with her, they all denied it to the death: even Henry Norris, whom the King specially favoured, and promised him pardon if he would but confess it. It was a poor proof of Incest with her Brother, that coming on morning into her chamber before she was up, he leaned down upon her bed, to say something in her ear; yet this was taken hold for a proof: and it need be no marvel, if we consider the many adversaries she had; as being a Protestant, and perhaps in that respect, the King himself not greatly her friend: (for though he had excluded the Pope, yet he continued a Papist still) and then who knows not, that nature is not more able of an Acorn to make an Oak, then Authority is able of the least surmise to make a certainty. But howsoever it was, that her death was contrived: certain it is, that it cast upon King Henry a dishonourable Imputation; in so much, that where the Protestant Princes of Germany had resolved to choose him for head of their League; after they heard of this Queens death, in such a manner, they utterly refused him as unworthy of the honour: and it is memo-

Her Parentage.

A memorable what conceit Queen Anne her self had of her death; for at the time, when she was led to be beheaded in the Tower, she called one of the Kings Privy-chamber to her, and said unto him, Commend me to the King, and tell him; he is constant in his course of advancing me; for from a private Gentlewoman, he made me Marquess, from a Marquess, a Queen; and now, that he had left no higher degree of worldly honor for me, he hath made me a Martyr.

Immediately after her death, in the week before Whitsuntide, the King married Jane Seymour, Daughter to Sir John Seymour, who at Whitsuntide was openly shewed as Queen; and on Tuesday in the Whitsun-week her Brother Sir Edmund Seymour, was created Vicount Beauchamp, and Sir Walter Hangerford was made Lord Hangerford.

The eight of June, the Parliament began; during the which, the Lord Thomas Howard, withogethe the Kings assent, had affianced the Lady Margaret Douglas, Daughter to the Queen of Scots, and Niece to the King, for which he was attainted of Treason, and an Act was made for like offenders hereafter; and so he died in the Tower, and she long time remained there a prisoner; yet afterward was set at liberty, and married Matthew Earl of Lenox, who by him had Henry, Father of James the first King of Great Britain.

In the time of this Parliament, the Bishops and all the Clergy had a solemn Convocation at Pauls Church in London; where after much disputation and debating of matters, they published a Book of Religion; intituled, Articles devised by the Kings Highness: in which Book are specially mentioned but three Sacraments: namely Baptism, Eucharist, and Penance; also certain Injunctions were set forth, whereby many of the old Holy-days were abrogated, specially those that fell in Harvest time.

The two and twentieth of July, Henry Duke of Richmond and Somerset, base Son of King Henry by Elizabeth Blunt, died at Saint James, and was buried at Westkone in Saint James.

The nine and twentieth of June the King held a great Jufts & Triumph at Westminster, but a disastrous Sea-fight was on the water, where one Gates a Gentleman was drowned in his harness, and by the breaking of a Gun two Mariners were sore maimed: in July following, Thomas Cromwell, Secretary to the King, and Master of the Rolles, was made Lord Keeper of the Privy-seal: and the nineteenth of July the Lord Fitz-Warren was created Earl of Bath, and the day after, the said Cromwell was made Lord Cromwell; and on the eighteenth of July, Vicar General under the King over the Spirituality; who sat divers times in the Convocation House, amongst the Bishops as head over them: and now was the state of Religion in England come to a strange pass; because always in passing, and had no confidence; for at first, the authority of the Pope was excluded in some cases only, a while after in all; but yet his Doctrine was wholly retained. Afterward, his Doctrine came to be impugned, but in some few points only: a while after, in many more: that the fable of Proteus might no longer be a fable, when the Religion in England might be his true Moral: and indeed, it could be no otherwise; the distance between the two Religions being not possible to be passed per saltum; but must be done by degrees, which degrees may be observed in the progress of the story: for where at first, it was permitted only to read the Bible in English, now it came to be permitted to pray in English; for now in September, the Lord Cromwell set forth Injunctions, to have the Lords Prayer, the Ave, the Creed, the ten Commandments, and all Articles of the Christian Faith translated into English, and to be taught by all Parsons and Curates to their Parishioners: which Innovation so stirred up the people, that in Lincolnshire they assembled to the number of twenty thousand; against whom the King himself went in person, who winning by persuasion their chief leaders, brought the rest upon pardon to submit themselves: but when he had himself done the work of mercy, he afterward sent the Duke of Suffolk, with Sir Francis Brian, and Sir John Russell, to do the work of Justice; who caused Nicholas Melton, and a Monk naming himself Captain Cobler, and thirteen other (Ringleaders of the sedition) to be apprehended, and most of them to be executed. But this Commotion was scarce appeased, when presently there rose another in the North-parts, where forty thousand were assembled, giving themselves out for an holy Pilgrimage, where on one side of their Ensignes, they had Christ hanging on the Cross, on the other side the Cup and Bread of the Sacrament, as taking Arms only for maintenance of the Faith of Christ, and deliverance of the holy Church now oppressed: but these were opposed by George Earl of Shrewsbury, who having raised an Army without Commission, though to resist the Rebels, yet began to be much troubled, whether in so doing he had not committed Treason, and was never quiet till he had sent to the King for pardon and Commission to proceed: at which time a rumour being raised amongst his Souldiers, that the Earl so well liked the Rebels cause, that what shew soever he made, yet when it should come to the tryal, he would not stick to joyn with them, and take their parts: to remove which Opinion out of their mindes, he caused all his souldiers to come before him, and made his Chaplain give him an Oath; by which he swore in their hearing, to be true to the Crown, and never to be assenting to any Rebels; to his aid were sent the Duke of Norfolk, with the Marquess of Exeter, the Earls of Huntington and Rutland: who with a mighty Army approaching the Rebels, beyond Duncenfer, in the way towards York, attempted first to have pacified them without blood-shed; but when no persuasions would serve, it was resolved of both sides to come to Battel; but see here the great goodness of God; for the night before the day appointed for battel, it happened that a little Brook called Dun, running between the two Armies, upon a small rain grew to such a height, that it was not passable by either foot or horse; so as the Armies having time to consider, and considering perhaps this miracle as sent of God, they came to agreement, and upon pardon disbanded and returned to their houses: but in the mean time they had besieged the Castle of Scarborough, where the resolute carriage of Sir Ralph Evers is memorable; who held the Castle by only his own servants and Tenants, and that, when for twenty days together, he had no other sustenance but bread and water. But all Commotions were not yet appeased; for at this very time, there was another great Army assembled out of Cumberland, Westmerland, and the North-parts of Lancashire, marching South-wards; but by the diligence of the Earl of Darby, to whom also the Earl of Suffex was sent; they were suppressed, and their chief Leaders, as the Abbots of Wally, Sanley, and others, apprehended and hanged. But neither is there yet an end of Commotions; for now in February, Nicholas Musgrave, Thomas Tilby, with others to the number of twelve thousand, began a Rebellion, and besieged Carlisle, but by the power of the City were first beaten back, and then were encountered by the Duke of Norfolk, who caused seventy four of them by Martial law to be hanged on the walls of Carlisle. But neither was there yet an end of Commotions; for now in Settrington, Pickering, Leigh and Scarborough, began a new Rebellion, by procurement of Francis Bigot; who had a great power, and meant to have taken Hull, but by the industry of Sir Ralph Ellerker, and the Maior of the Town, three score of the Rebels were taken and hanged, and the rest put to flight, and glad to be quiet. But neither yet was there an end of Commotions; for in the latter end of this eighth and twentieth year, the Lord Darcy, the Lord Hussey, Sir Robert Constable, Sir John Bulmer and his wife, Sir Thomas Percy Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Sir Stephen Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest Esquire, and others began to conspire, although each of them before had been pardoned by the King: but this as being but the fagge end of the Commotion, was soon suppressed, the Lord Darcy was beheaded on the Tower-hill, the Lord Hussey at Lincoln, Sir Robert Constable was hanged in chains at Hull, Sir John Bulmer's Paramour was burnt in Smithfield, and most of the other were executed at Tyburn: Tha vultis erat; so great a matter it was, to make the Realm be quiet, in so great innovations of Religion.

This year on Saint Georges Feast, the Lord Cromwell was made Knight of the Garter, and on the twelfth of October, which is Saint Edwards-even, at Hampton-Court, the Queen was delivered of a Son; (but with so hard a labour that she was fain to be ripe) the child was named Edward, whole Godfather at the Christning were the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Duke of Norfolk, his Godmother was his Sister the Lady Mary: at his Bishoping, his Godfather was the Duke of Suffolk: on the eighteenth of October, he was made Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earl of Chester: but the birth of his Son brought not so much joy to the King, as the death of his Queen brought him sorrow; for within two days after she died, and was buried at Windsor, and so much was the Kings grief for her death, that he continued a widower two years after.

It is not unworthy the relating, what a miserable dissolution befell the family of the Geraldines or Fitz-Garrets (Earl of Kildare in Ireland) about this time; for Gerald Fitz-Garret, who had been ten years Deputy in Ireland, upon the complaint of some fault, was sent for over into England, where not making a satisfysing answer, he was committed to the Tower; but before his coming over, had with the Kings leave, left Deputy there his own son, a young man of not above twenty years of age, but yet ripe of understanding and fit for the place: this young Lord hearing that his Father was committed prisoner to the Tower; and soon after, as the rumour increased, that he was put to death; in rage to be revenged, rose up in Arms; and having five Uncles in the Countrey (men of great estimation) drew them (though some of them unwillingly) to take his part; amongst other outrages he committed, the Archbishop of Dublin was slain in his presence: the Father in the Tower hearing hereof, with very grief died; the Son and his Uncles, upon the Kings sending an Army, were all either taken or submitted; and being sent for over into England, those of his Uncles, that against their wills had been drawn into the Action had good hopes of their lives, till entering the ship of passage, which was called the Cow, they then presently despaired, because of a prophesie, that five Sons of a certain Earl should be carried into England in the belly of a Cow, and never after return: and indeed it fell out true, for through the malice of their adversaries, (exasperating the King against them, and saying, there would never be quietness in Ireland, as long as any of the Geraldines were left alive) they were all put to death: one only Son of the family remained, a youth of thirteen years of age, who though at that time sick of the Small-pox, yet made shift to save himself by flight; fled first into France, and frighted from thence, afterward into Flanders, and driven from thence, at last into Italy, where protected by Reginald Poole, at that time made Cardinal by Pope Julie the third, he was afterward, by his means, restored to his dignity and his patrimony.

This year Edward Seymour, Vicount Beauchamp, the Queens Brother was created Earl of Hartford, and Sir William Fitz-Williams Lord Admiral, was created Earl of Southampton, Master Pank was made Vice-Treasurer, Sir John Russell was made Controller of the Kings House, and divers Gentlemen were made Knights.

In February divers Roods were taken down by the Kings commandement; as the Rood of Boveley, called the Rood of grace, which was made with vices to move the eyes and lips; also the Rood called Saint Savours at Bermondsey Abbey in Southwark, and divers others. In May a Frier Observant, called Frier Forrest, who had taken the Oath of Supremacy himself, yet privately perswaded others, that the King was not Supreme head of the Church; was thereupon examined, and for his defence said, that he took the Oath with his outward man, but his his inward man never consented to it: but this answer served not his turn from being condemned; and on a pair of Gallows prepared for him, in Smithfield, he was hanged by the middle, and arm-holes, all quick, and under the Gallows was made a fire wherewith he was consumed: A little before his execution, a huge great Image was brought to the Gallows, fetched out of Wales, which the Welch men had in great reverence, called Darvel Gatheran, of which there went a Prophesie, that this Image should set a whole Forrest on fire, which was thought to take effect, in setting this Frier Forrest on fire, and consuming him to nothing.

In September, by the special motion of the Lord Cromwell, all the notable Images, unto which were made any special Pilgrimages and offerings, were taken down and burnt; as the Images of Spaldingham, Ipswich, Worcester, the Lady of Wilton, with many other; and forthwith by means of the said Cromwell, all the orders of Friars and Nuns, with their Cloysters and Houses, were suppressed and put down: also the Shrines of counterfeit Saints; amongst others, the Shrine of Thomas Becket in the Priory of Christ-Church was taken to the Kings use, and his bones, skull, and all which was there found, with a piece broken out by the wound of his head, were all burnt in the same Church by command of the Lord Cromwell: and the one and twentieth of October, the Church of Thomas Becket in London, called the Hospital of Saint Thomas of Acre was suppressed: the sixteenth of November the Black-fryers in London was suppressed; the next day the White-friars, the Gray-friars, and the Monks of the Charter-house, and so all the other immediately after: only three Abbots relicted, the Abbot of Colechester, the Abbot of Reading, and the Abbot of Glastenbury, who therefore were all taken and executed. The four and twentieth of November the Bishop of Rochester preached at Pauls-Cross, and there shewed the blood of Hales, affirming it to be no blood, but Honey clarified and coloured with Saffron, as it had been evidently proved before the King and Council. The number of Monasteries suppressed, were six hundred forty five, besides four score and ten Colledges, one hundred and ten Hospitals, and of Chantries and free Chappels two thousand three hundred seventy four. But now to make amends for the suppressing of so many Monasteries, the King instituted certain new B. shopricks, as at Wymminster, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, and Gloucester; and assigned certain Canons and Prebends to each of them.

The third of November Henry Courtney Marques of Excester, and Earl of Devonshire, Henry Poole Lord Montacute, Sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington, Knight of the Garter, and Master of the Kings Horse, and Sir Edward Nevill, Brother to the Lord Alurgeiney, were sent to the Tower, being accused by Sir Geoffrey Poole the Lord Montacute's Brother of high Treason; they were indicted for devising to promote and advance one Reinold Poole to the Crown, and put down King Henry. This Poole was a near kinsman of the Kings (being the Son of the Lady Margaret Countess of Salisbury, Daughter and Heir to George Duke of Clarence) he had been brought up by the King in learning, and made Dean of Excester; but being sent after, to learn experience by travail, he grew so great a friend of the Popes, that he became an enemy to King Henry, and for his enmity to the King, was by Pope Julius the third made Cardinal; for this mans cause, the Lords aforesaid being condemned, were all executed; the Lord Marques, the Lord Montacute, and Sir Edward Nevill, beheaded on the Tower-hill, the ninth of January, Sir Nicholas Carew, the third of March; two Priests condemned with them were hanged at Tyburn; Sir Geoffrey Poole though condemned also, yet had his pardon.

About this time one Nicholson, alias Lambert, being accused for denying the Real presence in the Sacrament, appealed to the King, and the King was content to hear him; whereupon a Throne was set up in the Hall of the Kings Palace at Westminster, for the King to sit; and when the Bishops had urged their arguments, and could not prevail, then the King took him in hand, hoping perhaps to have the honour of converting an Heretick, when the Bishops could not do it, and withall promised him pardon if he would recant; but all would not do; Nicholson remained obstinate, the King mist his honour, the delinquent mist his pardon, and shortly after was drawn to Smithfield, and there burnt.

About this time King Henry being informed that the Pope, by instigation of Cardinal Poole, had earnestly moved divers great Princes to invade England; he as a provident Prince, endeavoured as earnestly to provide for defence; and to that end rode himself to the Sea-coasts to see them fortified, and in needful places B. larks to be erected: He caused his Navy to be rigged, and to be in readiness at any short warning: He caused Musters to be taken in all Shires; and lifts of all able men in every County, in London specially; where Sir William Forman the then Maior, certified the number of fifteen thousand; not that there were no more, but that so many were ready prepared; and these on the eighth of May, the King himself saw mustered in Saint James Park; where the Citizens strove in such sort to exceed each other in bravery of arms, and forwardness of service, as if the City had been a Camp; and they not men of the gown, but all profest soldiers; which they performed to their great cost; but greater commendation.

It was now the one and thirtieth year of King Henries reign, and the nine and fortieth of his age; when having continued a widower two years, he began to think of marrying again; and he needed not to be a suitor for a wife, for he was sued unto to take one. The Emperor solicited him to marry the Dutchess of Milan; but to marry her he must first obtain a Licence from the Pope, and King Henry was resolved rather to have no wife, than to have any more to do with the Pope. Then the Duke of Clare made suit unto him, to marry the Lady Anne his Sister, and he was a Protestant Prince; and so, though differing in points of Doctrine, yet in the main point of excluding the Pope, both of one mind. Many about the King were forward for this Match, but the Lord Cromwell specially, and indeed it concerned him more than any other, that the King should take a Protestant Wife, seeing his actions had been such, as none but a Protestant Queen would ever like; and if the Queen should not like them, the King, though done by his leave, would not like them long. Hereupon such means was used, that Embassadors came from the Duke of Cleve to conclude the match; and then the eleventh of December, the Lady her self in great state was brought, first to Callice, and then over to Dover; and being come to Rochester, the King secretly came to see her, afterward she was conducted to London, met by the way in several places, by all the great Lords and Ladies of the Kingdom. The third of January she was received into London by Sir William Hollys Knight, then Lord Maior, with Orations, Pageants, and all complements of State, the greatest that ever had been seen. On Twelfth day the Marriage was solemnized: the Archbishop of Canterbury did the Office, the Earl of Overfein a German Lord gave her. In April following the Lord Cromwell, as though he had won the Kings heart for ever by making this match, was made Earl of Essex; for in March before, Henry Bowchier Earl of Essex, and the ancientest Earl of England, had broken his neck by seeking to break a young Horse, leaving only one Daughter, and the dying without issue, the Earldom came to the Family of Devereux, which yet enjoyed not the honour, till afterward in Queen Elizabeths time, and then made, but not restored.

The ninth of March, the King created Sir William Paulet Treasurer of his House, Lord Saint John; Sir John Russell Controller, Lord Russell; and shortly after Sir William Parr was created Lord Parr. The eight and twentieth of April began a Parliament at Westminster, in the which Margan Countess of Salisbury, Gertrude Wife to the Marquess of Exeter, Reynold Poole Cardinal Brother to the Lord Mountacute, Sir Adrian Fosse, Thomas Dingley Knight of Saint Johns, and divers others were attainted of high Treason; of whom Fosse and Dingley the tenth of July were beheaded, the Countess of Salisbury two years after; and in this Parliament the Act of the Articles was established, and Sir Nicholas Hare was restored to his place of Speaker in the Parliament.

It was now five months after the Kings marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve; and though the King at the first sight of the Lady, did not like her person; yet, whether as respecting the honour of Ladies, he would not disgrace her at the first meeting; or whether he meant to try how time might work him to a better liking; or indeed, that he would not give distant to the German Princess at that time, for some ends he had a working, he dissembled the matter, and all things went on in a shew of contentment on all hands. But for all these shews, the crafty Bishop of London Stephen Gardiner, finding how the world went with the Kings affection towards his Queen; and for her sake with Cromwell; to neither of whom he was greatly affected (for to the Queen, as misliking her Religion; not to Cromwell, as envying his greatness) he wrought upon the Kings inclination, what by suggesting, and what by aggravating, that the Lord Cromwell, the ninth of July, sitting in the Council Chamber, was suddenly apprehended and committed to the Tower; and the nineteenth of the same month was attained by Parliament, and never came to his Answer; by a Law, which (as some reported) he himself had caused to be made; and the eight and twentieth of July was beheaded on the Tower-hill; for crimes (as appears in Record) of Heresie and Treason. This Lord Cromwell was born at Putney, a Village in Surrey near the Thames sides, Son to a Smith, after whose decease his Mother was married to a Sheerman; for the pregnancy of his wit he was first entertained by Cardinal Woolsey, and by him employed in many great affairs; the Cardinal falling, the King took him into his service; and finding his great abilities, first advanced him for his worth, and then for his pleasure overthrew him. But the greatest part of Stephen Gardiners practice had been done before; for at Midsummer before, the King caused the Queen to remove to Richmond, as for her health and pleasure; and in the time of her absence, on the sixth of July, sent certain Lords to the Lower House of Parliament, who there declared certain causes, for which the Kings marriage with the Lady Anne of Cleve was not to be counted lawful; and so carried the matter, that the Convocation clearly determined, that the King might marry any other; and so might she. Being thus Divorced; it was further Enacted, she should no more be called Queen, but the Lady Anne of Cleve. The fault for which this Divorce was decreed, is not expressly delivered; some say, a precontract of the said Lady with a Lord of Germany was pretended; but it seems to have been for some womanish defect in her body; as she spared not to affirm that she had never been carnally known by the King in all the time of their lying together; and as it is said, when her Ladies one time laid unto her that they looked now every day to hear of her great belly, she should answer, they might look long enough, unless, saying, How doest thou sweet heart? God morrow sweet heart; and such like words, could make a great belly; for (said she) more then this there never passed between the King and me. How ever it was, she willingly submitted to the Decree, whether out of fear, or perhaps as little liking the King as the King did her; and afterward led a private life here in England, well respected of the King, and dying sixteen years after, in the fourth year of Queen Mary, was buried at Westminster.

About this time Leonard Gray Deputy of Ireland, was on the Tower-hill beheaded for suffering his Nephew, Gerald Fitz-Gerret to escape, who had been declared an enemy unto the State; and then also was Thomas Fines Lord Dacres, a young man of four and twenty years of age, hanged at Tyburn, for killing a mean person upon a sudden affray; also the fourth of August, Thomas Epson a Monk of Westminster, for denying to take his Oath, to be true to the King, had his Monks garment plucked from his back, the last that was seen in such habit in England till Queen Marys days.

The sixth of July in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign, King Henry had been divorced from the Lady Anne of Cleve, and now the eighth of August following, the Lady Katharine Howard, Niece to the Duke of Norfolk, and Daughter to the Lord Edward Howard, was shewed openly as Queen at Hampton-court.

On the tenth of June the year following, Sir Edmund Knevet of Norfolk, Knight, was arraigned before the Officers of the Green-cloth, for striking one Matter Cleer of Norfolk, within the Tennis-court of the Kings House; being found guilty, he had judgement to lose his right hand, and to forfeit all his lands and goods; whereupon there was called to do execution, first the Serjeant Surgeon, with his Instruments pertaining to his Office, then the Serjeant of the Woodyard, with a mallet and a block to lay the hand upon, then the Kings Matter Cook with a knife to cut off the hand, then the Serjeant of the Larder to set the knife right on the joint, then the Serjeant Barrier with searing Irons to sear the veins, then the Serjeant of the Poultry with a Cock, which Cock should have his head smitten off upon the same block, and with the same knife; then the Yeoman of the Chandy with Sear-cloaths, then the Yeoman of the Scullery, with a pan of fire to heat the Irons, a chaffer of water to cool the ends of the Irons, and two forms for all Officers to set their stuffe on, then the Serjeant of the Cellar with Wine, Ale, and Beer; then the Serjeant of the Ewry, with Bafon, Ewre, and Towels; all things being thus prepared, Sir William Pickering Knight Marshal, was commanded to bring in his prisoner, Sir Edmund Knevet, to whom the Chief Justice declared his offence, which the said Knevet confessed, and humbly submitted himself to the Kings mercy, only he desired, that the King would spare his right hand and take his left, because (said he) if my right hand be spared, I may live to do the King good service: of whose submission, and reason of his suit, when the King was informed, he granted him to lose neither of his hands, and pardoned him also of his lands and goods.

The Summer of his three and thirtieth year, King Henry with his Queen Katharine, made a progress into the North parts, and returning at Alhollantide to Hampton-court, he was there informed of the Queens disolute life, first before her marriage with one Francis Deerham, a Gentleman of Norfolk, whom employed afterward in Ireland, she had lately again at Pomsret received into her service; and now since her marriage with one Thomas Colepepper, of the Kings Privy-chamber; whereupon the thirteenth of November, Sir Thomas Wriothesley Knight, Secretary to the King, was sent to the Queen at Hampton-court, to charge her with these crimes, and discharging her household, to cause her to be conveyed to Sion, there to remain, till the Kings pleasure should be further known: the Delinquents being examined, Deerham confessed, that before the Kings marriage with the Lady Katharine, there had been a pre-contract between himself and her; but when he once understood of the Kings liking towards her, he then waved and concealed it for her preferment: so the first of December these Gentlemen being arraigned at the Guild-hall, they confessed the Indictment, and had Judgement to die, as in cases of Treason: the tenth of December, they were drawn from the Tower to Tyburn, where Colepepper was beheaded, and Deerham was hanged and dismembered; Colepeppers body was buried in Sepulchres Church in London, but both their heads were set on London-bridge the two and twentieth of December, there were arraigned at the Kings-Bench, the Lord William Howard and the Lady Margaret his Wife, Katharine Filney, and Alice Wrethwold Gentlewoman, Joan Bulmer, Wife to Anthony Bulmer Gentlemans Anne Howard Wife to Henry Howard Esquire, and Brother to the Queen, with divers others; who were all condemned for misprision of Treason, for concealing the Queens misdemeanor, and adjudged to forfeit all their lands and goods during life, and to remain in perpetual prison. The fifteenth of January the Parliament began at Westminster, where the Lords and Commons petitioned the King, that he would not vex himself with the Queens offence, and that both she and the Lady Rochford might be attained by Parliament; and that to avoid protracting of time, he would give his Royal assent unto it, under the great Seal, without staying for the end of the Parliament. Also, that Deerham and Colepepper having been attained before by the Common Law, might be attained likewise by Parliament: all which was assented to by the King; and after on the thirteenth of February, the Queen and the Lady Rochford were beheaded on the Green within the Tower, where they confessed their offences, and died penitently: yet something to take off the offences of this Queen; it is certainly said, that after her condemnation, she protested to Doctor White Bishop of Winchester, her last Confessor, that as for the act for which she was condemned, she took God and his holy Angels to witness, upon her souls salvation, that she died guiltless.

Before this, on the three and twentieth of January, King Henry was proclaimed King of Ireland, whereas before this time, the Kings of England were only entitled Lords of Ireland; and this title was given him both by the Parliament here, and by the Parliament holden in Ireland; before Sir Anthony Scintegan Knight, the Kings Deputy there.

About this time Arthur Plantagenet Vicount Essex, base Son to King Edward the fourth, having been imprisoned upon suspicion of a practice, for betraying of Callice to the French; whilst he was the Kings Lieutenant there, was now found to be innocent of the fact; and thereupon the King to make him some reparation for his disgrace, sent him a Ring and a very gracious message, by Sir Thomas Wriothesley his Secretary; whereat the said Vicount took so great joy, that the night following, following, of that very joy he died : so deadly a thing is any passion, even joy it self, if it be extreme. After his death Sir John Dudley, his Wives Son, was created Vicount Lisle. This Sir John Dudley was Son to Edmund Dudley, beheaded in the first year of this Kings reign, and was made Vicount Lisle in right of his Mother.

During this Parliament, one George Ferrers Gentleman, servant to the King and Burges for the Town of Plimmouth in Devonshire, in going to the Parliament House, was arrested in London by a Process out of the Kings Bench, for a Debt wherein he was late afore condemned, as surety for one Welden, at the suit of one White; which arrest being signified to Sir Thomas Mowl Knight, Speaker then of the Parliament, and to the Knights and Burgeses there; order was taken, that the Serjeant of the Parliament, called Saint-John, should be sent to the Counter in Breadstreet (whither the said Ferrers was carried) and there demand to have him delivered: but the Officers of the Counter not only refused to deliver him, but gave the Serjeant such language, that they fell at last to an affray; at which time the Sheriffs coming, they also took their Officers part; so as the Serjeant was fain to return without the Prisoner; which being signified to the Speaker and the Burgeses; they took the matter in so ill part, that they would lit no more without their Burges; and thereupon rising up, repaired to the upper House, where the whole Cafe was declared by the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audley Lord Chancellor, and the Lords and Judges there assembled: who judging the contempt to be very great, referred the punishment thereof to the House of Commons it self: whereupon returning to their places again, upon new debate of the Cafe, they took order that their Serjeant should once more repair to the Sheriffs of London, and demand the prisoner, without carrying any Writ or Warrant for the matter. It is true, the Lord Chancellor offered to grant a Writ, but the House of Commons refused it; being of a clear opinion, that all commandements from the nether House were to be executed by their Serjeant without Writ, only by shewing his Mace, which is his Warrant: but before the Serjeants return into London, the Sheriffs better advised, became more mild, and upon the second demand, delivered the prisoner without any denial; but then the Serjeant had further in charge, to command the Sheriffs and Clerks of the Counter, to appear personally the next morning before the House of Commons: where appearing, they were charged by the Speaker with their contempt, and compelled to make immediate answer, without being admitted to any counsel; Sir Roger Chomely Recorder of London, offered to speak in the cause, but was not suffered, nor any other but the parties themselves: in conclusion, the Sheriffs and White who had caused the Arrest, were committed to the Tower; the Officer that did the Arrest, with four other Officers to Newgate; but after two or three daies, upon the humble suit of the Maior, were set at liberty; and because the said Ferrers being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by privilege of Parliament, was not by law to be brought again into execution; and so the creditor without remedy for his debt, against him as his principal debtor, therefore after long debate, by the space of nine or ten daies together, they at last resolved to make an Act of purpose, to revive the execution of the said debt, against Welden who was principal debtor, and to discharge Ferrers; that was but surety: wherein notwithstanding, the House was divided, and the Act passed but by fourteen voices: the King being advertised of this proceeding, called before him the Lord Chancellor and the Judges, the Speaker and divers of the Lower House, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect: first commending their wisdom, in maintaining the privileges of their House (which he would not have to be infringed in any point) he alledged, that he being the head of the Parliament, and attending in his own Person upon the business thereof, ought in reason, to have privilege for himself and all his servants attending upon him, so as if the said Ferrers had been no Burges, but only his servant; yet in that respect, he was to have the privilege as well as any other: for I understand (saith he) that you, not only for your own persons, but also for your necessary servants, even to your Cooks and Horse-keepers, enjoy the same Privilege; in so much, as my Lord Chancellor here present, hath informed us, that whilst he was speaker of the Parliament, the Cook of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a Statute of the Staple, and for so much, as the said Cook during all the Parliament served the Speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution by privilege of Parliament; the Prerogative of which Court, (as our learned Council informeth us) is so great, that all Acts and Processes coming out of any other Court, must for a time cease and give place to it: and touching the party himself, though for his presumption he was worthy to have lost his debt, yet I commend your equity, that have restored him to his debt against him that was the principal: When the King had said this, Sir Edward Montacute Lord chief Justice, rose up and confirmed by many reasons, all that the King had said, as likewise did all the other Lords, none speaking any thing to the contrary.

It was now the four and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when in May, he took a loan of money of all such as were valued at fifty pounds and upwards in the Subsidie Book; the Lord Privy Seal, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir Thomas Baker, and Sir Thomas Wriothley were Commissioners for the loan in London, who so handled the matter, that of some chief Citizens they obtained a thousand marks in prest to the Kings use: for which Privy Seals were delivered to repay it again within two years.

At this time, were many complaints made by the English, against the Scots, partly for ravaging and maintaining divers English Rebels, fled into Scotland, and partly for invading the English Borders; but still when the King of England was preparing to oppose them, the Scottish King would would send Embassadors to treat of reconciliation, till at last, after many delusory pranks of the Scots, the King of England, no longer enduring such abuses, sent the Duke of Norfolk, his Lieutenant General, accompanied with the Earl of Shrewsbury, Darby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hartford, Angus, Rutland, the Lords of the North-parts, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Kings Horse, and Sir John Gage Controller of the Kings House, with others, to the number of twenty thousand men; who on the one and twentieth of October entered Scotland, where itaying but eight daies only he burnt above eighteen Towns, Abbeys, and Castles, and then without having Battail offered, for want of victuals returned to Barnwick; as soon as he returned, comes abroad the King of Scots, raiseth a power of fifteen thousand men, and using great threatnings what he would do, invaded the West Borders, but the edge of his threatning was soon taken off; for the Baltard Ducrest, with Jack of Musgrave, setting upon them with only an hundred Light-horse, and Sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred, put them to flight, upon a conceit, that the Duke of Norfolk with all his Army, had been come to those parts; where were taken prisoners of the Scots, the Earl of Cassil & Glen-carne, the Lord Maxwell Admiral of Scotland, the Lord Flemming, the Lord Somerwell, the Lord Ogilby, the Lord Gray, Sir Oliver Sinclair, the Kings Minion, John Rafe, Lord of Gray, Roger Erskine Son to the Lord Erskine, Car Lord of Gredon, the Lord Maxwells two Brothers, John Lesley Baltard Son to the Earl of Rothay, George Hamle Lord of Hemetton, with divers other men of account, to the number of above two hundred, and more then eight hundred of meaner calling; so as some, one English man, and some women also had three or four prisoners in their hands: at which overthrow, the King of Scots took such grief, that he fell into a burning Ague, and thereof died, leaving behind him one only Daughter; and here King Henry began to apprehend a greater matter then the victory; for he and his Council conceived, that his Daughter would be a fit match for his Son Prince Edward, thereby to make a perpetual union of the two Kingdoms; and to this purpose they conferred with the Lords whom they had taken prisoners, who exceeding glad of the proposition, and promising to further it by all the possible means they could, were thereupon set at liberty, and suffered to return home. Coming into Scotland, and acquainting the Earl of Ardrin with the motion, who was chosen Governour of the young Queen and of the Realm; the matter with great liking was entertained, and in Parliament of the three Estates in Scotland, the marriage was confirmed, and a Peace between the two Realms for ten years was proclaimed and Ambassadors sent into England, for sealing the conditions. But Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrews, being Cardinal, and at the Popes devotion, and therefore an utter Enemy to King Henry, so crossed the business that it came to nothing, but ended in a war between the two Kingdoms; so as in March the year following, the Lord Seymour Earl of Hartford, with an Army by Land, and Sir John Dudley Lord Lisle, with a Fleet by Sea, met at New-castle, and there joyned together, for invading of Scotland; with the Ear of Hartford, were the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Lords Cobham, Clinton, Conyers, Sintenis, the Lord Williams Howard, with Knights and others, to the number of ten thousand; with Sir John Dudley the Admiral, were two hundred sail of ships: on the fourth of May, the whole Army was landed two miles from the town of Lieth, at a place called Granther Garg; and there the Lord Lieutenant putting his men in order, marched towards the Town of Lieth, the Lord Admiral led the forward, the Lieutenant the Batel, & the Earl of Shrewsbury the Rearward. Before they came to the Town of Lieth, the Cardinal with six hundred Horse, besides Foot, lay in the way to impeach the passage; but they were so assailed by the Harquebusers, that they were glad to flie, and the first man that fled was the Cardinal himself, and then the Earls of Huntley, Murrey, and Bathwell; hereupon the English made forward to Lieth, and entered it without any great resistance: the sixth of May they marched towards Edenburgh, and they as approached the Town, the Provost with some of the Burgers, came and offered the Keys of the Town to the Lord Lieutenant, upon condition they might depart with bag and baggage, and the Town to be preserved from fire; but the Lord Lieutenant told them, their falsehood had been such, as deserved no favour, and therefore unless they would deliver the Town absolutely without any condition, he would proceed in his enterprise and burn the Town. Here we may see, what it is to make men desperate; for to this the Provost answered, They were better then, to stand upon defence, and so indeed they did, and made the English glad to retire, for the Castle shot so fiercely upon them, that having burnt only a part of the Town, they returned to Lieth; but whilst they lay there, they so waited the Countrey, that within seven miles every way of Edenburgh, there was not a Town, nor Village, nor house that was left unburnt; at Lieth, the eleventh day of May, the Lord General made Knights, the Lord Clinton, the Lord Conyers, Sir William Wroughton, Sir Thomas Holcroft, Sir Edward Dorel, Sir Francis Hotham, and others, to the number of at least three score: in Lieth Haven, they felled upon all the Scottish Ships; whereof two were of notable fairnes, the one called the Salamander, given by the French King at the marriage of his Daughter into Scotland, the other called the Unicorn, made by the late Scottish King; the ballast of which two Ships was Canon-shot, whereof they found in the Town, to the number of four score thousand. On the fifteenth of May, their Army and their Fleet departed from Lieth, both in one hour, having first set the Town on fire and burned it to the ground: from Lieth the English Army marched to Seaton, from thence to Haddington, from thence to Dunbar, from thence to Ranton, all which Towns and Castles with divers others they burnt and utterly defaced; and on the eighteenth of May came to Barnwick, not having lost in all the journey above fourteen men.

In the mean time, in King Henrys five and thirtieth year, on Trinity Sunday a new league was entered into and sworn, between the King and the Emperor at Hampton-courte, to be both offensive and defensive.

The Scots tripped with a conceit.

The King of Scots with grief thereof died, leaving behind him one only daughter.

King Henry seeks to match his Son Prince Edward with this daughter; and is embraced by all the States of Scotland.

Only Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrews and Cardinals, crosseth it.

Whereupon a war between the two Kingdoms.

And the Earl of Hartford is sent with an Army into Scotland.

Where he takes Lieth and many other Towns.

No policy to make the Enemy desperate.

Lords imprisoned for eating flesh in Lent. In this year, Proclamation was made, whereby the people were licensed to eat white meats in Lent; but straightly forbidden the eating of flesh, whereupon shortly after, the Earl of Surrey with divers other Lords, and Knights, were imprisoned for eating of flesh contrary to the Proclamation.

Olbine is created Earl of Desmond; whose posterity injoyeth the Honor to this day.

King Henry marries the Lady Katherine Par widow of the Lord Latimer.

She is accused to the King of Heresie. And by what means she avoids the danger.

The third of June this year, there came out of Ireland three Lords, of whom Olbine was here created Earl of Desmond, (which honor his posterity enjoyeth to this day) Mack William a Bar, was created Earl of Clanrickard, and Mack Gilpatrick, was made Baron of Ebrankie.

King Henry had already had five Wives, all of them Maids; and no good luck with any of them, he will now therefore try his fortune with a Widow, and thereupon the twelfth of June, in the five and thirtieth year of his Reign he took to wife the Lady Katherine Par, widow of the Lord Latimer late deceased, who was then proclaimed Queen; but how lucky would this match have proved, if the King had longer lived, God knows, seeing in a short time of three years they lived together, it was no small danger she escaped, which though it happened not till a year or two after this time, yet will not unjustly be spoken of in this place, that so her story may come together; this Queen as being an earnest Protestant had many great adversaries, by whom she was accused to the King, to have heretical Books found in her closet; and this was so much aggravated against her, that they prevailed with the King, to sign a Warrant to commit her to the Tower, with a purpose to have her burnt for Heresie; this Warrant was delivered to Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, and he by chance, or rather indeed by Gods Providence, letting it fall from him, it was taken up and carried to the Queen; who having read it, went soon after to visit the King, at that time keeping his chamber, by reason of a sore leg; being come to the King, he presently fell into talk with her, about some points of Religion, demanding her resolution therein, but the knowing that his nature was not to be crost, specially considering the case she was in, made him answer, that she was a woman accompanied with many imperfections, but his Majesty was wise and judicious, of whom she must learn as of her Lord and Head; Nor so by Saint Mary (said the King) for you are a Doctor Kate to instruct us, and not to be instructed by us, as often we have seen heretofore: Indeed Sir (said she) if your Majesty have so conceived, I have been mistaken; for if heretofore I have held talk with you touching Religion, it hath been to learn of your Majesty some point, whereof I stood in doubt, and sometimes that with my talk I might make you forget your present infirmity: And is it even so sweet heart? (quoth the King) why then we are friends, and so kissing her, gave her leave to depart. But soon after, was day the appointed by the Kings Warrant for apprehending her; on which day, the King being disposed to walk in the Garden, had the Queen with him, when suddenly the Lord Chancellor with forty of the Guard, came into the Garden with a purpose to apprehend her: whom as soon as the King saw, he stepped to him, and calling him knave and fool, bid him away out of his presence: the Queen seeing the King so angry with him, began to intreat for him, to whom the King said; Ah poor soul, thou little knowest what it is he came about; of my word sweet heart, he hath been to thee a very knave. And thus by Gods Providence was this Queen preserved, who else had tasted of as bitter a cup, as any of his former wives had done.

About this time King Henry and the Emperor sent Garter and Tysion d'or, Kings at Arms, to demand performance of certain Articles of the French King: which if he denied, they were then commanded to besiege him: but the French King would not suffer them to come within his land, and so they returned: whereupon King Henry caused the said demands to be declared to the French Ambassador at Westminster; and in July sent over six thousand men, under the leading of Sir John Walloppe accompanied with divers Knights and Gentlemen; Sir Thomas Seymour was Marshal of the Army, Sir Robert Bowet Treasurer, Sir Richard Cornwall Captain of the Horse, and Sir George Carey his Lieutenant. There were likewise Sir Tho. Palmer, Sir John Rainsford, Sir John Saint-John, and Sir John Gascoigne Knights, that were Captains of the Foot. Their Commission was to joyn with the Emperor, and together to make war upon France. The third of August open war was proclaimed in London, between the Emperor and the King of England on the one part, and the French King on the other, as mortal Enemy to them both; and to all other Christian Princes besides, as he that had confederated himself with the Turk. Sir John Walloppe marching forth of Callice with his Army, joyned with the Emperors Forces, who together went and besieged Landersey, a Town lately fortified by the French, lying within the borders of the Emperors Dominions: to raise the siege, this French King had raised a mighty Army; with which he came on as if he meant to give the Emperour battail; and thereupon the Emperor raising his siege, with a purpose to encounter him, the French King took the opportunity to put men and victuals into the Town, which was the thing he intended: and having done this, the night following departed with his Army; and then the Emperor seeing him gone, and finding the Winter coming on, and no hope of sudden getting the Town, being now newly supplied, he also broke up his Army, and returned home.

This year the Sunday before Christmas, the Lord William Parre, Brother to the Queen, who had married the Daughter and Heir of Henry Bourchier Earl of Essex, was at Hampton-Court created Earl of Essex; and Sir William Parre Knight, Uncle to them both, was made Lord Parre of Horton, and Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; and on New-years day Sir Thomas Wriothesley, the Kings Secretary, was made Lord Wriothesley of Tickfield.

Lord, made.

In June this year, Matthew Earl of Lenox fled out of Scotland and came into England, whom King James received kindly, and gave him in marriage the Lady Margaret his Sifters Daughter, his parentage by whom he had Henry, Father of our late King James of blessed memory.

Thomas Andeley Lord Chancellour, being lately dead, Thomas Lord Wriothesley succeeded him in the place; and now was an Army levied to go for France; the Duke of Norfolk and the Lord Privy Seal, accompanied with the Earl of Surrey the Dukes Son, the Lord Gray of Wilton, the Lord Ferrers of Chartley, and his Son Sir Robert Deveraux; Sir Thomas Chaucy Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, the Lord Montjoy, Sir Francis Bryan, Sir Thomas Poynings Captain of Gysiers, with many other Knights and Gentlemen, about Whitsuntide passed over to Callice; and marched toward Adutrel, joyned with the Emperours Forces, under the leading of the Count de Baren; which two Armies laid siege to Muttrell, whereof Monsieur de Bis, one of the Marshals of France was Captain, but being then at Bulloigne, and hearing of the siege of Muttrell, he left Bulloigne, and with his Forces came thither, which was the thing that was desired, to draw him from Bulloigne; and thereupon was the Duke of Suffolk appointed to pass over with the Kings Army, accompanied with the Earl of Arundel Marshall of the Field, the Lord Saint-John, the Bishop of Winchester, Sir John Gage Controller of the Kings House, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Kings Horse, with divers others; who the nineteenth of July came and encamped before Bulloigne; the four and twentieth of July the King in person accompanied with divers of the Nobility, came to Callice; and the six and twentieth encamped before Bulloigne on the North side: many batteries and assaults were made, so long, till at last the Town upon composition yielded, and the Duke of Suffolk entered and took possession, suffered six thousand French, as was agreed, with bag and baggage to depart. The eighth of September King Henry entered the Town himself, and then leaving the Lord Lisle Lord Admiral, his Deputy there, he returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October. Many enterprises after this were made by the Dauphin of France and by Monsieur de Bies for recovery of Bulloigne, but they were still repelled, and the English kept the Town in spite of all they could do; although at one time there came an Army of eighteen thousand foot, at another time an Army, wherein were reckoned twelve thousand Lance Knights, twelve thousand French Foot-men, six thousand Italians, four thousand of Legionsary Souldiers of France, a thousand men of Arms, besides eight thousand light Horse; great Forces certainly to come and do nothing.

Whilest these things were doing about Bulloigne, the Ships of the West Countrey and other places wasted abroad on the Seas, and took above three hundred French Ships; so that the Gray-fryers Church in London was laid full of Wine, the Austin-fryers; and Black-fryers full of Herrings and other Fish, which should have been conveyed into France.

About this time the King demanded a Benevolence of his Subjects, towards his Wars in France and Scotland; to which purpose, the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Suffolk, and other of the Kings Counsel fare at Baynardes Cattle, where they first called before them the Maior and Aldermen, and because Richard Read Alderman, would not agree to pay as they set him, he was commanded to serve the King in his Wars in Scotland, which the obstinate man rather chose to do, then he would pay the rate he was required; but being there, he was taken prisoner by the Scots, to his far greater damage, then if he had agreed to the Benevolence required: For at this time, Sir Ralph Evers Lord Warden of the Marches, after many fortunate Roads into Scotland, assembled six thousand men, and entering Scotland now again, was encountered by the Earl of Arraine, by whom he and the Lord Ogle, and many other Gentlemen were slain, and divers were taken prisoners, of whom Alderman Read was one.

It was now the seven and thirtieth year of King Henry's Reign, when on Saint George's day Sir Thomas Wriothesley Lord Chancellour was made Knight of the Garter: also Trinity Term was adjourned by reason of the Wars, but the Exchequer and the Court of the Tenth were open.

At this time, the English Fleet went before New-haven, but being there encountered by a far greater Fleet of French, they returned; with whose retreat, the French Admiral emboldened, came upon the Coast of Sussex, where he landed Souldiers, but upon firing of the Beacons was driven back; after which he landed two thousand men in the Isle of Wight, but was there repelled, though reported to have in his Ships threescore thousand men.

In August this year, died the valiant Captain the Lord Poynings, the Kings Lieutenant of his Town of Bulloigne; and the same month also, died at Guilford, the noble Duke of Suffolk, Charles Brandon, Lord great Master of the Kings House, whose Body was honourably buried at Wyndesore, at the Kings cost.

About this time, the Scots having received aid out of France, approached the English Borders, but durst attempt nothing; whereupon the Earl of Hartford, Lieutenant of the North parts, raising an Army of twelve thousand men, English and Strangers, entered Scotland, and burnt a great part of Mers and Tivdale, as Kelsay Abbey, and the Town, the Abbeyes of Medroffe, Driborne, and Tedworth, with a hundred Towns and Villages more; when on the sixteenth of September, an Army of Scots and French attempted to enter into England on the East Borders, but in a straight were set upon by the English, who slew and took of them to the number of seven score, amongst whom was the Lord Humes son, and a principal French Captain; in another road, which they made into the West Borders, the Lord Maxwell's Son, and divers other were taken, but then at another time (such is the chance of War) five hundred English entering the West Borders of Scotland were discomfited, and the greatest part of them either taken or slain.

Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk dieth.

And

And now to revenge the presumptuous attempts of the French upon the Isle of Vight, the Lord Admiral with his Fleet approached the Coasts of Normandy, landed six thousand men at Treport, burnt the Suburbs of that Town with the Abbey, destroyed thirty Ships there in the Haven, and then returned, not having lost above fourteen persons in the whole voyage.

At this time the Earl of Herford lying at Bulloigne, had in his Army above fourscore thousand men, and many skirmishes passed between him and the French, till at last, by mediation of the Emperour and divers other Princes, a meeting was appointed to treat of a Peace between the two Kings of England and France; hereupon there came to Guines for the King of England, the Earl of Herford, the Bishop of Vinchester, Sir John Dudley, Vicount Liste, Baron of Marpas and high Admiral of England, Sir William Paget the Kings Secretary, and Doctor Nicholas Votton Dean of Canterbury. For the French King there came to Arde, Claude Danbolt Admiral of France, the Bishop of Evreux, Monsieur Raymond chief President of Roan, and the Secretary Bouchetell. Divers times they met betwixt Arde and Guines, and after long debating of matters, and divers breakings off; at length, the seventh of June, a Peace was concluded, and proclaimed in the City of London, on VVhich Sunday the thirtieth of June, by sound of Trumpet; and the same day in like manner at Paris and Roan; the chief Article of which Peace was this, that the French King paying to the King of England eight hundred thousand Crowns, within the term of eight years, should have Bulloigne again restored to him, which in the mean time should remain in possession of the King of England, as a pledge for assurance of the said money; and now for a full establishment of his peace, the Vicount Liste Lord Admiral, with the Bishop of Durresme, and divers other Lords were sent into France, to take Oath of the French King and of the Dauphin; as likewise at the same time divers Lords came from the French King to take Oath of King Henry; who by the way were met by the young Prince and many Lords, and conducted to the King at Hampton-Court.

In his seven and thirtieth year, the three and twentieth of November, a Parliament began at Westminster, wherein was granted to the King, a Subsidy both of Spirituality and Temporality, and all Colleges, Chantries and Hospitals were given to him to dispose of: the four and twentieth of December the Parliament was prorogued, on which day the King coming to the Parliament House, the Speaker made to him an Oration, which the Lord Chancellor was used to answer, but at this time the King would answer himself: the effect whereof was that where Master Speaker had commended him for many excellent qualities that were in him, he thanked him for it, not that he had them, but for putting him in mind how necessary it was he should have them; then he thanked the whole House for their Subsidy, and for giving him the Colleges and Chantries, which he promised to be bestowed to the glory of God and good of the Realm; lastly, he acknowledged their love to himself, but found fault with want of love to one another; for what love, where there is not concord? and what concord, when one calleth another Heretic and Anabaptist, and he again calleth him Papist and Hypocrite? and this not only amongst those of the Temporality, but even the Clergy-men themselves preach one against another, inveigh one against another, without Charity or Discretion; some be so stiff in their old Adumptions, and others so curious in their new Sumpsinus, that few or none Preacheth truly and sincerely the word of God: now therefore let this be amended, fear and serve God, be in Charity amongst your selves, to the which I as your Supreme Head and Sovereign Lord, exhort and require you: and this said, the Acts were openly read, to some he gave his Royal assent, and divers assented not.

Whilest the Oath for the Peace was thus taken by both Kings, Bulloigne remaining still in King Henries possession, Monsieur de Chatillon Captain of Mont-pleaser began to make a new Bastilion at the very mouth of the Haven of Bulloigne, naming it Chatillons Garden: hereof the Lord Gray of Wilton as then Deputy of Bulloigne advertised the King by Sir Thomas Palmour, requiring to know his pleasure whether he should raze it, as a thing very incommodious to the Town, or let it stand; the King asked advice of his Council, who all agree, that the conditions of the Peace ought in no wise to be infringed, and therefore to let the Bastilion stand; whereupon the King caused his Secretary the Lord Paget, to write a Letter to the Lord Gray, to that purpose, but then called Sir Thomas Palmour secretly to him, bidding him tell the Lord Gray, that whatsoever he had written in his Letter, yet with all speed possible, he should raze the Fortification to the ground; Sir Thomas Palmour replying, that a message by word of mouth being contrary to his Letter, would never be believed; Well (said the King) do you tell him as I bid you, and leave the doing it to his choice; upon the coming back of Sir Thomas Palmour, the Lord Gray called a Council, shewing them the Kings Letter, and withall Sir Thomas Palmour's message, and then asked their advice, what in this case he should do? who all agreed without any question that the Letter was to be followed, and not the Message: To which the Lord Gray himself said nothing, but caused the Message to be written verbatim from Sir Thomas Palmour's mouth, and those of the Council to set their hands to it: this done, the night following he issued forth with a company of Armed men and Pioneers, and overthrew the Fortification to the ground, and then sent Sir Thomas Palmour with Letters to the King, who as soon as he saw him, asked aloud, What will he do it or no? Sir Thomas Palmour delivering his Letter, said, Your Majesty shall know by these; but then the King half angry, Nay tell me (saith he) will he do it or no? being then told it was done, and the Fortifications clean razed, he turned to his Lords and said, What say you my Lords to this, Chatillons Garden is razed to the floor? Whereto one presently answered, that that he had done it, was worthy to lose his head; to which the King (straightly replied, That he would rather lose a dozen such heads as his was that so judged, then one such servant as had done it: and therewith commanded the Lord Gray's Pardon should presently be drawn, the which he sent with Letters of great thanks, and promise of reward: the cause why the King took this course, was this, lest if he had written the razing of the Fortification in his Letter, it might have come to the French-mens knowledge, before it could have been done, and so have been prevented; and by this may be taken as a scantling of King Henries great Capacity.

A Peace is concluded between the two Kings of England and France.

All Colleges and Chantries are given to the King by Parliament.

It is now the eight and thirtieth year of his Reign, when about Michaelmas, Thomas Duke of Norfolk, and Henry Earl of Surrey his Son and Heir, upon certain surmises of Treason, were committed to the Tower of London; and the thirteenth of January, the King then lying at the point of death, the said Earl was arraigned in the Guild-hall, before the Lord Maior, the Lord Chancellor, and other Lords there in Commission; the special matter wherewith he was charged, was the bearing of certain Arms that were said to belong to the King and to the Prince; though the Earl justified the bearing of them, as belonging to divers of his Ancestors; affirming withal, that he had the opinion of Heralds therein: But this notwithstanding, being no Lord of the Parliament, he was tried by a common Jury, by them was found guilty, and thereupon had judgment of death; and the nineteenth of January was beheaded on the Tower-hill. The Duke was attainted by Parliament and kept in prison, till in the first year of Queen Mary the Attaindour was reversed. The death of this Earl might lay an imputation of cruelty upon King Henry, if a just jealousy growing from the many circumstances of the Earls greatness, in the tender age of his own Son, did not excuse him.

Soon after the death of this Earl, the King himself dyed; having made his last Will, in which he took order, that his Son Edward should succeed him in the Crown, and he dying without issue his Daughter Mary, and the dying without issue, his Daughter Elizabeth; although another order of succession had passed before by Act of Parliament. The Executors of his last Will were these sixteen; Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Wriothesley Lord Chancellor, Sir William Pawlet Lord Saint-John, and great Master of the Household, Sir Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford and high Chamberlain of England, Sir John Russell Lord Privy Seal, Sir John Dudley Vicount Listley, Lord Admiral; Cuthbert Tunstall Bishop of Durham, Sir Anthony Brown Master of the Horse, Sir Edmund Montacute Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Sir Thomas Bromley one of the Justices of the Kings-Bench, Sir Edward North Chancellor of the Augmentation, Sir William Paget Knight of the Order, Sir Anthony Denny, Sir William Herbert, Sir Edward Wootton Treasurer of Callice, and Nicholas Wootton Dean of Canterbury and York. To whom were adjoynd as Assitants these twelve, Henry Fitz-Allen Earl of Arundel, William Par Earl of Essex, Sir Thomas Cheyney Treasurer of the Household, Sir John Gage Controller, Sir Anthony Wingfield Vice-Chamberlain, Sir William Peter Principally Secretary, Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker of Sissinghurst in Kent, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Richard Southwell, and Sir Edward Peckham. And it was not without need to leave a full Council Table, considering in what terms he left the Kingdom when he dyed. Abroad, in League with the Emperour, at Peace with the King of France; but whether these were not personal only, and no longer binding then King Henry lived, might be doubted; with the Scotts at deadly feud; with the Pope at utter defiance; from both which Coasts there could be expected but little fair weather: at home the frame of Religion extremely disjoynted; and the Clergy that should set it in frame, out of frame themselves: the mindes of the people extremely distracted; and the Nobility that should cement them, scarce holding themselves together: And in this state was the Kingdom when King Henry the eighth dyed, in the year 1547. the fifty sixth of his life, and of his Reign the eight and thirtieth.

Of his Taxations.

In his fourth year, in a Parliament at Westminster, was granted to the King, two Fifteens of the Temporality, and two Tenths of the Clergy, and Head-money; of every Duke ten Marks, an Earl five pound, a Baron four pound, a Knight four Marks, and every man valued at eight hundred pounds in Goods, to pay four Marks, and so after that rate till him that was valued at forty shillings, and he paid twelve pence, and every man and woman of fifteen years and upward four pence. In his sixth year, a Parliament was holden, wherein divers Subsidies were granted to the King, towards the charges of his Wars in France: in his fourteenth year, order was taken by the Cardinal, that the true value of all mens substance might be known, and he would have had every man sworn to tell what they were worth, and required a tenth part thereof towards the Kings charges in the present Wars, as the Spirituality had granted a fourth part: this the Londoners thought very hard, and thereupon were excused for taking Oath, and were allowed to bring in their Bills upon their honesties; but when all was done, after much labouring by the Cardinal, the Clergy granted one half of all their yearly Spiritual Revenues, for five years, and the Temporality two shillings in the pound, from twenty pounds upwards, and from forty shillings to twenty pounds, of every twenty shillings twelve pence; and under forty shillings, of every head of sixteen years and upwards four pence, to be paid in every two years. In his sixteenth year, the Cardinal of his own head attempted by Commission, to draw the People to pay the sixth part of every mans Substance in Plate or Money; but this was generally opposed, and the people in many Countreys rise upon it, so as coming to the Kings knowledge, he utterly disavowed it, and blamed the Cardinal exceedingly for attempting it. In his four and twentieth year, in a Parliament then holden, a fifteen was granted to the King, towards his charges of making fortifications against Scotland. In his one and thirtieth year, a Subsidy of two shillings in the pound of lands, and twelve of goods, with four fifteens were granted to the King, towards his charges of making Bulwarks. In his five and thirtieth year, a Subsidy was granted to be paid in three years, every English-man being worth in goods twenty shillings and upwards to five pounds; to pay four pence of every pound, and from five pounds to ten pounds eight pence; and from ten pounds to twenty pounds, six pence; from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound two shillings; Strangers as well Denizens as others, being Inhabitants, to pay double: and for lands, every English-man paid eight pence of the pound, from twenty shillings to five pounds; and from five pounds to ten pounds sixteen pence, and from ten pounds to twenty pounds two shillings, and from twenty pounds and upwards, of every pound three shillings, strangers double: the Clergy six shillings in the pound of Benefices, and every Priest having no Benefice, but an Annual stipend, six shillings eight pence yearly, during three years.

Of Laws and Ordinances in his time.

Inclofures commanded to be laid open.

IN a Parliament holden his sixth year, divers Laws were made, but two most spoken of; one for Apparel, another for Labourers. In his twelfth year, he caused the Statutes against Inclofures to be revived, and commanded that decayed houses should be built up again, and that inclosed grounds should be laid open; which though it did some good, yet not so much as it might have done; if the Cardinal for his own benefit, had not procured liberty for great men; to keep up their Inclofures, to the oppression of poor men. In his seventeenth year, the King lying at Eltham, divers Ordinances were made by the Cardinal touching the Governance of the Kings House, and were long after called the Statutes of Eltham. In his eighteenth year, in the month of May, Proclamation was made against all unlawful Games; so that in all places, Tables, Dice, Cards and Bowls, were taken and burnt; but this Order continued not long; for young men being restrained from these Games, fell some to drinking, some to stealing of Conies and Deer, and such other misdemeanours: Also in this year, was an inhancing of Coyne for the preventing the carrying it over to places where it went at higher rate, so that the Angel that went before but for seven shillings, should now go for seven and six pence, and every ounce of Gold should be five and forty shillings, which was before but forty, and other Coyne accordingly. In his twentieth year, Sir James Spencer being Maior of London, the Watch used on Midsummer night was laid down. In his three and thirtieth year, in a Parliament then holden, an Act was made, that whosoever should poison any person should be boyled to death, by which Statute one Richard Rouse, who had poisoned divers persons in the Bishop of Rochesters place, was boyled to death in Smithfield, to the terrible example of all other. In his two and twentieth year, three Acts were made, one for probate of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, the third against plurality of Benefices, Non-residence, buying and taking of Farms by Spiritual persons. In his thirtieth year it was ordained by Cromwell the Kings Vicar General, that in all Churches a Register should be kept of every Wedding, Christning, and Burial within the same Parish for ever. In his one and thirtieth year, the King first instituted and appointed fifty Gentlemen called Pensioners, to wait upon his Person, allying to each of them fifty pounds a year, for the maintenance of themselves and two Horses. In his six and thirtieth year, Proclamation was made for the inhancing of Gold to eight and forty shillings, and Silver to four shillings the Ounce: also he caused to be coyned base money, mingling it with Brasse, which was since that time called down the fifth year of Edward the sixth, and called in the second year of Queen Elizabeth. In his seven and thirtieth year, the Brothel-houses called the Stews on the Bank-side in Southwark, were put down by the Kings Commandement, and it was done by Proclamation and sound of Trumpet. In his three and twentieth year, it was enacted, that Butchers should sell their meat by weight, Beef for a half-penny the pound, and Mutton for three farthings: also at this time foreign Butchers were permitted to sell their flesh in Leaden-hall-market, which before was not allowed; in his time also the Government of the President in the North was first instituted, and the first President there, was Innesfall Bishop of Durham.

Affairs of the Church in his time.

Luther brings in a reformation of Religion.

IN the year 1517, the eighth year of this Kings Reign, Martin Luther of Wittenberg in Germany a Friar of the Order of the Hermites, taking occasion from the abuse of Indulgences, began to Preach against the Authority of the Pope, and to bring in a Reformation of Religion; for repressing of whom, the Council of Trent was called by Pope Paul the third, in the year 1542, which continued above forty years, but was never received in the Kingdom of France; which Council, by decreeing many things to be points of faith, which were not so accounted before, hath made no small distraction amongst Papists themselves: against this Luther

King

A King Henry wrote a Book with great bitterness, and with as great bitterness was answered. At the same time with Luther, there arose also in the same Countrey other Reformers of Religion, as Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Melancthon, who differing from Luther in some few points, made the difference which is at this day of Lutherans and Protestants, so called at first at Aspsburg, for making a Protestation in defence of their Doctrine, which soon after spread all Christendome over. King Henry in the six and twentieth year of his Reign, had excluded the Popes Authority out of his Realm; but thinking the work not sufficiently done, as long as Abbeyes and Priories kept their station, which were, as it were, his Fortresses and Pillars; there was not long after means found to have them suppressed; for aspersions being laid upon them (and perhaps no more than truth) of Adulteries and Murthers, they by Act of Parliament in his eight and twentieth year; at least near four hundred of them were suppressed, and all their lands and goods conferred upon the King. In his one and thirtieth year, all the rest; and lastly, in his five and thirtieth year, all Colledges, Chantries, and Hospitals; so as the Hives being now all removed, there have never since any Bees or Drones been seen in the Countrey. In this Kings time the City of Rome was taken and sacked by the Imperial Army, forcing the Pope to flee to his Castle Saint Angelo, and there kept a prisoner, till he agreed to such conditions as his Adversaries propounded. In the two and twentieth year of this Kings Reign, a Proclamation was set forth that no person should purchase any thing from the Court of Rome; and this was the first blow given to the Pope in England. In his three and twentieth year, the Clergy submitting themselves to the King, for being found guilty of a Præmunire, were the first that called him Supreme head of the Church. In his four and twentieth year a Parliament was holden, wherein one Act was made, that Bishops should pay no more Annates or money for their Bulls to the Pope, and another that no person should appeal for any cause out of this Realm to the Court of Rome, but from the Commissary to the Bishop, and from the Bishop to the Archbishop, and from the Archbishop to the King, and all causes of the King to be tried in the upper House of the Convocation. In his six and twentieth year, in July, John Frith was burnt in Smithfield, and with him at the same stake one Andrew Hones a Tailor, both for denying the Real presence in the Sacrament; and in a Parliament holden this year, an Act was made which Authorized the Kings highness, to be Supreme Head of the Church of England, and the Authority of the Pope to be abolished, and then also was given to the King the first Fruits and Tenth of all Spiritual livings; and this year were many put to death, Papists for denying the Kings Supremacy, Protestants for denying the Real presence in the Sacrament; and it is incredible what number for these two causes were put to death in the last ten years of the Kings Reign, of whom if we should make particular mention, it would reach a great way in the Book of Martyrs: in his eight and twentieth year, the Lord Cromwell was made Vicar General under the King, over the Spirituality, and saw divers times in the Convocation House amongst the Bishops as head over them; and in September this year, he set forth Injunctions, commanding all Parsons and Curates to teach their Parishioners the Pater Noster, the Ave, and Creed, with the ten Commandments and the Articles of the Christian Faith, in the English tongue. In his one and thirtieth year, was set forth by the Bishops, the Book of the six Articles, condemning all for Hereticks, and to be burnt, that should hold,

1. That the Body of Christ was not Really present in the Sacrament after Consecration.
2. That the Sacrament might not truly be administered under one kind.
3. That Priests entered into Holy Orders might marry.
4. That vows of Chastity entered into upon mature deliberation, were not to be kept.
5. That private Masses were not to be used.
6. That Auricular Confession was not necessary in the Church.

This year also the Religion of St. Johns in England, commonly called the Order of Knights of the Rhodes, was dissolved; and on Ascension-day, Sir William Weston Knight, Prior of St. Johns departed this life, for thought (as was reported) after he heard of the dissolution of his Order; for the King took all the lands that belonged to that Order into his own hands: In his six and thirtieth year, the Letany or Procession was set forth in English, with commandement by the King, to be generally used in Parish Churches.

Works of Piety done by him, or others in his time.

UPON the suppressing of Abbeyes, King Henry instituted six new Bishopricks and six Cathedral Churches, endowing them with convenient maintenance; he also gave competent Pensions during their lives, to such Religious Persons as were turned out of their Cloysters; he also instituted in both the Universities, Professors of the Hebrew and Greek tongues, of Divinity, Civil Law, and Physick, allowing to each of them forty pound a year: he also founded a Colledge at Cambridge; he gave at his death a thousand Marks to the poor; and to twelve poor Knights of Windsor, each of them twelve pence a day for ever; and every year a long Gown of white cloth: but his greatest work of Piety, was his putting down the Stewes in Southwark, Margaret Countess of Richmond, the Kings Grandmother, founded two Colledges at Cambridge, Christi-Church and Saint Johns. In the fifth year of this Kings Reign, George Monox Maior of London, re-edified the decayed Steeple of the Church of Waltham-stow in Essex, adding there-there into a tide Ile with a Chappel where he lieth buried; on the North tide of the Church-yard there he founded a fair Alms-house, for a Priort and thirteen poor men and women, giving them a weekly maintenance; he also for the commodity of Travellours made a Cawsey of Timber over the Marshes, from Waltham-stow to Lock-bridge towards London. In this Kings eighth year Richard Fox Bishop of Winchester founded Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, intending to have made it an house for Monks; but Hugh Oldham Bishop of Exeter, persuaded him to make it rather a Colledge for Scholars, and joyning with him in it, contributed great sums of Money towards it, contenting himself only with the name of a Benefactor. In his seventh year King Henry builded the Tower of Greenwich. In this Kings time, Cardinal Woolsey, founded two Colledges, one at Oxford, another at Ipswich; to his Colledge at Oxford he had given four thousand pounds Land a year, but his Lands being all confiscate to the King, the King took the Lands, but yet gave to the Colledge a competent maintenance for a Dean, eight Prebends, and a hundred Fellows; which Colledge is now called Christ Church; and accounts King Henry for their Founder. His Colledge at Ipswich was demolished. This Cardinal also built Hampton-Court, the chiefeft at this day of all the Kings houses; and built or enlarged White-hall, called then York-Place. King Henry in his four and twentieth year, built also his Mansion house of Saint James, where also he made a fair Park. This place before had been an Hospital of Sisters, with whom the King compounded, giving them Penfions during their lives. In his thirtieth year, Nicholas Gilsen Grocer, then Sheriff of London, builded a Free-School at Ratcliffe neer London, with maintenance for a Maister and an Usher; he also builded an Alms-house there for fourteen poor and aged people. In his one and thirtieth year, Thomas Hunnol the then Sheriff of London, gave certain Tenements to the Haberdashers, for finding of ten Alms-men of the same Company. In his six and thirtieth year, Sir John Allen who had been twice Maier of London, and of the Kings Council, gave at his death to the City of London, a rich Collier of Gold, to be worn by the Maier: which Collier was first worn by Sir William Eakston on Saint Edwards day, at the election of the new Maier, who gave to every Ward in London twenty pounds, to be distributed amongst poor Householders; besides to fixscore persons, whereof threescore men, to every one a Gown of broad-cloth, and a black Cap; and threescore women, to every one a Gown of the like Cloth, and a white Kerchief. In his eight and thirtieth year, King Henry gave to the City of London, for relief of poor people in S. Bartholomews Spittle, the Church of the Gray-friers, and two Parish Churches, the one at Saint Nicholas in the Shambles, the other Saint Ewins in Newgate-market, all to be made one Parish Church of the Gray-friers; and in Lands he gave for the maintenance of the same five hundred Marks a year for ever: and this Church to be named Christ Church, founded by King Henry the eighth. The Lady Elizabeth Holles, (the Widow of Sir William Holles Knight, late Lord Maier of the City of London) by her last Will and Testament, dated the 17. of February 1543. and in the thirty fifth year of the Reign of King Henry the eighth, and proved at London in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury the 28. of March 1544. did will her executors, her Cousin Maier Andrew Jud Alderman (afterwards Knight and Lord Maier of London) and her Brother Thomas Scopham, that they should provide a place or plot of ground, whereon should be erected six Alms-houses for six poor aged folke, men or women, or elfe both, to inhabit and dwell in, for the maintenance of which, she willed that her said Executors should purchase as much Land or Tenements within the City of London, or Liberties of the same, as should amount de claro above all charges to the yearly value of ten pound sterling, to be distributed in this manner: that is to say, to every of the said six Alms-people seven pence by the week, to be paid on every Saturday or Sabbath-day weekly, and the remainder of the said yearly ten pound to be distributed in Coals yearly, in the Winter season, to and amongst the said six Alms-people, and this to continue for ever whiles the World shall endure, as by the said Will may appear, which was afterwards accordingly effected by her said Executors; which said Lady Elizabeth Holles and Sir William Holles, were great Grandfather and great Grandmother unto John Holles Knight, Earl of Clare, &c. deceased.

Casualties in his time.

A Sweating sickness, of which many great men dyed.

IN his ninth year happened a Sweating-sickness, whereof infinite multitudes in many parts of England dyed, specially in London; and was so violent, that in three and sometimes two hours, it took away mens lives, and spared neither rich nor poor; for in the Kings Court the Lord Clinton, the Lord Gray of Wilton, and many Knights, Gentlemen and Officers dyed of it. It began in July, and continued to the midst of December. In his thirteenth year was a great Mortality in London, and other places of the Realm, and many men of Honour and Worship dyed; amongst others, Doctor Fitz-James Bishop of London, in whose place Doctor Tunstall succeeded. In his fifteenth year, after great rains and winds there followed so fore a Frost, that many dyed for cold; and some lost Fingers, some Toes, and many their Nails. In his nineteenth year, by extremity of rain in seed-time, there followed a great dearth of Corn, which would have caused great calamity, but that it was relieved in London by Merchants of the Steel-yard out of Germany, and a thousand quarters supplied out of the Kings own provision. In his twentieth year, in the end of May, began in London another Sweating-sickness, which afterwards infected all

Another sweating sickness.

A all placet of the Realm; by reason whereof the Term was adjourned, and the Circuit of the Assises also; many died in the Court, as Sir Francis Poyntes, Sir William Compton Knights, and William Carew Esquire of the Kings Privy Chamber; the King himself for a space, removed almost every day, till he came to Tittinghanger, a place of the Abbot of Sant Albones, where he with the Queen and a small number remained, till the sickness was past. In his thirtieth year, the manner of casting Pipes of Lead for conveyance of water under ground, without using of Soder, was first invented by Robert Brocks Clerk, one of the Kings Chaplains: a profitable invention; for by this, two men and a boy will do more in one day, then could have been done before by many men in many days: Robert Cooper Goldsmith, was the first that made the Instruments, and put this Invention in practice. In a Rebellion in the North, in this Kings time, when the Duke of Norfolk was sent with an Army against the Rebels, and that day of Battel between them was appointed, it happened, that the night before a small Brook called Dun, running between the two Armies, upon the fall of a small rain, swelled to such a height, that it was not passable by either foot or horse; a thing which had never happened before upon a great rain, and was then accounted (as indeed it was) no less then a Miracle. In his three and thirtieth year, was a great Mortality in the Realm, by reason of hot Agues and Fluxes; and withal so great a drought, that small Rivers were clean dried, much Cattel dyed for lack of water; and the Thames was grown so shallow, that the Salt-water flowed above London Bridge, till the rain had encreased the fresh-waters. In his five and thirtieth year, the first cast pieces of Iron that ever were made in England, were made at Buckstead in Suffex by Ralph Hage and Peter Bawde. In his six and thirtieth year, was a great Plague in London, so as Michaelmas Term was adjourned to Saint Albones, and there kept. In his seven and thirtieth year, on Tuesday in Easter-week, William Foxley Pot-maker for the Mint of the Tower of London, fell asleep, and could not be waked with pinching or burning, till the first day of the next Term, which was full fourteen dayes; and when he awaked, was found in all points, as if he had slept but one night, and lived forty years after. About his fifteenth year, it happened that divers things were newly brought into England, whereupon this Rhyme was made:

Turkeys, Carps, Hoppes, Piccarel and Beers

Of his Wives and Children.

King Henry had six Wives; his first was Katherine, Daughter of Ferdinand King of Spain, the Relict of his Brother Arthur, she lived his Wife above twenty years, and then was divorced from him; after which she lived three years by the name of Katherine Dowager, she deceased at Kimbolton in the County of Huntington, the eighth of January in the year 1535. and lieth interred in the Cathedral Church of Peterborough, under a Hearse of black Say, having a white Crois in the midst. His second Wife was Ann second Daughter of Sir Thomas Bullen Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond; she was married to him the five and twentieth day of January, in the year 1533. lived his Wife three years three moneths and five and twenty days; and then was beheaded, and her body buried in the Quire of the Chappel in the Tower. His third Wife was Jane Daughter of Sir John Seymour, and Sister to the Lord Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford; and Duke of Somerset, she was married to him the next day after the beheading of Queen Anne; lived: his Wife one year five moneths and four and twenty days, and then dyed in Child-bed, and was buried in the midst of the Quire of the Church within the Cattle of Windsor. His fourth Wife was Anne Sister to the Duke of Cleve, she lived his Wife six moneths, and then was divorced; she remained in England long after the Kings death, and accompanied the Lady Elizabeth through London, at the solemnizing of Queen Maries Coronation. His fifth Wife was Katherine, Daughter of Edmund, and Neece of Thomas Howard his Brother Duke of Norfolk; she was married to him in the two and thirtieth year of his Reign; lived his Wife one year six moneths and four days; and then was beheaded in the Tower of London, and buried in the Chancel of the Chappel by Queen Anne Bullen. His sixth Wife was Katherine, Daughter of Sir Thomas Parre of Kendall, and Sister to the Lord William Parre, Marquess of Northampton; she was first married to John Nevill Lord Latimer, and after his decease to the King at Hampton-Court, in the five and thirtieth year of his Reign: she was his Wife three years six moneths and five days; and then surviving him, was again married to Thomas Seymour Lord Admiral of England, unto whom she bore a daughter, and dyed in her Child-bed, in the year 1548. He had children by his first Wife Queen Katherine, Henry born at Richmond, who lived not full two moneths, and was buried at Westminster; also another Son whose name is not mentioned, lived but a short time neither: then a Daughter named Mary, born at Greenwich, in the eighth year of his Reign, and came afterward to be Queen of England. By his second Wife, Queen Anne Bullen, he had a Daughter named Elizabeth, born at Greenwich, in the five and twentieth year of his Reign; who succeeded her Sister Mary in the Crown: he had also by her a Son, but born dead. By his third Wife Queen Jane, he had a Son named Edward, born at Hampton-Court in the nine and twentieth year of his his reign, who succeeded him in the Kingdom. Besides these, he had a base son, named Henry Fitz-Roy, begotten of the Lady Talboysse, called Elizabeth Blunt, born at Blackmore in Essex, in the tenth year of his reign; who was made Duke of Richmond and Somerset; married Mary Daughter of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk; with whom he lived not long, but died at Saint James by Westminster, and was buried at Framingham in Suffolk.

Of his Personage and Conditions.

HE was exceeding tall of stature, and very strong; fair of complexion, in his latter days corpulent and burley: concerning his conditions, He was a Prince of so many good parts, that one would wonder he could have any ill; and indeed he had not many ill, till flattery and ill counsel, in his latter time got the upper hand of him. His cruelty to his wives may not only be excused, but defended; for if they were incontinent, he did but justice; if they were not so, yet it was sufficient to satisfy his conscience, that he thought he had cause to think them so; and if the marriage Bed be honourable in all, in Princes it is sacred. In suppressings of Abbeys he shewed not little Piety, but great Providence; for though they were excellent things being rightly used, yet most pestilent, being abused; and then may the use be justly suppressed, when the abuse scarce possibly can be restrained. To think he suppressed Abbeys out of covetousness and desire of gain, is to make him extremely deceived in his reckoning; for if we compare the profit with the charge that followed, we shall find him certainly a great loser by the bargain. He was so far from Pride, that he was rather too humble, at least, he conversed with his Subjects in a more familiar manner than was usual with Princes. So valiant, that his whole life almost, was nothing but exercises of valor; and though performed amongst his friends in jest, yet they prepared him against his Enemies in earnest, and they that durst be his Enemies found it. It may be said, the complexion of his Government for the first twenty years, was sanguine and jovial; for the rest, cholerick and bloody: and it may be doubted, whether in the former, he were more prodigal of his own treasure, or in the latter of his Subjects blood: for as he spent more in Fictions, than any other King did in Realities; so in any distemper of his people, he had no other Phylick, but to open a vein: but we shall do him extreme wrong, to think that all the blood-shed in his time, was of his shedding; they were the Bishops that were the Draco to make the bloody Laws; the Bishops that were the Phalaris, to put them in execution: the King oftentimes scarce knowing what was done. Certain it is, when a great Lord put a Gentlewoman the second time on the rack, the King hearing of it, exceedingly condemned him for such extreme cruelty. As for Religion, though he brought it not to a full Reformation; yet he gave it so great a beginning, that we may truly say of that he did, Dimidium plus toto. They who charge him with the vice of lust, let them show such another example of continence as was seen in him to lie six months by a young Lady, and not to touch her; for so did he with the Lady Anne of Cleve: but this is to make Nofegays; I like better to leave every flower growing upon its stalk; that it be gathered fresh; which will be done by reading the Story of his Life.

Of his Death and Burial.

IT is Recorded of him, that in his latter time he grew so fat and slothful, that engines were made to lift and remove him up and down; but howsoever in the six and fiftieth year of his age, whether by a Dropsie, or by reason of an Ulcer, in his leg, he fell into a languishing Fever, which brought him into such extremity, that his Physicians utterly despaired of his life, whereof yet none durst speak a word to him, till Master Denny one of his Privy-chamber took the boldness to go to him, telling him of the danger he was in, and withal putting him in mind to think of his souls health; to which he answered, that he confessed his sins to be exceeding great, yet had such confidence in the mercy of God through Christ, that he doubted not of forgiveness though they had been much greater; and being then asked by Master Denny, if he would have any Divine brought to him with whom to confer, he answered he would willingly have the Archbishop Cranmer, but not yet a while, till he had taken a little rest: whereupon the Archbishop being then at Croydon, was presently sent for; but before he could come, the King was grown speechless, only seeming to retain a little memory, so as putting out his hand, and the Archbishop desiring him to shew some sign of his faith in Christ, he then wrung the Archbishop hard by the hand, and immediately gave up the ghost, the eighth and twentieth of January, in the year 1547. the six and fiftieth of his age, and of his reign the eight and thirtieth: his Body with great solemnity was buried at Windfor under a most costly and stately Tombe, begun in copper and gilt, but never finished.

Men

Men of Note in his time.

MEN famous for the sword were many in his time, and in a manner all; that it is hard making choice, without being partial, unless we shall prefer Dukes of equal valour before others of meaner calling, and then will the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk hold worthily the place first; and next to them the young Earl of Surrey, who had been more fortunate if he had been less valiant. THE

THE REIGN OF KING EDWARD THE SIXTH.

IT was now in the year 1547. when on the eight and twentieth of January King Henry dying, Prince Edward his Son, by his third Wife, the Lady Jane Seymour, and the only Son he left behind him, as well by right of Inheritance, as by his last Will, succeeded him in the Kingdom; to whom as being but nine years old, and therefore unripe for Government, he had assigned eight and twenty Counsellours; a fit number, if agreeing amongst themselves; too many, if at variance: and at variance they would soon fall, if there were not a Moderator to keep them in concord; the first work therefore necessary to be done in this new world, was to make choice of such a man as might be to the Counsellours a Moderator, a Protector to the King, and in his minority, to the Kingdom. To this place by common consent of the King and Council, Edward Seymour Earl of Hartford the Kings Uncle, was chosen to hold the place, until the King should accomplish the age of eighteen years. In which Office the first thing he did, was to make the young King Knight, who presently thereupon, made Henry Hobbethorne Maior of London Knight, and then King Henry's Obsequies being solemnly performed; on the seventeenth of February, were raised in honour the Earl of Hartford Protector, to be Duke of Somerset, William Par Earl of Essex, to be Marquess of Northampton, Dudley Vicount Lisle, to be Earl of Warwick, Wriothesley Lord Chancellour, to be Earl of Southampton; Sir Thomas Seymour the Protector's Brother was made Lord Sudeley, and Admiral of England, Sir Richard Rich was made Lord Rich, Sir William Villoughby was made Lord Villoughby, and Sir Edmund Sheffield was made Lord Sheffield of Butterwick: On the nineteenth of February the King in great state rode from the Tower to the Palace of Westminster, where the day following, he was Crowned by the Archbishop of Canterbury, with all rites accustomed, in great solemnity. At which time a general Pardon was proclaimed for all offenders, six only excepted, namely the Duke of Norfolk, Cardinal Pole, Edward Courtney, eldest Son to the Marquess of Exeter, Master Fortescue, Master Throgmorton, and Doctor Pates Bishop of Worcester, who was fled to Rome, to avoid taking the Oath of Supremacy, all which six continued unpardoned, till the first year of Queen Mary, and then were reitorred. A few daies after the Earl of Southampton Lord Chancellour, for being contumacious to the rest of the Lords in matters of Counsel, was removed both from his Office of being Chancellour, and from his place in Council, and the great Seal was delivered Sir William Paulet, Lord Saint-John, and Lord great Master of the Kings Household.

Within two moneths after the death of King Henry, dyed Francis King of France also, for whom solema Obsequies were kept in Pauls Church, as he likewise had kept before at Paris for King Henry: these two Kings were of so contenting natures, that they had certainly been great friends while they lived, if they had not been Kings, and that jealousie of state had not made them oftentimes not to be themselves.

The Protector enters Scotland with an Army; and why.

How he marshalled his Army.

The profit of winning time.

The Fire-proscribed in Scotland; and what it was.

The battail of Muffelborough Field.

The Lord Huntley chal- lengeth the Protector to a single Combat; and the Protector's Answer.

King Henry before his death had left in charge with the Lords of his Council, by all means possible, to procure a proceeding in the marriage with the young Queen of Scots; and now in discharge thereof the Lord Protector himself, with an Army of twelve thousand Foot, and six thousand Horse, besides Labourers & Pioneers thirteen hundred, entered Scotland the third of September; at which time also Edward Lord Clinton with a Fleet of three score Sail assisted by Sea; but before he would do any hostile Act, he caused Proclamation to be made, that his coming was only to have performance of the Articles heretofore agreed on for the marriage, tending to the good of both Kingdoms; which if they would yield unto, he would then return in peaceable manner, and the more to draw them on, where before it was demanded to have the Queen brought into England, and there to be brought up, the Protector was content, she should remain in Scotland till years of consent: this demand, the more moderate sort of the Scots accounted very reasonable, but those of the French and Papal faction, who were the greatest persons, and the greatest number, strongly opposed; whereupon, the Lord Protector presently put his Army into Array; the Lord Gray and Sir Francis Brian with eight hundred Light-horse, were sent before to provide lodging for the Army; and to give advertisement of the Enemies approaches; then followed the Avant-guard, in number between three and four thousand Foot, one hundred men at Arms, and six hundred Light-horse, led by the Earl of Warwick; then followed the main Battail, consisting of above six thousand Foot, six hundred men at Arms, and one thousand Light-horse led by the Protector himself; lastly followed the Arrear, wherein were between three and four thousand Foot, one hundred men at Arms, and six hundred Light-horse, under the conduct of the Lord Dacres; upon one wing the Artillery was drawn, being fifteen pieces of great Ordnance; the other wing was made by men at Arms and Demilances; for the Avant-guard and half the battail, riding about two flight shoot from their side, the other half of the battail, and the whole flank of the Arrear, was closed by the marriages being nine hundred Cars beside Wagons; the rest of the men at Arms, and the Demilances marched behind. In this order they marched two daies, taking in three Castles as they went, with little resistance; where it is memorable, what a sudden device the Defendants of one of them used to save themselves; for finding they were no longer able to defend themselves, and that their obitinity had excluded all hope of pardon; they made suit, they might not presently be slain, but have some time to commend their souls to God, and afterwards be hanged; which respite being obtained, their pardon afterward did more easily ensue, so much doth the winning of time oftentimes prevail, more then any other policy. The Governour of Scotland, hearing of the Protector's approach, and having no sufficient Army ready to resist him, sent his Heralds abroad, into all parts of the Realm, and commanded the Fire-crofts to be carried (an ancient custom in cases of importance) which was two firebrands set in fashion of a cross, and pitched upon the point of a spear, and therewith Proclamation to be made, that all above sixteen years of age, and under sixty, should resort forthwith to Muffelborough, and bring convenient provision of victuals with them. By this means, having gotten a sufficient Army, he set forward towards the English who were now come to the River called Linn, and here the Earl of Warwick being too venturesome, was like to have been entrapped, but by his valour came off bravely; and now the Scottish Horsemen began to hover about the English Army, and to come pricking towards them, sometimes within length of their staves, using provoking words, to draw the English from their strength; but the Protector, not moved with their provocations, maintained a close march till he came to Salt-Prefson by the Frith, where he incamped within two miles of the Scottish Army: and here the Scots having gotten the advantage of a Hill came upon the English with the number of twelve hundred Horse, besides five hundred Foot that lay in ambush behind the Hill; at which time the Lord Gray and Sir Francis Brian, impatient of such braveries, obtained leave of the General to encounter them, and so as they came scattered upon the spur, within a stones cast of the English, and were beginning to wheel about, the Lord Gray with some Troops of Light-horse-men, charged them home, and was forthwith seconded by certain numbers of Demilances, and both of them backed with a thousand men at Arms; yet the Scots resolutely maintained the fight three hours and more, but in the end, overlaid with number they were put to flight, and chased almost to the edge of their Camp. In this fight the chieftest force of the Scottish Horse-men was defeated, the Lord Hume by a fall from his Horse lost his life, his Son and Heir with two Priests and six Gentlemen were taken prisoners, and about fifteen hundred slain: the next day, the Protector and the Earl of Warwick rode towards the place where the Scottish Army lay, to view the manner of incamping. As they returned, an Herald and a Trumpeter from the Scots overtook them, who having obtained Audience, the Trumpeter said, that the Lord Huntley his Master, to spare effusion of Christian blood, would fight upon the whole quarrel, either with twenty against twenty, or with ten against ten, or else try it between the Lord General and himself: the Protector answered, that for number of Combatants, it was not in his power to conclude any bargain, and as for himself, that being in publick charge, it was not fit he should hazard himself against a man of private Conditions, which otherwise he would most willingly accept: here the Earl of Warwick intreated the Lord General, that he might accept the Challenge; and, Trumpeter (saith he) bring me word, that thy Master will perform the Combat with me, and thou shalt have an hundred Crowns for thy pains; nay rather (saith the Lord General) bring me word that thy Master will abide and give us battail, and thou shalt have a thousand Crowns for thy pains: and thereupon, when no other agreement could be made, a general battail was resolved on; in the Army of the Scots, were five or six and thirty thousand

A thousand men; in the Avant-guard, commanded by the Earl of Angus, about fifteen thousand; in the Battail, over whom was the Lord Governor, about ten thousand, and the Arrear as many, led by the valiant Gourdon Earl of Huntley. Hackbutters they had none, nor men at Arms, but about two thousand Horsemen, (Prickers as they term them) the rest were all on foot well furnished with Jack and Scull, Pikes, Daggers, Bucklers made of board, and flucing swords broad and thin, every man had a long Kerchiffe, folded twice or thrice about his neck, and many of them had chains of Lattin, drawn three or four times along their hoses and doublet sleeves: they had also to affright the Enemies Horses, great rattles covered with Parchment or Paper, and small stones within put upon staves three ells long. And now both Armies joyned in Battail, where after a long fight, and much variety of fortune on both sides, at length the victory fell to the English; in this fight, divers of the Nobility of Scotland were slain, of the inferior sort about ten, or as some say, fourteen thousand; of the English were slain one and fifty Horsemen, and one Footman, but many hurt; the Lord Gray was dangerously thrust with a pike in the mouth which struck two inches into his neck: the Scottish prisoners accounted by the Marshalls Book, were about fifteen hundred, the chief whereof were, the Earl of Huntley, the Lord Telfer, Hobbey and Hamilton, the Master of Sane-Poole and the Lord of Wimmes; the Earl of Huntley being asked whilest he was a prisoner, how he stood affected to the marriage; made this answer, that he liked the marriage well enough, but he liked not this kind of wooing. This Victory of Muffelborough against the Scots, was on the tenth of December, the very same day on which thirty years before a victory had been had against them at Flodden field; so as it seems this day was fatal to the Scots, and confirms the opinion of Astrologers, that there are days to some men fortunate, and unfortunate to others, if they could be known. This victory struck such a terror into many of the Scots, that the Earl of Bothwell and divers chief Gentlemen of Tivodale and Mary submitted themselves to the King of England, and were received by the Protector into his protection: after this, the English Army took many Towns and Castles, and then for want of Provision, returned into England, having not stayed above five and twenty days in Scotland, and not lost above three score men. After the taking of Muffelborough, the Duke of Somerset made many Knights, but three especially; namely Sir Ralph Sadler Treasurer, Sir Francis Brian Captain of the Light Horse, and Sir Ralph Vane Lieutenant of all the Horsemen: he made Binnerets, which is a dignity above a Knight, and next to a Baron; and these were the last that from that time to this, did ever receive this dignity. But notwithstanding this great overthrow at Muffelborough, the Governour of Scotland would not yet be quiet; but assembling the people, made unto them an Oration, exhorting them to defend the liberty of their Countrey, and not to be daunted with any event of war. In this time many distractions and troubles happened in England; partly in matters of Religion, and partly about Inclosures: and first for Inclosures, the Lord Protector caused Proclamation to be set forth, commanding that they who had inclosed any Land accustomed to lie open, should upon a certain pain, before a day assigned, lay them open again: And then in matter of Religion, certain Injunctions were set forth, for removing of Images out of Churches; and divers Preachers were sent with Instructions to dissuade the people from praying to Saints, or for the dead; from use of Beads, Ashes and Processions; from Masses, Dirges, praying in any unknown tongue; and for defect of Preachers, Homilies were appointed publicly to be read in Churches; and many for offering to maintain these Ceremonies, were either punished or forced to recant. Edmund Bonner Bishop of London, was committed to the Fleet, for refusing to receive these Injunctions; Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester, was likewise committed first to the Fleet, and after to the Tower, for that he had preached; It were well these changes in Religion should be stayed until the King were of years to govern by himself: for the like causes Tunstall Bishop of Durham, Heath Bishop of Rochester, and Day Bishop of Chichester, were in like manner committed to prison, and all of them dispossessed of their Bishopricks; and that which was worse, the Bishopricks themselves were dispossessed of their Revenues, in such sort, that a very small part remained to the Bishops that came after.

And now a Parliament was held, in the first year of the King, and by Prorogation in the second; wherein divers Chantries, Colledges, free Chappels, Fraternities and Guildes, with all their lands and goods, were given to the King; which being sold at a low rate, enriched many, and ennobled some, and thereby made them firm in maintaining the change: also it was then ordered, that no man should speak against receiving the Eucharist in both kinds, and that Bishops should be placed by Collation of the King under his Letters Patents, without any election preceding or confirmation ensuing; and that all processes Ecclesiastical should be made in the Kings name, as in Writs at the Common Law; and that all persons exercising Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, should have the Kings Arms in the Seals of their Office: and further, the Statute of the six Articles and other Statutes concerning punishment of Lollards were repealed, and the Kings Supremacy over the Church of England was confirmed.

All this while the wars in Scotland continued, and were managed by the Lord Gray of Wilton with variable success; and now about this time was sent to him in aid, the Earl of Shropshire with fifteen thousand men; against him in aid of the Scots, was sent the Rhinegrave with ten thousand French; who entering into consultation, how to remove the young Queen out of the reach of the English, provided a Fleet, and sailing round about Scotland, notwithstanding the English Fleet lay in wait to impeach their passage, yet conveyed her safely into France, being then but six years old, accompanied in the journey with James her base Brother, John Erskin and William Levison; and in April following was married to Francis the Dauphin of France.

The troubles
the alteration of Religion.

You heard before the alterations in Religion: now hear the troubles; for when the Injunctions were sent abroad into the Countrey, and Commissioners appointed to see them executed: one Master Bodey a Commissioner, as he was pulling down Images in Cornwall, was suddenly by a Priest stabbed into the Body with a knife. Hereupon the people flocked together in divers parts of the Shire, taking Arms, and beginning to commit outrages; and although the chief Offender was hanged and quartered in Smithfield, and many of his complices executed in divers parts of the Realm, and withal a Pardon proclaimed to all that would lay down Arms; yet neither could that severity, nor this lenity restrain them from their insolencies; but in divers Countries, as Sussex, Hampshire, Kent, Gloucestershire, Warwickshire, Wiltshire, but specially in Somersetshire and Devonshire, great assemblies of people gathered to a head; whose chief Leaders were Humphrey Arundel, and about six others of inferior note; but many Priests. Some of these (we may say) were Common-wealth mutiners; and some mutined for Religion: they who were for the Common-wealth could agree upon nothing; some would have no Justices, some no Gentlemen, some no Lawyers, nor ordinary Courts of Justice; but above all, Inclosures must down; but whether all, or which, or how to be employed, none could tell. The religious Mutiners were not altogether so various in their voyces, as having some few amongst them by whom they were guided: these in the name of the people hammered up these Articles following; upon granting of which, they professed that both their bodies and goods should be at the Kings devotion.

1. That Curates should administer Baptism at all times of necessity, as well on week-days as on holy-days.
2. That their children might be confirmed by the Bishop.
3. That the Mass might be celebrated, no man communicating with the Priest.
4. That they might have reservation of the Lords Body in their Churches.
5. That they might have holy Bread and holy Water in remembrance of Christs precious Body and Blood.
6. That Priests might live unmarried.
7. That the six Articles set forth by King Henry the eighth might be continued, at least till the King should come to full age.

Upon these demands, the King, although he knew that Reasons would little prevail with unreasonable men; yet to discharge the place he held, he sent them in writing Answers to them all, and withal a general pardon, if they would desist and lay down arms. But the seditious growing the more outrageous, the fairer they were intreated; and finding themselves unable to submit with their own citates, began to think upon the spoil of Cities; and first they came to Exeter, and demanded entrance, which the Citizens refusing, they fell to set fire on the Gates; but the Citizens prevented this, by casting in wood and maintaining the fire, till they had cast up a half Moon within; upon which when the Seditious attempted to enter, they were presently hewen and cut in pieces. After this they mined the wals, laid powder, and rammed the mouth; but the Citizens prevented this also, by making a countermine, whereinto they poured such plenty of water, that the wet powder could not be fired. All this while, the Lord Russell Lord Privy Seal, who had been sent down to suppress the Commotion, lay at Huntington, expecting more Forces; whilst these Citizens of Exeter for twelve days together endured to great famine, that they were fain to eat Horses, and make bread of course Bran moulded in cloathes, for that otherwise it would not cleave together. At last the Lord Gray came to the Lord Russell with supply of Forces; who after many conflicts with the Rebels, forced them to raise their siege at Exeter; and thereby freed the City from many miseries: to whom the King afterward gave the Manor of Evyland, in reward for their loyalty. After this, the Rebels rallying their Forces, were again set upon by the Kings Army, and the greatest part of them slain, the rest fled; many were taken and executed by Martial Law; the chief Leaders were sent to London, and there executed. The sedition being thus suppressed; it is memorable what sport Sir William Kingston the Provost Marshal made, by virtue of his Office, upon men in misery. One Boyer Maior of Bodmin in Cornwall, had been amongst the Rebels, not willingly, but enforced; to him the Provost sent word he would come and dine with him; for whom the Maior made great provision; a little before dinner, the Provost took the Maior aside, and whispered him in the ear, that an execution mast that day be done in the Town, and therefore required to have a pair of Gallows set up against dinner should be done; the Maior failed not of his charge; presently after dinner the Provost taking the Maior by the hand, intreated him to lead him to the place where the Gallows was, which when he beheld, he asked the Maior if he thought them to be strong enough; yes (said the Maior) doubtless they are; Well then (said the Provost, get you up speedily, for they are provided for you. I hope (answered the Maior) you mean not as you speak: In faith (said the Provost) there is no remedy, for you have been a busie Rebel; and so without respite or defence he was hanged to death; a moit uncourteous part, for a guest to offer his host. Neer the said place dwelled a Miller, who had been a busie actor in that Rebellion; who fearing the approach of the Marshal, told a sturdy fellow his servant, that he had occasion to go from home, and therefore bid him, that if any man came to enquire after the Miller, he should not speak of him, but say that himself was the Miller, and had been so for three years before. So the Provost came and called for the Miller, when our comes

the Rebels to extreme famine.

For which loyalty
the King gave them the Manor of Evyland.

Sir William Kingston mercifully.

A the servant, and said, he was the man. The Provost demanded how long he had kept the Mill? These three years, answered the Servant. Then the Provost commanded his men to lay hold on him, and hang him on the next Tree. At this the Fellow cried out, that he was not the Miller, but the Millers man: Nay Sir (said the Provost) I will take you at your word: and if thou beest the Miller, show us a bawle knave; if thou beest not, thou art a false lying knave: and howsoever, thou canst never do thy Master better service than to hang for him: and so without more ado he was dispatched.

When this Sedition in Devonshire was appeased, there arose another in Norfolk, and that specially upon a grievance for enclosures; The Rebels had got one Robert Ket a Tanner of Wymondham to be their Leader, and were grown to a Body of twenty thousand, seating themselves at Monsbold near Mount-Surrey, where they carried a face as it were of Justice and Religion; for they had one Congers an idle fellow to be their Chaplain, who morning and evening read solemn Prayers, also Sermons they had often; and as for Justice, they had a Bench under a Tree where Ket usually fate, and with him two of every Hundred whence their Companies had been raised, to hear complaints, and to give Judgment; and from hence were Warrants sent in the Kings name, to bring in Powder, Shot, Victual, and all things necessary: Which Tree hath ever since been called the Tree of Reformation. And now being grown to a height, they presented certain Complaints to the King, requiring, he would send a Herald to them, to give them satisfaction. The King, though he took it for a great indignity to have such base Fellows to capitulate with him, yet framing himself to the time, he returned this answer; That in October following he would call a Parliament, wherein their Complaints should be heard, and all their Grievances should be redressed, requiring them in the mean time, to lay down Arms; and return to their houses, and thereupon granting them a general Pardon. But this was so far from satisfying the Seditious, that hereupon first they assailed the Town of Norwich, took it, and made the Mayor attend them as their Servant, and then returned again to their Station at Monsbold. Not long after, William Parre Marquess of Northampton, with the Lord Sheffield, the Lord Wentworth, divers Knights and fifteen hundred Horse, with a small Band of *Italian*ians, was sent against them; whom the Seditious so stoutly opposed, that much mischief was done on both sides; the Lord Sheffield falling with his Horse in a Ditch, was taken prisoner, and as he pulled off his Helmet to shew who he was, he was by a Butcher stricken down with a Club and slain: So as the Marquess with his Forces not prevailing, there was afterward sent the Earl of Warwick with six thousand Foot and fifteen hundred Horse, with whom were the Lords Willoughby, Pembroke and Bray, his two Sons Ambrose and Robert, and many Knights and Gentlemen of name. When the Earl was come near to the Camp of the Seditious, he sent a Herald to them, offering them the Kings Pardon, if they would desist; but they were so far from accepting it, that a lewd Boy turned up his naked breech towards the Herald, and bid him kiss it. Upon this, many Skirmishes passed between the Earl and them, with loss sometimes to one side, and sometimes to another; at last they came to a Battail, where the Rebels placed in the Front all the Gentlemen they had taken prisoners, meaning they should be the first slain, of whom yet very few were hurt, but of the Rebels were slain above two thousand; and now once again the Earl offered them pardon, if they would desist; but for all their losses, they continued obstinate still. At last, the Earl sent to know if they would entertain their pardon, in case he should come in Person and assure them of it: This moved them much; and then they answered, They knew him to be so honourable, that from himself they would embrace it. Whereupon the Earl riding to them, and causing their Pardon to be read, they threw away their Weapons, wishing all Joy and Prosperity to the King: Nine of the principal Rebels were hanged upon the Tree of Reformation; Ket himself flying away, was taken and hanged in Chains upon Norwich Castle. The day of this defeat of the Seditious, was a long time after observed for a Festival day by the Inhabitants of Norwich. And thus ended the Sedition in Norfolk; When at the same time another arose in Yorkshire, whereof the chief movers were William Ombler a Gentleman, Thomas Dale a Parish Clerk, and Stephenson a Poet, to whom were assembled four or five thousand, who took their encouragement from a certain Prophecie, which did foretell, That the time should come, when there should be no King; when the Nobility and Gentry should be destroyed; when the Realm should be ruled by four Governours elected by the Commons, holding a Parliament in common, which should begin at the South and North Seas of England; and that time they understood to be the present, and that the Rebels of Devonshire, Norfolk, and Yorkshire, should draw together to accomplish this Prophecie. But as soon as they heard that the Tumults of Devonshire and Norfolk were quieted, they found that they were deceived in the understanding of the Prophecie; and thereupon presently upon the Kings pardon, they fell off and dispersed, their chief Leaders, Ombler, Dale, and four others were executed at York; and with this, the Spirit of Sedition was quite laid in all places of the Kingdom.
